sought one day to break to her little girl of four years old, that her dear father must die in a few hours' time. The doctor, who had attended him during the sad stages of lingering consumption, said that he could not live till morning. The little girl ran from her mother's side into a room apart, and knelt down. With her little hands clasped, and her eyes riveted upward she cried, "O God, you can cure my father, you know you can, for you made the stars; and if you don't cure him, who is to take care of me when the great Antichrist comes?" The physician returned in the morning thinking to find his patient no more, but another and an infallible Physician had been at work, and that same father has filled a blessed and useful part in the Lord's vineyard for nearly forty years since that time. The child was the only one who had the courage to ask the exercise of Almighty power.

What is the chief hindrance to the conversion of children? Undoubtedly the want of the power and presence of God in their parents and teachers. Why were Jacob's children so unsatisfactory? Be- cause Jacob's life was not one of steady faith and obedience. Let the parents be filled with the Holy Ghost and the children will easily find the way open instead of closed toward Jesus. If we deal with our children unselfishly, for God and not for our own credit or pleasure, if we deal with them by faith in God and not by our own efforts or wisdom, our loving Shepherd will be our children's Shep- herd too, they will be led, guided, kept by Him.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Riots at Alexandria on Sunday, June 11th, were more fatal than was at first supposed. The correspondent of the London Standard at Alexandria telegraphs that up to Friday evening the total number of corpses found of Europeans killed in the riot was 340. Eye witnesses state that Europeans who took refuge in the police stations were massacred by gendarmes. The correspondent declares that the rising was organized by the prefect of police. The utmost alarm prevails among foreigners in Egypt, and all who can leave are seeking the protection of the ships. An American correspondent at Alexandria says: "The streets are blocked. Carts are piled with the baggage of fleeing Europeans. Carriages, the fare for which is usually one franc, now bring $25, the natives wishing to make hay while the sun shines. All the men-of-war in the harbor are crowded with fugitives. The American frigate Galena is crowded with families claiming American protection. Revs. Joseph and Richard Smith, of New York and Baltimore, have taken refuge on board, the officers, though greatly inconvenienced, courteously giving up their cabins to the ladies. One American officer narrowly escaped while in the company of a British officer who was killed in the fight." Great indignation is expressed everywhere against the British and French Governments. Mr. Gladstone appears to have acted toward Egypt as he did in Ireland. He suffered discontent to grow and spread and the malcontents to organize without taking any steps to check the progress of the movement or to conciliate the insurgents. The result has been in Egypt as in Ireland, outrage and murder.

Little Progress has been made during the week with Irish legislation. It is now apparent that the bill for the repression of crime will not be allowed to pass without the determined and persistent opposition of the Irish members. Meanwhile evictions in large numbers occur every day. Mr. Trevelyan, chief secretary for Ireland, in the House of Commons said that evictions were proceeding at a rate almost appalling, and a statement is published that they now average a thousand weekly. Demands are made that the Government shall suspend evictions until the arrears bill is passed, but it is not likely that Mr. Gladstone will make such a proposal. The government will, however, ask for a continuous discussion of the bill to relieve tenants of their arrears of rent in committee. It is now definitely stated that the government will call Parliament together late in autumn to pass the procedure resolutions put aside by the pressure of Irish affairs. This is a most unusual proceeding, and shows how seriously the kingdoms of England and Scotland are suffering by the prominence of Irish questions. It is stated by reliable correspondents that many members of Parliament formerly firm opponents of home rule would be willing that Ireland should try the experiment of legislative separation.

A Large Store of Arms and Ammunition Intended for Ireland was seized in London on June 17th. The police obtained a clue to the place of concealment and then made a raid on a stable in one of the lowest districts in London, where they found from sixty to seventy thousand rounds of ammunition packed in boxes and cases ready for removal, about four hundred stand of Snider rifles and needle guns with bayonets, and twenty-five boxes full of six-chambered revolvers and other arms. The information in the hands of the police shows that the arms and ammunition were intended for shipment to Ireland. The seizure is considered one of the most important yet effected, and is expected to lead to further revelations respecting the shipment of weapons to Ireland.

The Communistic Scheme Proposed by Mr. Davitt for the settlement of the land question in Ireland is opposed by Mr. Parnell, who said publicly: "We have no hope whatever that this government, or any government likely to be in our time, will advance money for the purpose of carrying out the nationalization scheme. The conversion of any tenant into an owner is, according to the views of the nationalization party, a step in the wrong direction—a step which will have to be retraced hereafter. If their views are to obtain we therefore should incur the imputation of not knowing our own minds if, after two years of successful agitation toward an occupying proprietary, we start an entirely different theory; for those in favor of nationalization cannot consistently support an extension of the occupying proprietary. I recognize to the fullest extent the right of anybody to formulate his own opinions and to influence the people to follow him in the direction of those opinions, but having regard to all the circumstances of the case—the great risk of a division in America and of the serious evils which have always attended a division in the ranks of our people—I cannot view the step lately taken in formulating this new plan as one likely to be justified by successful results."

General Ignatieff, the Chancellor of the Russian Empire, has resigned. He has been chiefly responsible for the movement which issued in the persecution of the Russian Jews. In an interview with a newspaper correspondent he said that his hope had been to give Russia forty million new landowners, but in order to do that he had to rid the country of Jews. He believed that the cause of the Czar's coldness toward him, which had led to his resignation, was due to the efforts of the Jews and other classes of society in Russia whom his policy had offended. General Ignatieff is not the first statesman who has fallen through his effort to rid their country of Jews. Haman made the attempt in Persia many years before Ignatieff, and he lost his life as well as his office.

Prince Bismarck has Suffered a Severe Defeat in the German Reichstag. He proposed that the government should be intrusted with a monopoly of the manufacture and trade in tobacco. Bismarck did not intend that the government should actually engage in the trade, but should regulate it in all its stages from the growth until it reached the consumer's hands and to fix the prices. The Liberal party, led by Herr Richter, vigorously opposed the measure, and criticized Bismarck's domineering and despotic policy. The bill was rejected on June 14th by a vote of 276 to 43.

An Anti-Jewish Outbreak is Anticipated in Roumania, which is largely under Russian influence. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald cables that Mr. Lawrence Oliphant, who recently arrived there from Jassy, states that although no violent outbreak has as yet occurred in Roumania, the entire Jewish population is in hourly dread lest the outrages which spread like a contagion from Balta to Bessarabia shall in turn extend to Roumania, where, within the past few weeks, the Jews have been deprived of almost all their civil rights—where they cannot hold land, nor pursue their trades or ordinary occupations, nor even peddle their wares in the street, and where life has become intolerable. There are over two hundred and sixty-five thousand Jews in Roumania, and Mr. Oliphant believes that over two hundred thousand of them will emigrate. Sentiment and reverence for the traditions of their race draw them to Palestine rather than toward America.

A Baronetcy has been Offered to Mr. J. G. Richardson, the vice-president in England of the United Kingdom Alliance, the society for advocating prohibition. The offer was made in handsome terms by Mr. Gladstone, and this letter and Mr. Richardson's reply have been made public. Mr. Richardson declines the proffered distinction, while expressing himself as grateful for the offer. He observes: "You are aware that I belong to the Society of Friends, some of whose members in early days resigned their titles for conscience' sake. I cannot say I feel as strongly as they did in this matter; but I feel as if the acceptance of your offer, on the ground of my having tried to do a little for the benefit of my fellow-men, would detract from the satisfaction I have found in so doing."

The Dancing at the Meetings of the Salvation Army in England has excited considerable discussion, and fears have been expressed lest the Salvation Army methods are leading to wild and indecorous excesses. It appears that the reports which have reached this country have been somewhat exaggerated. A Congregational minister who witnessed the scene thus writes of it: "I am no longer frightened even by a 'salvation dance.' It does look strange to see a number of men clashing hands and leaping up and down with the maddest gesticulations; but when you hear that the are Cardiff colliers or converted pigeon-flyers, you reflect that they are men who must have a physical vent for their feelings; and if Hebrews of old might dance before the ark, why not these? A sailor gave us a salvation hornpipe; but when the honest fellow told what he had been, and how I had been saved, you rejoiced that he should express his gladness even after this style."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are now in the fifth month of their mission in Glasgow. Their work continues to be increasingly blessed to the salvation of many souls. Mr. Sankey says the revival in Glasgow is the talk of Christian people not only in England and Scotland, but all over the world. Besides many of the worst types of drunkards in the city being saved, there is now a movement among the whiskey-sellers themselves, so that three or four of whom are known to have abandoned their business and embraced another occupation. Mr. Moody remarks that "the harvest has just begun in the city, and I believe we shall see a great work this summer." All the meetings continue to be exceedingly well attended. At a meeting in the Circus, the young converts were asked to take their place in the centre, and it was estimated that there were six hundred persons present in the arena for the fruits of the mission. A good work is going on also in several districts of the city, the ministrations of all denominations aiding in the movement. It is announced that the evangelists will visit Paisley before they return to this country, and will hold meetings among the English and American residents.

Father Gavazzi, the well known Italian patriot and orator, although 74 years of age, is once more in London pleading the cause of the Free Church of Italy. Speaking on June 1st at Dr. Donald Fraser's church, Father Gavazzi remarked that when a student more than half a century ago, there was but one foreign theological college in Rome. Now there are English, Scotch, French, and American colleges representative of different religious denominations. The college of which he was president was under the windows of the Vatican itself, and while he sat at his desk writing against the power of the pope, he could see Pope Leo himself, with the beautiful Italian hills in the background.

Rev. R. W. McAll's Stations in France according to his tenth yearly report, are in number 56, comprising, however, more than ten thousand separate places. More than half of them are in Paris and its suburbs, the rest being more than a dozen principal provincial towns.

Lord Shaftesbury in the Course of a Speech in London recently said: "When I was in Paris at the Exhibition, I saw a non-commissioned officer of the French army take up a Bible from one of the stalls, look at it, put it down, and walk away. He returned three times and did the same. I then went up to him and said, 'You seem to have taken a great liking to that book; would you like to have it?' The man answered, 'Yes, but I cannot afford it.' The book was given to him, and he walked away. Somebody who was standing by told him that it was the President of the Bible Society who had made him the present, and the man came back and said, 'My Lord, I know you gave me that book, not solely for myself, but you intended that it should be used for the benefit of others, and I faithfully promise that this book shall be read in barracks to all my comrades.'"

The Soot in the Chimney of the Royal Mint in Berlin has been analyzed and found to contain gold. During some alterations to the building recently made, a flue was pulled down and inside large cakes of soot were seen. This flue had served for many years as an outlet for the smoke given off by the furnaces in which the bullion undergoes fusion before its conversion into coinage; but it occurred to the architect superintending the repairs in question that it might be worth while to analyze the soot in the chimney. Its results were the yield of four pounds weight of pure gold, valued at about $1000.

Prof. S. F. B. MORSE and Mr. CYRUS W. FIELD—Scenes in Electric Telegraph Operations.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH AND THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

Frontispiece Explained—Eulogy of Mr. Field and Mr. Morse by Rev. Dr. Adams—The First Telegraphic Message.

THE grievous and oppressive influence of monopolies, which is one of the most intolerable burdens under which the citizens of this great republic are at this period suffering, should not blind us to the fact that the monopolies are based on a distinct and valuable service rendered. In that fact their power consists. They hold and control the source of a supply which has become a necessity of civilized life. The world a century ago managed to exist without the telegraph and railroad communication, and the people were just as happy without those blessings as we are with them. But we having enjoyed the advantages and having accustomed ourselves to rely upon them, would feel it a grievous misfortune if they were now withdrawn from us. We even resent the exercise of the controlling power which limits our use of them. Without saying a word in defence of the methods Mr. Cyrus Field and his friends have adopted to build up enormous fortunes on the proceeds of their enterprises, or justifying selfishness and greed in any one of the speculators, we should be doing injustice if we closed our eyes to the fact that the Atlantic cable and the development of the railroad system are distinct advantages, and that they are due to the energy and enterprise of these men. Although the blessings have not come to us unalloyed, their benefits must not be forgotten, because they have been used in a spirit alien to that which we believe to be the spirit of religion and patriotism.

Our frontispiece picture this week gives the portraits of Professor Morse and Mr. Cyrus Field, the two men to whom more than to any others we owe the benefits of the present high development and application of electric telegraphy. The five scenes illustrative of the art of modern telegraphy, as employed in the daily business of life are self explanatory. The first represents a messenger delivering a telegram to a business man. The second portrays the receipt of a message of woe, perhaps of death, which has been flashed along the wire, carrying with it desolation to the heart. The third scene depicts the inside of an office, whence telegraphic messages are despatched by the general public. The next stage is when it is taken in charge by an "operator," as shown in the next panel, and by skilful manipulation is started on its journey, and the right-hand section of the lower portion of our frontispiece represents a department in a central telegraph station.

What would have been deemed nothing short of an impossibility, even so late, comparatively speaking, as a century ago, can now be reckoned among the familiar facts of to-day; and enjoying as we do the magnificent results of submarine telegraphy a little thought may be bestowed upon the two men to whom we owe under God the benefit we enjoy.

DR. ADAMS ON MR. FIELD AND MR. MORSE.

The Rev. Dr. Adams, of whose church both gentlemen were members, spoke on a memorable occasion of the spirit in which the enterprise of laying the Atlantic cable was conceived and executed. He said: "I speak of Mr. Field and Professor Morse because of my special intimacy with them as their pastor. Never did they fail, at every stage of their proceedings, at the beginning of every voyage, to implore the aid of Him 'who holdeth the waters in the hollow of His hand,' and who hath made 'whatever passeth through the paths of the sea.'" The motto of Mr. Field's coat of arms "Sans Dieu Rien" was therefore no unmeaning phrase.

In the execution of the project too there was humble acknowledgment of dependence on the divine will, for Captain Hudson, devout as he was gallant, after the cable had been drawn to its anchorage on shore, surrounded by his crew with uncovered heads, fell upon his knees and gave thanks to God for His gracious favor, and for the new power thus born into the world.

flashed under the waters of the great ocean still further bore witness to the fact that to God alone was due the glory of the success achieved. It read, "America and Europe are united by telegraph. Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men."

PROFESSOR S. F. B. MORSE.

Birth and Early Life—Studies under Benjamin West—Elected Professor in N. Y. University—Studies with Prof. Dana—Experiments in Electro-Magnetism—The Missing Link—The First Telegraph Half a Mile Long—Application to Congress—The Line from Washington to Baltimore—Foreign Honors—Honors from his Fellow-Citizens.

THE Morse family was of English origin, for there was one Anthony Morse, born at Marlborough, in May, 1606, who came to America in 1635, and settled in Newbury, Mass. He left behind him the memory of having been a man of courage, enterprise, and integrity. The father of Professor Finley Morse, was one of the leading American theologians of the present century. He was also the author of the well-known book, "American Geography," which ever since its publication has been identified with his name. He was a man of great vigor and intellectual ability, and was regarded both at home and abroad as of distinguished genius, and one of the foremost men of his country and his time. The mother of Finley was Elizabeth Ann Breeze, a grand-daughter of Dr. Samuel Finley, the eminent President of Princeton College. She was a woman of very superior character, calm, judicious, cautious, and reflecting. Her home was made attractive by her cordial, dignified, graceful manners and ability, and the bright animation of her conversational powers.

Their son, whom they named Samuel Finley Breeze, was born April 27th, 1791. He early gave evidence of magnificent mental gifts, and when he graduated at Yale College in 1810, it was with high honor. He selected the career of an artist as the one most congenial to his tastes, and in 1811 he went to England to study under the great American painter, Benjamin West. There he soon made his mark, and we find from the records of the Adelphi Society of Arts that a gold medal was awarded to him for an original model of "a dying Hercules," which appears to have been his earliest effort in sculpture.

He returned to America in 1815, and practised his art in Boston, Mass., in Charleston, S. C., and finally, in 1822, he settled in New York. His fame for learning as well as for skill in his profession spread rapidly. In 1830 he paid another visit to Europe, and while staying there he received the intelligence that he had been elected Professor of the Literature of the Arts of Design by the University of New York. He accepted the position and commenced his duties on his return.

His position in the university caused the formation of a close friendship between himself and Professor J. Freeman Dana, which led to important results. The two professors became deeply interested in the study of electro-magnetism, and a series of experiments they conducted together led to the discovery of the effects of the magnetic coil. Professor Morse soon afterward paid another visit to Europe, and while in Paris he heard of the recent discovery that the magnetic spark could be obtained from the magnet. This intelligence supplied the link needed in the experiments of himself and Professor Dana, and like a brilliant flash there entered Professor Morse's mind the conception of a means by which the joint discoveries might be rendered of valuable service to the world. From this conception sprang the electric telegraph as it is now in operation.

During his voyage home he spent his time in making drawings illustrating his idea. These drawings, which were made in 1835 and are still preserved, prove conclusively that Professor Morse was the actual and original inventor of the telegraphic system. On his arrival in New York he proceeded to put his theory into practice, and in November, 1835, a few chosen friends assembled in Professor Morse's rooms by his invitation. There they witnessed for the first time an electric telegraph in operation. Professor Morse had suspended around his room half a mile of wire coiled around the walls, and he was able to give practical proof of what could be done.

Before the discovery could be utilized however capital was needed, and this Professor Morse did not possess. Having registered his patent he applied for aid to Congress. He had the usual experience which falls to the lot of inventors and discoverers in their dealings with political bodies. His application was overlooked, forgotten, sneered at, and ridiculed until the Session of 1842-3, when there seemed some prospect of its being considered. Professor Morse hung about the legislative doors day by day in the heart sickness of hope deferred. At length March 3rd arrived, and in a few hours the twenty-seventh Congress would be extinct. Professor Morse waited in hope until after sunset, and then went to his home weary and disappointed, for the appropriation had not been made. The next morning, March 4th, to his intense delight he learned that a few minutes before midnight, just as that Congress had the last opportunity of immortalizing itself, an appropriation of $30,000 had been voted for him. With this sum the first line of wire was put up. It was stretched between Washington and Baltimore, Md., and early in 1844 it was in working order.

Honors now flowed in a steady stream on Professor Morse. As the value of his discovery and its application was appreciated and publicly declared the professor was lauded. Yale, his alma mater, made him an LL.D. Foreign potentates conferred upon him decorations and dignities. They came from the Sultan of Turkey, the King of Prussia, the King of Wurtemberg, the Emperor of Austria, the Queen of Spain, the King of Italy, and the King of Portugal. Great Britain gave a banquet in his honor in London, and in this country his fellow-citizens in various important centres followed the example, and no less than one hundred of these entertainments were given.

In 1856 the representatives of the great nations of Europe, at the suggestion of Napoleon III., started a general movement throughout Europe to do honor to Professor Morse, and in a very brief period a testimonial of $80,000 was collected and presented to him. In June, 1871, a statue in his honor was placed in Central Park, New York, and it was unveiled amid the plaudits of his fellow-citizens with appropriate ceremonies by his friend, William Cullen Bryant.

Dr. S. Irenæus Prime says of Professor Morse that wherever he went he was always careful to identify himself with the religious community. "His first public profession of religion," says Dr. Prime, "was made when he was quite a young man on his being admitted to his father's church at Charlestown, Mass., and there he became superintendent of the Sabbath-school, one of the first established in the country. When he removed to New Haven he joined the first Congregational Church in that city. But when he finally settled in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., he again united with the Presbyterian Church."

Rev. Dr. Wheeler, his pastor at Poughkeepsie, was Professor Morse's intimate friend. He relates that visiting him on one occasion, "I made allusion to the honors thickening upon him. A significant smile stole over his face and he said very gently, 'It is all of God; He has used me as His hand in all this. O you cannot tell how thankful I have been this morning in thinking over this matter of the telegraph that God has permitted me to do something for the help and comfort of my fellows. I have just heard of a family made happy by a telegraphic despatch from one of its absent members announcing his safety when the whole household was in grief over his supposed death. Only think of the many homes that may be thus gladdened, relieved from solicitude and pain.' Thus his thoughts were ever turned to the benefits others derived from his invention and to God who had permitted him to be useful."

Professor Morse lived to a good old age and witnessed the development and extension of his discoveries. He died April 2d, 1872, in his eighty-first year. His death was described as being like the setting of a summer's sun, over which shade gracefully gathered and enfolded. It came to one who more than any other man had given to the telegraph national greatness, and triphibant power, and by an almost ideal life of heroic honor, intense vigor, and intellectual brilliancy, had placed the telegraph among the great industries of the world.

MR. CYRUS WEST FIELD.

Eth and Family—The Inauguration of the Cable Enterprise—Failures of Eleven Years—Final Triumph—The Cable's Silver Wedding Celebration.

MR. CYRUS WEST FIELD, who was so intimately connected with the origin and progress and success of the work of laying the Atlantic Cable was born at Stockbridge, Mass., November 30th, 1819, and is now sixty-three years of age. His father was the Rev. David Dudley Field, a clergyman of eminence, a citizen of Stockbridge, Mass., and who died there in 1867 at the age of eighty-six. Cyrus was the third son of the family. The fourth son, Henry M. Field, a clergyman like his father, is now editor of a religious journal in New York. He received his early education in his native town, and subsequently became a clerk in New York. In the course of a few years he had so prospered that he became the proprietor of a large mercantile establishment. In 1854, he was induced to turn his attention to the subject of Ocean Telegraphy, and was instrumental in procuring a charter from the legislature of Newfoundland, granting the exclusive right for fifty years to use a telegraph from New York to that colony, and thence to Europe. We are now so familiar with the use of the telegraph across the ocean, that they are apt to forget, perhaps, how recent a thing it is. It is only twenty-eight years ago that the project was first conceived.

ATTEMPTS TO SPAN THE OCEAN.

On March 10th, 1854, the commencement of what is known as "deep sea telegraphy" took place. On that day was signed the agreement to organize the New York and Newfoundland Telegraphic Company, the object of which was to establish a line of telegraphic communication between America and Newfoundland. The company was organized in Mr. Cyrus Field's house in Gramercy Park, New York, and it was composed of six individuals: Peter Cooper, Mr. Moses Taylor, Mr. Cyrus West Field, Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, Mr. Chandler White, and Wilson G. Hunt. Mr. David Dudley Field, Mr. Cyrus Field's eldest brother, was present as the legal adviser of the Company, and afterward went to St. John's, to obtain the charter.

Some small efforts had been previously attempted in Europe to transmit messages under water, first across the river Rhine at half a mile in width, and then across the British Channel. This American company, however, was the first to propose to span the ocean. As soon as the line had been completed between New York and Newfoundland, Mr. Cyrus Field went to London, and in 1856 he was successful in organizing the Atlantic Telegraphic Company. The first attempt to lay the cable was made in 1857, but the ships had sailed farther than 300 miles from the coast of Ireland when the cable broke and the expedition had to turn.

FAILURES FOLLOWED BY SUCCESS.

The following year the attempt was renewed. The British Government supplied a war vessel, the Agamemnon, and the United States Government a splendid frigate, "The Niagara," for the enterprise. It was agreed that the two vessels should meet in mid-Atlantic, each carrying one end of the cable. They were then to be joined, and the splice being lowered, the English vessel was to sail for England and the Niagara for America, the vessel paying out the cable as she proceeded. Before the two vessels had reached mid-ocean, a storm arose, and the English "Agamemnon" made a narrow escape from foundering. When at last the cable was joined on July 29th, 1858, it was broken several times in the attempts made to lay it, and again the expedition returned to England in despair. One more effort was resolved upon, and it was successful, for the cable was stretched from shore to shore, and messages were exchanged between Europe and America. For only three weeks, however, could the cable be used, and not until eight years after, in 1866, when two new cables had been manufactured, one of which after being laid out 1200 miles was broken in mid-ocean but was afterward "fished" up and carried to the shore of Newfoundland, was success achieved.

It is needless to say that in all these efforts, at which a glance only has been taken, Mr. Cyrus Field took a prominent part. It is admitted by all competent authorities that the success which crowned the work at last was in a great measure due to his unflagging energy. It has been stated that while the plan was in progress he crossed the Atlantic more than fifty times. Congress gave him a gold medal in commemoration of his successful enterprise, and he also received the Grand Medal at the Paris Exhibition.

Another of Mr. Field's successful projects is the elevated railroad of New York. The high-handed manner in which the three companies have carried matters in the city, their disregard of private rights, and lastly the scandals recently investigated at Albany have given this enterprise a bad odor in the city, but the extent to which the lines are used shows that they are considered by the public a certain convenience.

Perhaps no scene in Mr. Field's life will better display the esteem in which he was held by his friends than one which took place about three years ago.

THE SILVER WEDDING.

On March 10th, 1879, Mr. Cyrus Field issued invitations to a large number of gentlemen to a reception at his house, to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the day on which it had been resolved to lay down the cable. At a quarter past ten the guests took their places in the dining-room where the original compact was formed, and their host thus addressed them: "Neighbors and friends—Twenty-five years ago this evening, in this house, in this room, and on this table, and at this very hour, was signed an agreement to form the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraphic Company—the first company ever formed to lay an ocean cable. It was signed by five persons, four of whom are here to-night. Of my associates it is to be said to their honor, as might have been expected from men of their high position and character, that they stood by the undertaking manfully for twelve long years, through discouragements such as nobody knows but themselves.

Few know the struggles by which success was at length obtained. One disappointment followed another, till 'hope deferred made the heart sick.' We had little help from outside; very few had any faith in our enterprise, but not a man deserted the ship, all stood by it to the end.

"Our company came into existence only a few weeks before the Western Telegraphic Company, which is entitled to share in our congratulations, and has kindly brought a connecting wire into this room, by which we can this evening communicate with every town and village from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and by our sea cables with Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, New Zealand, the West Indies, and South America.

THE WORK OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS.

"Twenty-five years ago there was not an ocean telegraph in the world. A few short lines had been laid across the Channel from England to the Continent, but all were in shallow water. Even science hardly dared to conceive the possibility of sending human intelligence through the abysses of the ocean. But when we struck out to cross the Atlantic, we had to lay a cable over 2000 miles long, in water over two miles deep. That great success gave an immense impulse to submarine telegraphy, then in its infancy, but which has since grown till it has stretched out its fingers tipped with fire into all the waters of the globe. Its lines have gone into all the earth, and its words into the end of the world."

"To-day here are over 70,000 miles of cable crossing the seas and the oceans, and as if it were not enough to have messages sent with the speed of the lightning, they can be sent in opposite directions at the same moment. I have just received a telegram from Valentia, Ireland, which reads: 'This anniversary witnesses duplex working across the Atlantic, as an accomplished fact—by which the capacity of all our ocean cables is doubled.'

"Who can measure the effect of this swift intelligence passing to and fro? Already it regulates the markets of the world; but better still is the new relation into which it brings the different kindreds of mankind. Nations are made enemies by their ignorance of each other. A better acquaintance leads to a better understanding; the sense of nearness, the relation of neighborhood, awakens the feelings of brotherhood. Is it not a sign that a better age is coming when along the ocean beds strewn with the wrecks of war now glide the messages of peace?"

Mr. Field, in conclusion, said: "But life is passing, and perhaps the completing the circuit of the globe is to be left to other hands. Many of our old companions have fallen, and we must soon give place to our successors. But though we shall pass away, it is a satisfaction to have been able to do something that shall remain when we are gone."

THE ORIGIN OF THE CABLE

It is said to have been as follows: While visiting the house of a friend Mr. Field being left alone for a few minutes, sat abstractedly turning around a terrestrial globe which happened to be in the room. It was while doing this that the grand idea occurred to him of a world girdled with electric wire, and of the benefits which would accrue especially from a line under the Atlantic Ocean. His next step was to consult such men as Professor Morse and Lieutenant Maury. When completed, as has already been described, the first message flashed through the cable was, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men."

Copies of Three Letters, all bearing the same date (May 27th), are published in the columns of a New York journal. The first was written by a Brooklyn city missionary to some Christian friends asking them to unite with him in prayer for the Lord's help to enable him to defray certain expenses amounting to fifty dollars, connected with his work. The second letter was from a friend of the missionary requesting him to call at his house that day. The missionary did not receive that letter, but being in the locality of his friend's house, he called and learned of the request sent to him. There he received the third of the letters now published, and which was also written on May 27th. In this last a cheque for fifty dollars was enclosed, with a request that it should be used in the very way that the missionary was then considering.

A Terrible Story of Starvation comes from Patrick County, Va. A courier arrived at Danville on June 11th from Patrick County, who gave a terrible account of the sufferings of the people there, and reported that not less than 5000 men, women, and children were actually starving, some already dead and others dying for want of food. This deplorable state of affairs was brought about by the total failure of the crops in that county last summer, and, while the people have been sorely pressed for many months, it is only within the last two months that their meagre supplies have been absolutely exhausted and themselves brought to starvation. Patrick County is situated in one of the most mountainous and inaccessible regions in the State, the nearest railroad station being forty-five miles distant. People of means have contributed liberally to the sufferers, but supplies are exhausted, flour not being obtainable at $200 per barrel. Several wagon-loads of food were sent from Danville, and travelled constantly until the starving people were met. On Friday the first wagon-load of shelled corn went to the county from the vicinity of this place. The people along the roads heard of its coming, and as soon as it entered the county, men, women, and children crouched around it and fought ravenously for every grain of corn they could get, which they ate greedily without waiting to cook it. Wagon-loads of meal and other supplies have also been sent from Richmond.

FLOCKS AT THE WELL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
June 25th, 1882.

"We cannot, till all the flocks are gathered together and till the stone be rolled from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."—GENESIS 29:8.

A SCENE in Mesopotamia beautifully pastoral. A well of water very valuable in that dry region. The fields all around about white with three flocks of sheep come to the water. Other flocks approaching from a distance. Jacob, abroad on the interesting errand of looking for a wife, comes to the well. A shepherdess comes to the same well. I see her approaching, followed by a large flock of her father's sheep. It was

A MEMORABLE MEETING.

Jacob married that shepherdess. The Bible account of it is: "Jacob kissed Rachel and lifted up his voice and wept." It has always been a mystery to me what he found to cry about.

But before that scene, Jacob had accosted the shepherds and asked them why they did not immediately proceed to the watering of the flocks, when the shepherds practically responded: "We are all good neighbors and as a matter of common courtesy we wait until all the sheep of the neighborhood come up; beside that, there is a very heavy stone on the mouth of the well, and we have to put all our shoulders against it and push it away; then the troughs and the buckets and the pitchers are filled with water and the sheep are satisfied. We cannot till all the flocks are gathered together, and until the stone be rolled away from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."

A THIRSTY WORLD.

Hot for the head, parching for the tongue, blistering for the feet. What the world wants is a cool, refreshing, all-satisfying draught. We wander up and down and we find all the cisterns empty. The drought of sin has dried up all the world's fountains; but nineteen centuries ago, a shepherd with crook in the shape of a cross, and with feet cut to the bleeding, explored the desert passages of this world, and came across a well a thousand feet deep, bubbling, bright, and opalescent, and He looked to the north and He looked to the south, and He looked to the east, and He looked to the west, and with a voice strong and musical ringing through the ages, He cried out, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters."

Now, a great flock of the Lord's sheep this morning gather at the well of salvation, and we wonder why all nations do not gather at it, and while we are wondering, desiring an explanation, the text breaks forth into an explanation and says: "We cannot till all the flocks be gathered together and till the stone be rolled from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."

If a herd of swine come to a well they jostle each other; if a herd of cattle come to a well, they hook each other back; but a flock of sheep coming to a well though a hundred be disappointed there is only an expression by sad bleating, there is no war, no contest. And it was intended that all the flocks of God gathering around the well of salvation should come in peace and come in quiet, and with a desire to have all the flocks together before they water the sheep.

I know some people do not like a crowd. They do not like to be jostled, they become impatient if they are at all surrounded by multitudes who are seeking the same well. Ah, that is not the Christian spirit. These Oriental shepherds of whom I have been speaking wanted all the sheep to come, and the more that came the better they were pleased, and they waited until all the flocks came before they watered the sheep. So we are to go out and ask the people to come in—not only as far as possible make them comfortable when they are here, but compel them to come in.

Go out into the highways and the hedges. Go to the rich and tell them they are indigent without Christ. Go to the poor and tell them of the everlasting dividends that this Gospel proclaims and declares. Go to the blind and tell them of the touch that gives celestial illumination. Go to the crippled and tell them of that grace which makes the lame man leap as a hart.

Gather all the sheep off of all the mountains. None so torn of the dogs, none so worried, none so sick, none so dying, but they shall be welcome. Let them all come in. Let there be a great flock around the well. All Brooklyn in a flock, all New York in a flock, all London in a flock, all nations in a flock. This well deep enough and rich enough to supply all the thirst of the world—rich enough to put out the burning thirst of the fourteen hundred millions of the race. Let them all come. Come, white and black. Come, red men of the forest. Come, Laplander out of the snow. Come, Patagonian out of the heat. Come in furs. Come sweltering under palm leaves. Come one. Come all. Come now.

As at the well of Mesopotamia Jacob and Rachel were betrothed, so this morning, at this well of salvation, the great Shepherd comes forth and stretches out His hand toward your immortal soul in pledge of everlasting affection, while all Heaven breaks forth in the cry: "Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him."

But I have noticed as you have noticed in this text, that there was on the mouth of the well which must be removed before these shepherds could water the sheep. And it is now just so. There are impediments and obstacles in the way which must be put out of the way or you will never get up to the bright and cool and sparkling water of which if a man drink he never again shall thirst. In some of your cases it is pride of heart. You do not believe in such a democratic religion. If you could come to the well all alone you would like to come, but you cannot have so many publicans and sinners coming with you, so many people of all kinds of character, and everybody on earth invited to come. You do not want to be in such a crowd.

It is as though you were thirsty and you were called to go to slake your thirst at the town pump instead of sitting down in a parlor, sipping cool water from a chaste chalice just lifted from a silver salver. You are willing to go to heaven, but you want a select car, your feet on Turkish ottoman and a band of music on board the train. I tell you plainly you will never get to the well of salvation in that way. The chief obstacle in your way is pride of heart. If you ever get up to this well of salvation and get your thirst slaked, you will have to come as we came when we cried out: "O! Lord Jesus, I am dying of thirst, give me the water of life; give it in trough or goblet, I care not; I am dying without it; give me Christ." When you have that intensity of earnestness and you are willing to throw your pride of heart away, then the Shepherd will water the sheep.

In other of your cases I think it is an obdurate and

AN UNGRATEFUL HEART.

Some of you, I suppose, this morning, have no more feeling on this subject than if God had to do to you His first kindness, and you had yet to do to God your first wrong. You have been seated on His lap all these years, the arms of His everlasting love about you, and some of you have not felt one heart throb of gratitude. I must say of some of you as Daniel said to Belshazzar, "the God in whose hand thy breath is thou hast not glorified."

If you had maltreated any earthly friend as you have maltreated God you would make five hundred apologies; your whole life would be an apology. Seated morning, noon, and night at his table—spring, summer, autumn, and winter appropriately apparelled, have you one heart throb of gratitude to the God who made you, and the Christ who deemed you and the Holy Ghost who has been these years importuning you? Your life from Him, your health from Him, your companion from Him, your children from Him, all your bright roundings in this world from Him, yet no gratitude.

O! methinks if you could this morning, about five minutes come and sit down under tree of a Saviour's martyrdom, and feel His life dripping on your brow and cheek and hair you would be awakened to a sense of gratitude to a crucified Lord.

"Heart of stone, relent, relent,
Touched by Jesus' cross subdued,
See his body mangled, rent,
Covered with the gore of blood.
Sinful soul, what hast thou done?
Crucified the Eternal One."

Ah! that heavy stone of an obdurate heart may be hurled away, or you will never get to the well of salvation.

But I have noticed that Jacob and his friends came up to this well, and I have no doubt from habits of those times, they moved this great stone away from the well's mouth, and then they watered the sheep. And I believe that God by His gracious Spirit blessing the word I have already uttered has removed the impediment and obstacle in some cases from the heart. Yea, I am going to take it for granted that the work has been done, and now like the Oriental shepherd I am going to water the sheep. Come all ye thirsty.

Some of you have down in your soul

AN UNDEFINED LONGING.

You tried money making; it did not satisfy you. You tried office under government; it did not satisfy you. You tried pictures and sculpture works of art did not satisfy you. You tried social position; it did not satisfy you. You tried the applause of the world; it did not satisfy you. Unhappy you are about the past. Unhappy you are about the present. Unhappy you are about the future. Some of you feel perhaps almost as much perturbed as the French author, who sat down and wrote: "At four o'clock this morning, I put an end to my earthly existence. I can end this struggle of life no longer, but until that I must toil on for the subsistence of my family. He kept on writing until the clock struck 1. Then he went out and with his own hand ended his earthly existence. There are some of you unhappy as he, as discontented as he, as worn out as he, as gone as he.

The fact is the world cannot satisfy you; there is a Gospel which comes out and offers to the most unfortunate man that ever lived so much more than this world as is best for him, and throws He into the bargain. The riches of Croesus and Rothschilds are a poor miserable shilling as compared with the affluence of grace offered this to all the people. History tell us of a King, once a year used to get into a scales while on the other side the scales gold and silver and precious stones were placed, and they kept on putting treasure on the opposite side the scales until the scales balanced. So Christ this day steps into the balance and on the other side the scales He puts all the riches of the universe, all height, all depth, all length, all breadth. Then He says, "a ha! this is yours?" No. "Three quarters of it is yours?" No. "All are yours—all, all!"

O! the magnificence of this grace, the grandeur of these promises. I do not wonder when was dying, after living a life of great usefulness and eminence in the kingdom of God, a theological student stood by his bedside, he asked the theological student to give him some comfort appropriate to a dying man. The theological student said to him: "I cannot; you know all the story better than I do; you have preached the promises a great while, and I think it would be impertinence for me to try to instruct you." "Well," said the aged minister to the young theological student, "quote some of the promises. The young man began to quote the promises, after a while came to this one: 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'" me," said the old minister, "that's the promise come. Stop there, that's the promise: The word of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." O! grandeur, the glory, the infinity of the promises Christ's grace.

Others of you come to the well to-day, with a many troubles. Have any of you escaped? Him stand up. Not one.

TROUBLE, TROUBLE, TROUBLE.

We should gather up all the griefs and all the woes and all the annoyances and all the bereavements of this entire audience and put them in one well, neither man nor angel could endure the well. Take your opinion of life at fifteen years of age and your opinion of life at forty, or fifty, or sixty, or seventy years of age. O! what a contrast of opinion. Were you right then, or are you right now? Two cups put in your hands—a sweet and a sour cup, a cup of joy and a cup of grief. Out of which have you taken the most frequently? Which has been nearer full?

VISITS TO GREENWOOD.

De Greenwood was to you a magnificent city improvement. You went out there perhaps on a pleasure excursion, with laughter you ran up a hill and with a light heart you criticised an epitaph on a tombstone. No more of that for you the day when the bell tolled as the procession went in, then came out with one less than it went in with. Now you cannot think of that but with an emotion that suffuses the eye and breaks the heart.

Some of you have gone through enough trouble to fill you. It is a wonder your nervous system has not been shattered, or your mind has not reeled in the throne. God only knows how you got through with it. Now what do you want? Do you want your property back again? "O! no," you say. "I was getting worldly and arrogant; success would have destroyed my soul; as a Christian man I would not dare to ask for my property back again."

Would you have your friends, your kindred brought back? You halt a moment. You think how many accounts you would like to have in back, but you say: "I dare not, I do not like to take the responsibility of bringing them in an everlasting realm to a realm of tears. I would not dare take the responsibility. Beside, my children that are gone ahead are safe, and if I died leaving them in this world, I would not know what would become of them; they would have their cares and annoyances and anxieties and temptations, so you see, I think it is best as it is. I would not like to take responsibility of bringing them back."

Well, then, how would you like to have it? What do you want? A thousand voices seem to be up, saying: "Comfort!"

"GIVE US COMFORT."

You shall have it. Drive all your flocks of cares and annoyances and bereavements right up to this well. The stone is rolled away from the well's mouth, and we are watering the sheep. To some aged man: "You can't talk to me about these things; you are not old yet and you don't know what an old man's sorrows are, an old man's loneliness, an old man's grief at the loss of his friends, and an old man's neglects." Well, father, though I am not old I have been much with old people. I was myself the child of old people. I know all about old people. I know their sorrows, I know their losses, I know their ailments, I know how to talk to them. I give you my arm, I take your arm, and I help you up to this well.

I never shall forget the cry of the late Rev. Dr. Witt, of New York, as he stood at the grave of his wife. After the body had been lowered to its resting place, that venerable man of God leaned over the open space and said: "Farewell, my beloved, faithful, beloved wife. The bond that binds us is severed, thou art in glory, I am still on earth, but we shall meet again. Farewell, farewell!" O! it is hard after a journey of fifty or sixty years together to part—after so long a time depending over the same cradles and weeping over the same graves, to part. There is some old soul in the house to-day feeling that heart break. Come, take my arm. Come up to-day to the well of life, this well of consolation, this deep, inexhaustible well of God. Sit down, father and mother, sit down on the curbstone of the well.

Come, David the Psalmist,

HAVE YOU ANYTHING TO SAY

to these old people? "Yes," says David the Psalmist; "they shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing to show that the Lord is upright; He is my rock and there is no unrighteousness in Him." Come, Isaiah, the prophet, have you anything out of your prophecies for these old people? "Yes," says Isaiah; "down to old age I am with thee and to hoary hairs will I carry thee." Well, I do not see much use in your fretting about your failing eyesight, or your failing limbs if the Lord is going to carry you.

But you say, "I am so afraid I'll come to want." Perhaps your children or your grandchildren talk sharp to you and are very unsympathetic with the ailments of old age; but the Lord will not talk sharp to you. You really think you will come to want? Why, who do you think the Lord is? Are His granaries empty? Does He care for the raven and the rabbit and the lion? And will He forget His children? Naturalists tell us that the porpoise cares for its wounded and sick mate. Shall it be told that the fish of the sea have more sympathy than the Lord God of Heaven and of earth?

But you say, "I am so worn out, I am of no more use in the world." Well, I think the Lord ought to know whether you are of any more use in the world or not. He would have taken you before this if you had been of no use in the world. Do you think God will take care of you seventy years and then let you drop out of His hands? Will He bring you across the Atlantic and then let you get shipwrecked in the Narrows? May the Lord God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and of Paul the aged, be your God forever.

But I gather all the promises of the Gospel together. Now, shepherds, drive up your flocks, all your

and anxieties and sorrows and bereavements. Drive them all to this Gospel well. I am going to draw the water for you. I take hold of the rope of the old well sweep and I pull it until the bucket strikes the wave, and then I let it come up sparkling and dripping with the water of which your souls are to drink. Here it is: "Blessed is the man whom the Lord correcteth." "Though He cause grief yet will He remember compassion." "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

I want you all to come up to this well. There is a shrinking soul, a timid soul, that hides away from these promises as a child with a sore hand hides away from the doctor afraid to have him touch it, and the mother has to compel the little patient to come up in the presence of the physician. Just so I take your timid soul to-day, and I compel it to come up into the presence of Christ, the great Physician. He will not hurt you. He has healed a thousand wounds. He stands before you with gentle yet omnipotent medicament. But the trouble is that people when they have misfortune and trial go everywhere but to God.

De Quincey went to opium to get rid of his troubles. Charles Lamb went to punch. Theodore Hook went to something stronger. Edwin Forrest went to theatrical dissipation. And there have been men going round the earth hoping in the quick transit to get rid of their troubles, and it has been a dead failure every time. There is only one well that can slake the thirst of a soul in trouble, a soul in darkness. It is the deep, bubbling, inexhaustible, everlasting well of God's consolation.

"Ah!" says some one in the church, "notwithstanding all that you have said, my particular trouble finds no alleviation." Well, I am not through yet. I have to give you the most potent consideration. I am going to soothe you with the thought of Heaven. However talkative a man may be, when the last silence comes upon his lip the most potent and emphatic interrogation can get no response. When that final silence falls upon our lips, there is no power on earth that can break up the reticence or taciturnity. Where then will your soul be, O! Christian? In bliss indescribable.

The spring morning of Heaven waving its blossoms in the air. Victors fresh from battle showing their scars. Rain of earthly sorrow struck through with a rainbow of eternal joy. In one great group God and angels and the redeemed—Paul and Silas, Latimer and Ridley, Isaiah and Jeremiah, Gabriel and Michael the archangel. You among them. Long line of choristers across the hills. Seas of joy dashed to the white beach. Conquerors in triumph and you among them. O what a vast flock shall gather around that deep that celestial well. There Jacob shall recognize Rachel, the shepherdess. No stone on the well's mouth as the shepherd waters the sheep. On one side that well of Heaven, your children; on the other side that well of heaven, your Christian ancestry, and you all bounded by a joy so keen and grand that no other world has ever been permitted to experience it.

Out of that deep well of Heaven, the shepherd dipping up reunion for the parted, health for the sick, riches for the poor, rest for the weary. And then the flocks of God will lie down in all the green pastures, and world without end will bless God that on this warm, suffocating Sabbath morning we were permitted to study the refreshing story of Jacob and the shepherds at the well of Mesopotamia.

A New Religious Institution has been Inaugurated in India. At a missionary meeting held in London on June 5th, Rev. Gogon Chunder Dutt, of India, and a convert from heathenism, stated that education at one of the native colleges in English studies had first destroyed his faith in Hindooism. His idolatry gave place to English infidelity, through reading English infidel literature, but in the year 1857 a severe illness was blessed to his conversion to Christianity. He was now in charge of eighteen schools, for which he had to train teachers; and he had also to train preachers to proclaim the everlasting Gospel to upward of 8,000,000 heathens, among whom he was the only missionary. One remarkable feature of his work was his recent establishment of a Christian fair. Knowing that in India fairs are looked upon as religious institutions, and that the Mohammedans and Hindoos had each their fair, he distributed bills announcing that the 600 Christians of the district would gather together in a field near the village, where pavilions would be built for the shopkeepers. The result was that 30,000 people attended in the week, and to these he and his helpers preached and sang of Jesus Christ by turns from morning to night. Several converts had been made at these fairs.

The Sight of a Lady Preacher in London has been restored through prayer. Miss Parker, who with her brother has been holding meetings every Sunday in a theatre in London, was injured recently by an accidental blow from an umbrella on her eye while getting into a horse car. She consulted Dr. Cronin, a physician residing at Clapham. The doctor held out only a little hope, as the eye was most seriously injured. She resigned herself entirely to the will of God, conscious that if His will was that she should lose her sight He would enable her to bear it. After a few hours her faith was strong that He could restore it for His glory; and she believed that healing power from the Lord was touching the eye, and in the morning she could see a little. She was kept in a darkened room, receiving the greatest care and attention from both Dr. and Mrs. Cronin for some days. On the following Monday night she was again convinced that the healing power was at work on her eyes, and in the morning she could see around the room, and later in the day was able to return home in a hack. She was able to speak twice at the theatre on Sunday evening; though she kept her eyes covered the whole time, not being able to bear the light. She can now see to read and write, but is still weak; though there is much reason to praise the Lord.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Effectual Cure for Fits.—Mr. Valance. himself a reclaimed drunkard, speaking at the Circus said: "I am happy to give a satisfactory account of a man who, till within the last three weeks, had not been sober for the past twelve years. He tried several times to become a teetotaler, but at the end of couple of days or so, he was always seized with a convulsive fit, necessitating the calling in of a doctor. He came with me to one of Mr. Moody's meetings about three weeks ago, and he is now resting on Christ, and since then he has not tasted liquor, neither have any bad physical effects followed his abstinence."

The Prayer on the Bridge at Night.—Mr. Scott observed: "I should like to mention one noted case. A man stopped me as I was going out of the meeting and said, 'Do you remember speaking to me eight years ago?' I said, 'No, I speak to so many.' But, he said, 'you went with me late at night and prayed for me on Stockwell Bridge. I was, however, a very stiff case, and I would not yield.' I then remarked, 'I think I remember something about you.' 'Well,' he went on, 'for eight years I have been serving the devil; but I thought it right to come and tell you that last night I was brought to Christ in the Circus, and I am now going to serve Jesus Christ.'"

The Tell-Tale Bottle.—Dr. Wallace also said: "I read a letter yesterday morning from a woman, who, about the time that Mr. Moody was here before, was one of the most wretched creatures in the city of Glasgow. I first met with her at the Free Breakfast Table, and never saw such a spectacle of woe. She had on a poor, old, faded Paisley shawl, and I said, 'That reminds me of my native place. Are you from Paisley?' The question started memories of her childhood and of her mother. At the mention of the name 'mother,' she started convulsively, and throwing up her arms, a little bottle dropped to the floor and was shivered to pieces. 'That is the cause of my misery,' she exclaimed. That woman now occupies a decent position in Edinburgh, and is a loyal disciple of Christ."

A D.D. at the Pawnshop.—At the Circus, on a recent afternoon, the Rev. Dr. Wallace said: "I was called to go to a little pawnshop the other day and there was a poor broken-hearted looking woman come in with a bundle. She had something wrapped in the leather apron of a shoemaker, and as I was talking to the pawnbroker she said, 'Haste ye, haste ye, man.' She laid down the bundle on the counter and he opened it. What did it contain? Three lasts, awls, pincers, and a hammer. She wanted a shilling upon the things. Putting my hand upon her shoulder, I inquired, 'What's the shilling for?' 'Oh, it is for drink. I will be felled if I don't get the shilling for drink. He is pawning all his implements. Oh, what will we do for bread?' These people deny they are slaves and sing the refrain—'Freedom and whiskey gan tog-ther -tak' aff yer dram.'"

Conversion of a Twenty-Five Years' Infidel.—A well-educated man said, on May 4th: "For twenty-five years I was an infidel. I have even gone the length of forbidding my children to go to places of worship, and not only that, I have used the little education and the little ability God has given me in trying to instil my abhorrent ideas into the minds of others. Since the end of 1875 I have unfortunately been drinking to excess. I have gone so far in my drunken freaks as to pitch pictures, pots, and pans, and furniture out of the window. I should also have thrown myself out, had I not been prevented by my wife. I have ruined my own character, in fact I have left myself with little more than a coat to my back. For years I went about trying to find happiness, but I have never found it until this last week. I have looked for it in the bowling-green, on the racecourse, at the Circus, at the theatre—and there not only as a spectator, but in the green-room among actors and actresses—but all these things have failed. All means have been taken to reform me. My wife has many a time pleaded with me, and said, 'Oh, John, if you would only give up the liquor, I would be everything possible to you as a wife.' One Sunday morning I went into the room where my children were sleeping, and looking at their little innocent faces, I thought to what a wretched pass I had brought matters, and went out of the house as quickly as I could. I walked out with the intention of destroying myself. But something struck me, and for the first time for many years I put my hands up to my head and said, 'God help me.' I wandered about all Sunday from six o'clock in the morning till ten at night, like an evil spirit, and then I went to bed. But the next morning, when the grogshop was opened I was there. I drank all Monday and all Tuesday, but on Tuesday night by some miraculous means I went into the Salvation Army Barracks. I was surrounded by several young men, but they could not make anything of me with my sceptical views. One of these, however, got me to promise that I would return on the following night, saying he would then have something for me; and though I was in a public house on Wednesday night, the promise haunted me, and I returned. The Salvation Army people could not, again, make any progress with me, but one of their number said, 'I am loath to let you go, will you pray?' I got down on my knees, prayer was offered on my behalf, and then I prayed fervently, and God answered my prayer. By His grace I have been able to throw my infidelity overboard and dash the intoxicating cup at my feet; and what is best of all, I have accepted Jesus Christ as my Saviour."

The Charwoman's Allowance.—Mr. Grady said: "A lady had occasion to employ a charwoman, and along with her food she gave her beer. The poor woman got such a liking for it that not only did she take it to 'help' her on with her work but she would even come drunk to the house. The lady remonstrated with her, implored her to give it up, but in vain. In time the woman's conduct grew so outrageous that the lady could no longer employ her. The unfortunate victim fell deeper and deeper into habits of intemperance, and lived a miserable life of dissipation. Shortly before its close this lady happened to be at her bedside, and began to point out how horrible it was to die a drunkard. 'Do you know who it was that taught me to be a drunkard, ma'am?' said the dying woman. The Christian lady answered 'No; but it was cruel.' 'Would you like to know?' said the wretched woman. 'Yes,' answered the unsuspecting lady. 'It was yourself.' The lady's reflections may be better imagined than described."

Converted at the Dinner Table.—Dr. Moxey (of Edinburgh) at one of the meetings, gave an encouraging account of the work in that city since Messrs. Moody and Sankey's last visit there. "A gentleman from England has been led to Christ in a very striking manner. He was sent by the government to Edinburgh to take charge of one of the public offices. He stayed during that time in a well-known Christian hotel. I happened to be at the dinner table with him one day, and a number of Christians present began talking about the Lord's work, and of the joy of working for Christ. The gentleman was sitting at the head of the table, and was the only stranger among us. Presently an Evangelist turned to him and said, 'My friend, are you of the same way of thinking? Have you accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as your Saviour?' He answered, hesitatingly, 'Well, I don't know. I'm afraid I have not.' My friend immediately opened his Bible, and said, 'It is so simple, let me show you.' He spoke to him there and then in this public room of a public hotel, and one of our number bolted the door so that we might not be interrupted, and in a few moments we were all down on our knees praying with this gentleman. He gave his heart to Christ, and is now bearing an admirable testimony to the Lord Jesus."

My Money or Your Life.—Mr. Robertson said: "In Edinburgh a very blessed work is going on. There was a remarkable testimony meeting on Tuesday evening. One man rose and told us the following story. He said: 'Some years ago I lent a man some money, and he became a bankrupt immediately afterward. I saw him and asked him for the money, and he said he could not pay me. I then vowed I would have his life, I carried a knife about with me to murder him. I watched him about for some time, and then left the city in terror of his life. Still I tried to find out where he was. I pictured myself in the Cal Jail with the gallows before me; but still the devil had so completely got possession of me that I solved to have his life. But the Lord met me when Mr. Moody was in Edinburgh, in Free John's Church. A lady spoke kindly to me, and showed me my lost condition. I went away, and two nights afterward I was brought to the Lord. A little while ago I met the wife of the man I vowed to murder. I asked her to go with me. She was very much alarmed—terrified, in fact, and said, 'What do you mean?' I said 'I want to go to the Gospel meeting.' Her thoughts went about her husband, and she said, 'What about that money?' I said, 'Tell your husband I forgive him. The Lord has saved me and pardoned me, and I forgive him the debt.' The woman surprised at the change from a bloodthirsty wretch seeking the life of her husband to a forgiving Christian may be imagined."

SATANIC WONDERS.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Period of the Exercise of Evil Supernaturalism—Current Incredulity Respecting it—Scripture Evidence Concerning It—The Star Fall from Heaven—The Lamb-like Beast, or False Prophet—Latter-day Evil Supernaturalism—Originator and Organizer Identified—I. It will be the Devil—Can the Devil Work Miracles? The Limits of His Power—II. Demons and Agents—Their Twofold Mission—Who, What are Demons?—The Views of the Ancients—Demoniacal Possession—Demons and the Spirits of Wicked Men Deceased—They Seek Reincarnation.

It is admitted by all futurist expositors of unfilled prophecy, who hold to the sound canon of the literal interpretation, whenever the literal interpretation does not involve absurdity or contradiction, that the momentous interval of crisis which lies between the present and the coming dispensation, will be characterized by an evil as well as divine supernaturalism. Such evil supernaturalism has, we know, had its place in the past. "The Scriptures," writes Dr. Tregelles, "record the miracles wrought by the Egyptian magicians as well as those performed by Moses; we read the signs of Simon Magus, as well as of the miracles of Philip and of the apostles."

"DEMONIACAL POWER MUST BE RECOGNIZED as a fact. At the time of the Reformation the servants of Christ did not think it needful to reject Romish miracles; they only sought to ascribe them to their true source."

And as it was in the past so will it also be in the near future. "There is a wide-spread incredulity at present as to Satanic agency and miraculous power—an incredulity which needs to be dispelled because it leads many to be blind to their danger. The working of the 'mystery of iniquity' commenced in the days of the Apostles; it has gone on, including Popery and all other forms of corrupted Christianity, and at length it will arise as credited by Satanic miracles with all power, and signs and lying wonders.' Surely this is not believed by many; and yet the Spirit of God here speaks of actual miracles and no mere deception of men's senses. What some of these miracles we read in Rev. 13, where we are told of fire made to come down from heaven in the sight of men and an image made to speak and breathe."

The Scripture evidence for the conclusion that evil supernaturalism will be one of the marked characteristics of the last days is furnished by such passages as the following:

Matt 24: 24: "And there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect. Behold, I have told you before hand." (R. V.)

2 Thess. 2: 8-12: "And then shall be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of His mouth, and bring to nought by the manifestation of His coming; even he, who

oming is according to the working of Satan with power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." (R.V.)

1 Tim. 4: 1-3: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." This is testimony emphatic enough.

THE STAR FALLEN FROM HEAVEN.

To these, several important statements found in the Book of Revelation must be added. Thus on the sounding of the fifth trumpet, we read: "And I saw a star from heaven fallen unto the earth, and he was given to him the key of the pit of the abyss. And he opened the pit of the abyss; and there went up a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And out of the smoke came forth locusts upon the earth; and power was given them." And, after a description of the locusts, which is evidently symbolic, it is added: "They have over them as king the angel of the abyss: his name in Hebrew is Abaddon, and in the Greek tongue he hath the name Apollyon" (ch 9: 1-3, 11, R.V.).

Again, on the sounding of the sixth trumpet, the inspired seer says, "I heard a voice from the horns of the golden altar which is before God, one saying to the sixth angel, which had the trumpet, loose the four angels which are bound at the great river Euphrates. And the four angels were loosed, which had been prepared for the hour and day and month and year, that they should kill the third part of men. And the number of the armies of the horsemen was twice ten thousand times ten thousand." And after an appalling account of the ravages of these infernal cavalry, the solemn statement is added: "And the rest of mankind, which were not killed with these plagues, repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship demons, and idols of gold," etc.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

Again, in reference to the lamb-like beast, or false prophet, it is said, "And he doeth great signs, that he should even make fire to come down out of heaven upon the earth in the sight of men. And he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by reason of the signs which it was given him to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image of the beast, who hath the stroke of the sword, and lived. And it was given unto him to give breath to it, even to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed" (ch. 13: 13-15, R.V.). And, lastly, of the three frog-like spirits which are to come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet, it is distinctly asserted that "they are spirits of demons, working signs; which go forth unto the kings of the whole world to gather them together unto the war of the great day of God, the Almighty" (ch. 16: 13-14, R.V.).

Now without attempting here any detailed or exhaustive exposition of these Scriptures, there are at least five general conclusions, which may, I think, be safely and profitably drawn from them. These conclusions are the following: First that the originator and organizer of this evil supernaturalism will be the devil or Satan. Secondly, that the special agency which Satan will employ for its production will be his demons. Thirdly, that the human centre around which its visible manifestations are concentrated will be the Antichrist. Fourthly, that these manifestations will be of a most startling and seductive character. Fifthly, that the area of Satanic operation will be worldwide, and not confined to any particular class or nation.

Let us for a little while carefully and earnestly consider these five points; and may we be both instructed and warned by their consideration.

CAN THE DEVIL WORK MIRACLES.

I.—"Satan," it has been quaintly but truly said, "is God's ape." Whatever may be the divine methods he must needs imitate them, and so far as he can discern the divine purposes, he seeks to hinder and frustrate them by affecting to have the same. Hence since God has His miracles, Satan must have his; and inasmuch as the coming of Christ was accompanied and attested by a divine supernaturalism, so will Satan take care that the coming of the Antichrist shall be accompanied and attested by an evil supernaturalism. But it may be asked, Is so much as this really within his power? Can the devil work miracles as well as God?

To this question a sufficient answer is afforded by one of the passages already quoted—2 Thessalonians 2: 8-12, by which we are distinctly taught that the "all power" of Satan comprehends the working of "signs,"—i.e., miraculous signs "and lying wonders." Nor does the latter expression by any means imply that these wonders are merely false and feigned. They are "lying wonders," says Archbishop Trench, "not because in themselves mere illusion or jugglery, but because they are wrought to support the kingdom of lies." "Lying wonders," observes Dr. Seiss, "does not mean unreal wonders, mere trick, jugglery, and legerdemain; but wonders wrought for the support of lies, that is devil-miracles. Mere pretended miracles have nothing of miraculous power, but in this case the worker comes 'with all power.' There is no emptiness or unreality about them. They are genuine miracles wrought in the interests of Hell's falsehoods."

To the same purport Mr. Pember writes, "The English version 'lying wonders' conveys the impression that the wonders themselves will be mere delusive tricks, like that of the blood of St. Januarius; but this seems to be incorrect. The literal rendering of the Greek is, 'with all power and signs and wonders of a lie;' that is, connected with or belonging to a lie, used for the purpose of authenticating it. The signs and wonders will be real enough in themselves, and will be effected by the exercise of Satanic power, as we are plainly told in the beginning of the verse; but they will be used to gain credence for the lie that Antichrist is God."

THE LIMITS OF SATANIC POWER.

Of course, for the Christian, it goes without saying, that this Satanic power of miracle-working is under the absolute control and assigned its precise limits by the Almighty. It seems, from the history of the past, to be confined mainly to special seasons of trial and testing, the most terrible of which will doubtless be "that hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell on the earth." Its special exhibition within this supremely awful period of the world's history, is apparently the outcome of the preceding casting down of Satan and his angels from the aerial heavens, of which we read in Revelation 12, in connection with which it is written, "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea; for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (verse 12).

But even in this dread hour, and knowing how short a time yet remains to him wherein to work his malignant will, it will not be Satan's policy too openly to declare himself. Even in this respect he will seek to be the imitator of God's method, and as during our Lord's earthly ministry, the Father did not immediately manifest on His behalf the Divine signs and wonders whereby His ministry and mission were to be attested, but delegated His power to the Son; so that Christ could speak of His miracles as "the works which the Father had given Him to do;" even so will the Old Serpent delegate the exercise of the special wonder-working power at that time granted to him, to fit agents, both human and spiritual, that so his contemplated victims may not be too much startled and thereby possibly undeceived.

II.—That the spiritual agents, whom Satan will employ in the production of the evil supernaturalism of the last days, are is clearly revealed in the Scriptures above quoted. "The abyss" is, we know, the dark and dreadful habitat of the demons, since those by whom the demoniac was possessed, whose healing is recorded in Luke 8, "besought Christ that He would not command them to go out into the abyss." Now, in Rev. 9, we read of "a star fallen from heaven unto the earth," who is evidently Satan himself. "and there was given to him the key of the pit of the abyss. And he opened the pit of the abyss," and out of it issued the supernatural locusts, of whom so fearful a symbolic description is given, and who, as well as the still more terrible "horsemen" of the sixth trumpet are, there is every reason to conclude, demon-spirits, like the three frogs of the 16th chapter.

THEIR TWOFOLD MISSION.

But the mission of these demons will be twofold. They will not only torment and destroy, as revealed in the Book of the Revelation, but they will at the same time or previously be "seducing spirits," deluding men to their utter ruin. This, we learn from 1 Tim. 4: 1-3, in which passage the reference to some method of working closely allied, if not identical with modern spiritism seems very clear, though, as Mr. B. W. Newton sagaciously remarks, "Whether it may be the intention of Satan, after a little, to undermine spiritualism by imposture, and cause a collapse of the system, so as to discredit the thought of the existence of unseen spiritual agency, or whether it be his design to employ spiritualism for a season, as one of the means by which he quenches the light of truth and invalidates the authority of Scripture, we know not."

"Possibly he will adopt both methods. If any are disposed to be incredulous and scoff, he will probably seek to increase their scepticism. On the other hand, wherever the existence of spiritual power is believed in he will earnestly strive to demonstrate that its origin is good, and its influence beneficial. Such, probably, will be his present course. As the end, however, approaches, his servants will be allowed to act more undisguisedly, and to 'show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.' As darkness increased, Satanic strength will be made more and more manifest."*

WHO ARE THE DEMONS?

But who or what are the demons? On this point much difference of opinion prevails, even among the most able and deeply-instructed students of Scripture psychology. Some are of opinion that they constitute a special class—the lowest—of the fallen angels; while others regard them as being in truth the disembodied spirits of wicked men. Thus Mr. B. W. Newton, in the little work already quoted, says: "It was the habit of such persons (as the woman at Endor) then, even as now, to pretend that they were able to call up the dead: but it was a pretence merely. They called into their presence, not the dead, but the spirits with whom they were associated, and that spirit personated the dead. Saul, indeed, wished and expected to see Samuel; but the woman had no such expectation. She, no doubt, expected the spirit, with whom she was in fellowship, to appear and personate Samuel. When, instead of this, God really sent Samuel, the woman was dismayed and terrified. Her divination ceased; Samuel spake, and Saul answered. The modern necromancy which now abounds around us is personation only."

On the other hand, Dr. Seiss maintains that we have scriptural evidence on the conclusion that demons are the souls of the wicked dead. He says, "The account which demons themselves mostly give of themselves, according to those who have most to do with them, is this. Josephus gives it as the orthodox Jewish opinion, that demons are none other than the spirits of the wicked dead. With very few exceptions, the Christian fathers were of like opinion. Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, and the vast majority of early Christian writers, regarded demons as the souls or spirits of the unsanctified dead. And the burden of evidence and authority is to the effect that demons are the souls of dead men, particularly the spirits of those who bore a bad character in this life."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Passed the Bill to Extend the charters of the national banks, on Thursday last by a vote of 34 to 14. Senator Jones, of Nevada, was the only Republican voting in the minority. The bill will now go back to the House for concurrence in the Senate's amendments. The principal points in the bill, which is one of considerable moment to the national prosperity, are that any national bank, upon the consent of the shareholders of two-thirds of its stock, can renew its charter for twenty years at any time within two years before the expiration of its existence under the present law. The institution will then have all its old rights, except that legal proceedings against it can be carried on in the State Courts. The bank's notes under its old charter must be destroyed within three years, or the institution must deposit in the Treasury money enough to redeem the remainder. No bank which makes a deposit in order to withdraw its circulating notes will be entitled to receive any increase of its circulation for six months from the time it made that deposit; provided, that not more than $3,000,000 shall be deposited during any month for this purpose. The secretary is authorized to receive deposits of gold coin in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $20 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin thus deposited will be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the certificates on demand. It was stated in the course of the debate that at the present rate of coinage we should in ten years have 380,000,000 silver dollars; and Senator Sherman gave it as his experience that silver, in spite of every effort to force it into circulation, had steadily refused to circulate. Sent out to a distance, it had quickly come back to the Treasury vaults. He advised that the silver dollar should be made the equal in value of the gold dollar and thought that then no more would be heard of the silver question. It came out also during the debate that the ratio of silver to gold had changed thirty times in four hundred years.

The Debate in the House of Representatives on the Internal Revenue bill last week was the occasion of the most vigorous speeches of the session. An earnest effort was made by Mr. Randall to repeal the taxes on tobacco and cigars, but it was defeated by a very close vote. The House was not opposed to a reduction of the revenue, but rightly thought that the taxes on luxuries should not be reduced while taxes on necessities were continued. Attempts were also made to repeal the taxes on bank capital and on fermented liquors, but these also failed. A well-informed Washington correspondent discussing the new bill says: "The general opinion seemed to be that the Pension Arrears bill had made it impossible to abolish the internal revenue system. Were it not for the pension bill, the Internal Revenue Department might have been swept out of existence at this session. As it is, the most to be expected is, that a bill may pass which will cut off $17,000,000 revenue."

The Difficulty in the Matter of the Succession to the Presidency in the event of the death of both President and Vice-president is the subject of a bill introduced in the Senate on Friday, June 16, by Senator Hoar. It provides that the succession to the Presidency in the event of both officers being removed shall be vested in the members of the Cabinet, beginning with the Secretary of State and concluding with the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Hoar said the scheme, while permanently arranging the order of succession, would remove the motive to take the life of a President-elect, as a means of changing the administrative policy which the people are supposed to sanction at a Presidential election. If a vacancy should occur in the Presidency as now filled, the office would be held by the presiding officer of the Senate, and a Presidential election would have to be held in the ensuing fall. In the event of this special election being held in the middle of a term of Congress, the whole governmental machinery would be deranged by it. Another difficulty was that the presiding officer of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, if temporarily called to act as President, would be obliged to serve also at the same time in his office in either house. It will be observed that the difficulty which is now agitating the Republican party in the change of supremacy to the Stalwart wing of the party is not touched by the new bill.

The Report that Governor St. John, of Kansas, would decline a nomination for a second term is now authoritatively contradicted. He has made no secret of his desire to retire into private life, but he holds that the duty of himself and every worker in the temperance cause is not to be governed by personal and private inclinations, but to sacrifice them when the cause demands it. If, therefore, the Temperance party in Kansas believe that the candidacy of the Governor will operate beneficially in the contest he is willing to accept a re-nomination.

The Work of Completing the Census Returns is still incomplete, as it is intended to make them as detailed and reliable as possible. The superintendent has, however, issued a bulletin containing gross figures, which show that by the census of 1880, the number of persons in the United States was 50,155,783; the area in square miles, 2,900,170; the number of families, 9,945,916; the number of dwellings, 8,955,812; the number of persons to a square mile, 17.29; the number of families to a square mile, 3.43; the number of dwellings to a square mile, 3.02; acres to a person, 37.01; acres to a family, 186.62; persons to a dwelling, 5.60; and persons to a family, 5.04. The area is land surface only, and exclusive of the Indian Territory and tracts of unorganized territory aggregating 69,830 square miles.

The Protracted Dispute as to the Expenses of taking care of immigrants was passed upon by the House on Monday, June 19th, when by a vote of 111 to 15 the bill to regulate immigration was agreed to. The bill provides that the master, owner, agent, or consignee of any vessel bringing immigrants to the United States and landing them, shall pay a tax of fifty cents for each immigrant landed. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into contracts with State authorities for the support and relief of such immigrants as may be in need. Such authorities are authorized to prevent the landing of convicts, lunatics, idiots or any person unable to take care of himself or herself without becoming a public charge, and such persons are to be returned to the countries from which they came, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The Liquor Sellers in Ohio are Making determined resistance to temperance men of both parties. At a meeting of the trade on June 21st in Cincinnati, it is reported that they adopted a resolution declaring that the association owes it to itself to oppose every temperance advocate who is a candidate for any office, no matter what party has placed him in nomination. The fight upon temperance candidates, which is thus declared, is to be as vigorous and effective as it is possible to make it. The association has a large sum in its treasury, which has been raised during the past few months for the express purpose of defeating anti-liquor legislation and all who favor such legislation. This fund is to be freely used during the coming campaign. It is understood that it was generally agreed at the meeting, though definite action to that effect was not taken, that individual candidates should be fought rather than the party nominations as such.

The Labor Troubles of Pennsylvania have spread to New York and have affected other industries. Three thousand freight handlers quitted work in the city on Monday, June 19th, and 400 on the Erie in Jersey City struck for higher pay. They ask an advance of three cents an hour. They had postponed such action, hoping that the company would yield to their demands; but when they saw that freight which ought to have gone by the New York Central was being sent across the river to the Erie line, they stopped work, apparently feeling that undue advantage had been taken of their patience. The spirit which the men across the river and those in this city exhibit is generally orderly. An attempt is being made by the companies to supply the places of the men with German, Italian, and Russian immigrants.

Tornadoes in the Western States are again reported. A brief telegram received at Des Moines, Iowa, on June 24th, from Fort Dodge, says that the train dispatcher reports the town of Emmetsburg, and the county seat of Palo Alto County, as being greatly damaged this morning by a tornado, and that over 100 people were killed. The Illinois Central and the Chicago and Northwestern trains were blown from the tracks. The Milwaukee and St. Louis road was wrecked. There is a wash-out north of Forest City, and it is reported that three or four more towns in that neighborhood were blown to pieces. The telegraph wires are all down north of Des Moines. Rockford, Ill., and Yankton, D. T., also suffered severely.

The Texas Legislature has Exempted from taxation colporteurs selling tracts and books exclusively religious in character. Two months ago the Comptroller of the State enforced the payment of fifty dollars from a colporteur of the American Tract Society on the plea that he was a peddler within the meaning of the law. When the tax bill came before the Legislature, Senator Burgess moved the amendment of the bill by exempting colporteurs and increasing the tax on the vendors of certain lewd and immoral journals specified, to five hundred dollars.

The Cleveland Meetings Conducted by Major Cole are still continued with remarkable success. The Cleveland Leader states that conversions are reported every day, and the converts are giving good evidence of a radical change of character. A noteworthy incident occurred at one of the meetings. A wife asked prayers for the conversion of her husband. "Where is your husband?" asked Major Cole. "In Chicago," she answered. "Do you believe God is able to save your husband in Chicago?" "Yes, I do." "Do you believe He is willing?" "Yes, I do." "Then let us pray." In a few simple words of prayer the Major asked for the conversion of the man. The next week the wife came into the meeting and said she had received a letter from her husband, telling her he had that day, in a meeting of the Y.M.C.A., found Christ.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Published in these columns this week was the last he preached before taking his annual vacation. During the months of July and August the Brooklyn Tabernacle will be closed for repairs and renovation. During Dr. Talmage's absence sermons by him which have never before appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be published every week. Dr. Talmage's engagements as at present arranged are: June 29th, an oration before the Literary Societies of Bates College, North Lewisburgh, Ohio; July 5th, a lecture at Illyria, Ohio; July 26th, a sermon at Chataqua; July 28th, lecture at Lakeside, Ohio; August 20th, lecture at Great Grimsby Camp; August 27th, lecture at Highland Grove, Mass.

The Longest Fence in the World is the fence to be erected extending from the Indian Territory west across the Texas Panhandle, and fifty-five miles into New Mexico. It is said that fifty-five miles of this fence is already under contract. Its course will be in the line of the Canadian River, and its purpose is to stop the drift of the Northern cattle. It is a bold enterprise, and will pay a large percentage on the investment. The fence will be over two hundred miles long. Men will undertake such stupendous enterprises and spend vast sums of money to protect their property, but when it is proposed to set up the legislative fence of prohibition to save their children and their friends from the curse of liquor, they resist, forgetting our Saviour's teaching (Matt. 23: 11, 12).

A Snake was Found on a Lady's Hat at Rome, recently. The Rome Bulletin says: "The other day a young lady in Rome started out shopping. While putting on her hat she thought it felt rather heavy, but not noticing anything put it on her head. On her return home she asked her sister to take off her hat, that she thought something was on it. Her sister took off her hat, and while doing so came near being bitten by a snake which was coiled among the feathers and ribbons of which it was trimmed. The lady had worn the snake around with her all the time, unconscious of its presence." We are familiar with the phrase, "snake in the grass, and we have heard of them in their strange places, but a lady's hat is a very remarkable place to find a snake. An elegant hat of any other handsome article of dress has, however, often been used by the being called in the bible "the old Serpent," as a vantage ground from which he can seduce the thoughts and feed the vanity of those whom he desires to make his prey (2 Tim. 3: 1-6).

Deafness is said to have been Caused by the telephone at Fall River, Mass. A journal of that city says that several people there have had their sense of hearing diminished in one ear by constant use of the telephone. Persons who use this instrument are apt to apply the instrument to the same ear every time, and the consequence is the organ is overworked, and slowly approaching deafness in that ear is sure to follow. Several persons who have been affected by it have applied to an eminent aurist in Boston, who reports the causes to be as above described. He recommends that persons who use the telephone apply the instrument alternately to their right and left ears. It is remarkable that an instrument designed to extend the power of hearing so that the user may hear what he could not hear without its aid should lead to his losing the power he had before of ordinary hearing. Many persons study spiritualism with similar motives. They are curious to learn what is the state of the soul after death, and they are deluded and duped until they lose the power to receive the truth God has revealed of that state and the way to render it a happy one (Lev. 20: 6).

Killed by Eating Strawberries is the Cause assigned by a physician for the death of a child in New York last week. The novelty of the case excited the curiosity of a reporter of the Times, and he inquired into the circumstances, thinking the public should be made aware of the fact if the fruit was liable to produce illness and death. The circumstances surrounding the death were peculiar. The child's parents were poor people living in tenement in one of the filthiest localities in the city, into which the sunshine seldom penetrates, and where the space between the curbs is so narrow that only one team can pass through at a time. Most of the refuse from the houses in the vicinity is thrown into the street, and much of it is necessarily tracked into the houses again by the numberless little children playing in the neighborhood. A neighbor of the family to which the child belonged brought some strawberries, and called the little one into the room to eat some of them. He was given all he wanted, and, as the physician who was summoned to attend the child said, he had eaten freely. The fruit would not have had any ill effect had not the child's constitution been affected by the poisonous gases and foul odors of the neighborhood. When Christian men defend habits and practises on the ground that they are harmless, they often forget that although they may be harmless to them others may follow their example to whom they will not be harmless. A hereditary taint in the blood or their evil surroundings may have rendered them liable to temptation, and they are led to ruin by that which has done others no harm (1 Cor. 8: 13).

A Foreign Visitor in a Cincinnati Fire-engine house a few days ago had a startling experience. She had duly admired the engines with their well burnished fittings and the various devices to ensure prompt action in case of a fire breaking out; she was then shown the electric knob which sounds the alarm-gong. This innocent looking button she was induced to touch, with no premonition of the result. "The next instant," says one of the firemen, "all the doors and traps banged open, the men upstairs came flying down the waxed poles, and the horses tore out of their stalls into their places like wild animals." The lady's astonishment at the result of her simple act may be imagined. A sad and painful experience has led us to take efficient measures for an expeditious effort to check a conflagration as soon as it occurs, knowing well that it is more easily overcome in its early stages. Unhappily we are not so careful when moral danger threatens the community. We allow institutions and publications to grow and flourish which do more serious harm and effect more deplorable results than even a fire could do (Prov. 14: 34).

An Intoxicated Boaster was Killed on the Long Island Railroad last week. The man, whose name was Teupner, was seen walking on the track near the Greenpoint crossing at Blissville by a youth, who, seeing a train coming, caught hold of Teupner and warned him of his danger. Teupner, with a profane expression, demanded to be let alone, and said that he could take care of himself. He continued on the track, and a minute later was struck by the locomotive and killed. His death was almost instantaneous. His body when picked up was badly mangled. Coroner Robinson, who will hold an inquest, said the man was in a stupor from liquor and did not know what he was doing. The confidence drunken men have that they can take care of themselves is often amusing to spectators who see their helplessness; but unhappily such misplaced confidence is not confined to drunken men. Young men new to city scenes and "anxious to see life" on being warned of danger frequently boast of their ability to perform the same duty, and disastrous results follow. Men cannot be too surely convinced of the fact that they cannot take care of themselves, God only can do that (1 Cor. 10: 12).

An Engineer's Brave Effort to Save a Child from death is reported from Charlotte, N. C. "Sis" Bryan, an engineer on the North Carolina Railroad, while driving ahead under a full head of steam on the morning of June 6th saw an object on the track some distance ahead, which he supposed to be a dog. The engineer blew "on brakes," and at the sound of the whistle the object moved, and Bryan saw it was a child. The little thing began to crawl off the track, but on reaching the rail deliberately stopped and seated itself astride of it. Swinging himself out of the window, Bryan started to crawl along the engine to its front, with the intention of picking up the child before it was struck. He might have succeeded in this perilous undertaking, but a lunge of the engine caused him to lose his balance and he was thrown down an embankment. Badly bruised and shaken he scrambled to his feet, and as he did so heard a piercing scream, and knew that the child had been run down. On arriving at the scene he saw the mangled remains of the child he had risked his own life to save. This child was too young to understand its danger and the importance of heeding the warning whistle, and so it came to its death. The Gospel warning is often sounded in the ears of men who heed it not, and they go to a worse fate; but in their case, though they do not realize their danger, it is not because of their simplicity, but because their attention is diverted, their souls lulled into false security, and their heart hardened by Satan (John 5: 40).

THE TRUE GOSPEL NO HIDDEN GOSPEL.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"But if our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them."—2 Cor. 4: 3, 4.

A Royal Style of Preaching—I. The Gospel a Light in Itself—It Reveals the Glory of Christ—Reveals God Himself—It brings Light and Comfort—II. The Gospel Plain and Clear—A Poor Boy Without a Soul—III. In True Preaching Simplicity Preserved—A New Commandment for Preachers—IV. A Fatal Sign—Condemned Already—How a Man's mind is Blinded—Who Opens Blind Eyes.

I THINK in this case the Revised New Testament gives a better translation than does the Authorized Version, and I will therefore read it:—"But and if our Gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that are perishing: in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that the light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should not dawn upon them." Paul had been speaking of Moses with the veil over his face, and we lose the track of his thought if we use the word "hid" instead of veiled. Our Gospel wears no veil, but exhibits all the glory of its countenance to the sons of men. Oh that they may be able steadfastly to behold it, and see in it their own salvation and the glory of the Lord!

Observe at the outset the confidence with which Paul speaks. It is abundantly evident that he has no doubt whatever that the Gospel which he proclaims is assuredly true; nay, that it is so manifestly true that if those who have heard it do not accept it, it must be because the God of this world hath blinded their minds. The accent of conviction makes every word emphatic. He believes and is sure, and he is convinced that those who do not believe must be under the thralldom of the devil. This is in which the Gospel is preached nowadays. We hear men courteously apologize for stating anything as certain, for they are fearful of being thought narrow-minded and bigoted; we hear them prove what is clear as noonday and back up with arguments what God Himself has said; as if the sun needed candles to exhibit it, or as if God's word wanted the support of human reasoning.

The apostle did not take the defensive ground at all; he carried the war across the border and assailed the unbelievers. He came forth fresh from God with a revelation, and his every word seemed to challenge men with—"This is God's word, believe it; for if you do not you will incur sin, and prove that you are lost, and are under the influence of the devil." When the Gospel was preached in that royal style it mightily prevailed, and annihilated opposition. It does not spread to-day with equal rapidity because many of its teachers have adopted what they fancy are wiser methods; they have become less certain and more indifferent, and therefore they reason and argue where they should proclaim and assert.

Where did the apostle learn to speak thus positively? He tells us in the first verse of the chapter, "Therefore seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not." He had himself been once a persecutor; and he had been convinced of his error by the appearance of the Lord Jesus to him. This was a great deed of mercy. He now knew that his sins were forgiven him; he felt in his own heart that he was a regenerated man, changed, cleansed, new created, and this was to him overwhelming evidence that the Gospel was from God. To himself at any rate the Gospel was a truth past argument, needing no other demonstration than its marvellous effect upon himself. Having received mercy for himself he judged that other men were in need of mercy even as he was, and that the same Gospel which had brought light and comfort to his own soul would bring salvation to them also. This braced him to his work. By this consciousness he was made to speak as one having authority. There was no hesitancy about him, for he spoke what he had felt.

Come we now to consider our text. Our first observation shall be: the Gospel is in itself a glorious light, for in the fourth verse Paul speaks of the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ; secondly this Gospel is in itself plain and simple; thirdly, if we preach it as we ought to preach it we keep it plain, and do not muddle it up by worldly wisdom; and fourthly, therefore, it being in itself a great light, and in itself clear, and the preaching being clear, if men do not see it it is because they are lost; it is a fatal sign when men are unable to perceive the light of the Gospel of the glory of Jesus Christ.

I. First, then, the Gospel is in itself A GLORIOUS LIGHT.

In countless places it is so described in the New Testament. This is the light which has come into the world. "The darkness is past, and the true light now shineth." Observe that this light reveals the glory of Christ. This is the new translation, and it is a valuable one—"The light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ." You know the Hebrews had a different mode of expression from the Greeks, and if we are to read the Greek as though Paul Hebraized it, then we read it according to the version we have here—"the glorious Gospel of Christ;" but if we read the Greek as Greek, then it runs, "the light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ." The renderings are equally true, but the second one has a fulness and freshness of sense about it worthy of special note.

The Gospel reveals the glory of Christ. It tells us that He is the eternal Son of the Father, by whom all things were made, for whom all things were created, and by whom they continue to exist. This might not have been good news to us if it had stood alone, though it ought always to be good to the creature to be informed of his Creator; but the Gospel further reveals to us that this ever-blessed Son of the Highest came down to earth in infinite pity, espoused our nature, and was born at Bethlehem, and became as truly man as he was assuredly God. This was the first note of the Gospel, and there was so much of delight in it that it set all the angels in heaven singing, and the shepherds who kept watch over their flocks by night heard the chorales of the first Christmas rung out from the midnight sky—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

Furthermore the Gospel tells us that this same mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace, dwelt here among men, preaching and teaching, and working miracles of matchless mercy; everywhere proving Himself to be man's brother, sympathetic and tender and gentle, receiving to Himself even the lowest of the people, and bowing Himself to the least of the race. But with clearest note, is that this Son of God in due time gave Himself for our sins, making an offering of His whole human nature as a propitiation for the guilt of men. Herein is an excessive glory of love. What a sight it was to see Him in the garden oppressed with our load of guilt till the bloody sweat was forced from Him; to see Him bearing that stupendous weight up to the tree, and there hanging in agonies of death, bearing the desertion of His Father, and all the thick clouds of darkness that came of it; dying the "just for the unjust to bring us to God!" It was the glory of Christ that He was there bereft of all glory. Never can a more glorious thing be said of Him than that He for our sakes was obedient to death, even the death of the cross. And this is the Gospel we preach, the Gospel of substitution, that Jesus stood in the sinner's place and bore in the sinner's stead what was due to the law of God on account of man's transgression.

No gladder news could come to man than that the incarnate God had borne man's sins and died in man's stead. Yet there is another note, for He that died and was buried is risen from the dead, and has borne our nature up into the glory, and there He wears it at the Father's right hand. His loving heart is still occupied with the same divine errand that brought Him down below; He is by

His intercession saving sinners whom He purchased with His blood. He is able to save them to the uttermost who come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them. This is the Gospel of the glory of Christ. It is our Lord's glory that He mediates between man and God, pleading for the unjust ones, using as His argument the blood which He hath shed.

But I must not leave out the fact that

to gather all His own unto Himself, to shed abroad on them the fulness of His own glory, and to take them up to be with Him where He is. There is wondrous light in the Gospel, both for the future and the present. It sets forth to us the glory of Christ, the glory of love, the glory of mercy, the glory of a blood which can wash the blackest white, the glory of a plea which can make the poorest prayer acceptable, the glory of a living and triumphant Saviour, who having put His hand to the work will not fail nor be discouraged till all the purposes of infinite love shall be achieved by Him. This is "the Gospel of the glory of Christ," and the light of it is exceeding clear and bright.

We are now called to a second truth; the Gospel is a light which reveals God Himself, for according to our text the Lord Jesus is the image of God. If you know the character of Jesus you know the character of God. God Himself is invisible, and is not seen of mortal eye, neither can He be comprehended of finite mind. He cannot, indeed, be truly known at all except by the teaching of the Holy Spirit. But all that can be known of God is fairly writ in capital letters in the person of Jesus. What higher conception of God can you have? Even those who have denied our Lord's deity have yet been subdued into admiration by His matchless character. Thus the Gospel is full of light, revealing first the Mediator and then the Lord God Himself.

Now, dear friends, this Gospel of the glory of Christ is really light to us, that is to say, it brings with it all that the metaphor of light sets forth. First of all it brings illumination. It is a lighting up of the soul "to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." It is light to the understanding to be able to see that the Only Begotten has revealed the Father. Man feels after God if haply he may find Him, and the heathen stumbles upon this and that in his blind gropings. Perhaps the world was nearest the truth when it called Him "the unknown God." When the wisdom of this world once began to define and to describe the Deity, then it proved its own folly. "The world by wisdom knew not God," but in the person of the Lord Jesus we have the true icon, the image and representation of the Godhead.

But it is light in another sense, namely, that of comfort. Let a man see God in Jesus Christ and he cannot be unhappy. Is it sin that burdened him? Let him see Jesus Christ bearing sin in His own body on the tree, and let him believe in this same sin-bearer, and that burden is gone. Let him be fretting under the cares and trials of life, and let him get a view by faith of Jesus, an infinitely greater sufferer, sympathizing with him in his sorrow, and surely the sting of his grief is removed. Is he afraid to die? Let him hear Jesus say, "I am the resurrection and the life," and he shall be taught rather to long for death than to dread it. Is he troubled about the things to come? Does the awful future lower darkly before him? Let him only hear Jesus say, "I am He that liveth and was dead, and am alive for evermore, amen, and hold the keys of hell and death," and he will no longer be afraid of the separate world of spirits of which Christ hath the key; nor will he tremble at the burning of the world, and the ruin of creation, for he has a hold upon One who has said, "Because I live ye shall live also." Never did another such a light ever shine upon the sons of men.

II. This Gospel is in itself

MOST PLAIN AND CLEAR.

The Gospel contains nothing which can perplex anybody unless he wishes to be perplexed. There is nothing in the Gospel which a man may not apprehend if he desires to apprehend it. It is all plain to the man who yields his understanding to his God. Certain divines like to preach an incomprehensible Gospel, for it gives them the air of wisdom in the judgment of the foolish. Certain hearers prefer sermons which they cannot understand. To them the difficult and intricate are as marrow and fatness. I heard of one who said he liked a bit of gristle in the sermons, or a bone to try his teeth upon. We could easily gratify such friends, but we see no authority in Scripture for gratifying this longing. I carefully endeavor to take the stones out of the fruit before preparing the dish. If it be the Lord's own Gospel, you who are doers of the Lord's will can understand it; and if you cannot it is not the Gospel of the glory of Christ, but a Gospel of human inventing. The true Gospel is simplicity itself.

Listen! That God should come among men and espouse our nature is so far a great mystery that we do not know how it could be. Blessed be God, we do not want to know how it was done; we only know that it was done, and that fact is enough for us. We understand that the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we rejoice therein. Observe the doctrine of the atonement—this also as a fact is plain enough. How it became right for Christ to suffer in our stead, and for His sufferings to be an expiation for our sins, may be a very deep question, but the fact is clearly revealed.

I do not think substitution to be a bewildering mystery, but some do. What if it is? The secret reason of it is nothing to us. If God has set forth Christ to be a propitiation for our sins our most reasonable course is to accept Him. We need not quarrel with grace because we cannot understand everything about it. It is wiser to eat that which is set before us than to die of hunger because we do not know all the secrets of cookery. I am not asked to understand how God justifies us in Christ, but I am asked to believe that He does so. The fact is plain enough, and the fact is the object of faith. That Jesus should suffer in my stead is a simple matter of truth, and in it there is no darkness at all. At times persons enquire, "What is believing?" Well, it is trusting, depending, leaning upon, relying upon—that is all. Is there any thing hard about that?

Suppose the Gospel had been such a difficult thing to explain, and such a very hard matter to understand, what would become of the many who are now rejoicing in Christ, and yet have by birth and constitution the most shallow capacities? It is wonderful how one but little raised above an idiot can yet grasp the Gospel. What a blessing that it is so! I have heard of whom his teachers had been instructing for years, and one day they said to him, "Well, Jack, have you a soul?" "No, I've got no soul." They feared that they had lost their labor; but their minds were changed when he added, "I had a soul once, and I lost it, and Jesus Christ came and found it, and so I let Him keep it." That was better Gospel than we get from many a learned divine. He had the whole thing at his fingers' ends. Christ had found his soul, and was keeping it for him; even he who will not fail to keep that which we have committed to his charge.

Right well do Cowper's often-quoted lines set forth the plainness of the Gospel, and rebuke those who reject it on that account.

"O how unlike the complex work of man,
Heaven's easy, artless, unencumber'd plan!
No meretricious graces to beguile,
No clustering ornaments to clog the pile:
From ostentation as from weakness free,
It stands like the cerulean arch we see,
Majestic in its own simplicity.
Inscribed above the portal from afar
Conspicuous as the brightness of a star, Legible only by the light they give,
Stand the soul-quickenings words—BELIEVE, AND LIVE!
Too many, shock'd at what should charm them most,
Despise the plain direction, and are lost,
Heaven on such terms! (they cry with proud disdain)—
Incredible, impossible, and vain!—
Rebel because 'tis easy to obey,
And scorn, for its own sake, the gracious way."

III. Thirdly, in the true preaching of the Gospel this SIMPLICITY IS PRESERVED.

Paul expressly said—"Having this hope in us we use great plainness of speech," and yet again, "My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." The apostle Paul was a deep thinker, a man of profound insight and subtle mind. The bent of his mind was such that he would have made a metaphysician of supreme rank, or a mystic of the deepest darkness; but he went against his natural inclination, and devoted all his energies to the unveiling of the Gospel. It was a sublime self-denial for him to put on one side all his logic among the other things which he counted loss for Christ; for says he, "I determined not to know anything among men save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." He "determined," he was resolute, and had made up his mind to it, or he would not have accomplished it. He was the man who wrote some things hard to be understood, which Peter mentions, but when he came to the Gospel he would have nothing but simplicity there.

The true man of God will not veil the Gospel beneath performances and ceremonies. Mark those who do this, and avoid them. We see his reverence walking with clasped hands to the right and to the left, repeating Latin sentences unknown by the people. He turns, and bows, and turns again. We see his face for a moment and then his back. I suppose it is all meant for edification; but I, poor creature, cannot find the least instruction in it, nor as far as I can discover, do the people who are looking on. What mean these little boys in pretty gowns, making such a smoke? And what are these flowers and images on the altar? What a splendid cross is that which adorns the priest's back! It seems to be made of roses. The folks look on, and some are wondering where he buys his lace, while others are speculating as to the quantity of wax which will be consumed in those candles every hour; and there is the end of it. Christ is veiled behind the millinery, if He is there at all.

I know numbers who would disdain to do that, and yet they hide their Lord under finery of language. It is a grand thing to mount aloft upon the wings of eloquence and display the glory of speech, till you ascend in a splendid peroration, as many another exhibition closes, with fireworks. But this is not becoming in preachers of the Lord Jesus. I always tell our young men that one of their commandments should be, "Thou shalt not perorate." To attempt anything grand in language when we are preaching salvation is to leave our proper work. Our one business is to tell out the Gospel plainly. We deal in bread, not in flowers. Let tawdry ornaments be left to the stage or to the bar, where men amuse themselves, or dispute for gain; or let these poor gewgaws be reserved for the Senate, where men will defend or denounce according as it suits their party.

It is not ours to make the worse appear the better reason, or to hide truth under floods of words. As for us, we are to hide ourselves behind the cross, and make men know that Jesus Christ came to save the lost, and that if they believe in Him they shall be saved at once and forever. If we do not make them know this we have missed our mark, however grandly we have performed. What, shall we become acrobats with words, or jugglers displaying wonders? Then God is insulted, His Gospel is degraded, and souls are left to perish.

I venture to put in a word for myself, and then leave this point. I can say with the apostle, "I have used great plainness of speech," and therefore if the Gospel which I have preached be hidden, I have not produced the veil. I have used vulgar words when I thought that they would be better understood, and I have told all sorts of simple stories when I thought I could make the Gospel known. I have never used a hard word where I could help it. My one desire has been by manifesting the truth to touch your consciences and win your hearts. If you see not the light it is not because I have hidden it from you.

IV. With this we close. If the Gospel be veiled to our hearers it is A FATAL SIGN.

"If our Gospel be hid it is hid to them that are lost;" the god of this world has blinded their unbelieving eyes lest the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ should dawn upon them. Not to believe, understand, appreciate, and accept the Gospel is a sign of perishing. I want to put this very plainly to any here who say that they have not received the Gospel, for they cannot understand it, and they see nothing remarkable in it. If you have heard it plainly preached, it is so plain in itself that if it is hid from your eyes it is because you are still in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity. You who receive the Gospel, are saved; faith is the saving token. If you believe that Jesus is the Christ you are born of God; if you have accepted Him as your Saviour whom God sets forth as such, then you are saved; but if you say, "No, I cannot see it," then your eyes are blinded and you are lost. The sun is bright enough, but those who have no sight are not enlightened.

According to the text, he that believes not on Jesus Christ is a lost man. God has lost you; you are not His servant. The church has lost you; you are not working for the truth. The world has lost you really; you yield no lasting service to it. You have lost yourself to right, to joy, to heaven. You are lost, lost, lost, like the prodigal son when he was away from his father's house, and like the sheep that went astray from the fold. It is not only that you will be lost, but that you are lost; for "he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the Son of God." Press those two words upon your conscience—"Condemned already;"—lost even now. You are perishing; that is to say, you are gradually passing into that condition in which you must abide forever, as one that has perished before God, and become utterly useless and dead. It is that this is proved by the fact that you do not understand the Gospel, or if you understand it you do not appreciate it; you do not see beauty or glory in it; or if you do in a measure appreciate it, and see some glory in it, yet it has never stirred your affection, or drawn your heart toward its great subject. In a word, you have not come to trust in Jesus. He is the only one that you can trust to, and yet you reject Him. Oh! what a condition to be in; wilfully in darkness shutting your eyes, to the light. You are certainly lost.

The apostle explains how a man gets into that condition. He says that Satan, the god of this world, hath blinded his mind. What a thought it is that Satan should set up to be a god. Christ is the image of God; Satan is the ape of God; he mimics God, and holds an usurped power over men's minds and thoughts. To maintain his power he takes great care that his dupes should not see the light of the gospel. The veils he uses are such as men's selfish hearts approve; for he speaks thus: "If you were to become a Christian, you would never get on in the world." He claps money on each eye, and then you cannot see, though the sun shine at midday.

Pride binds a silken band across the eyes, and thus again the light is excluded. Satan whispers, "If you become a Christian, you will be laughed at;" thus he hoodwinks his victim with fear of ridicule. He has many a crafty device by which he perverts the human judgment till they cannot see that which is self-evident, and will not believe that which is unquestionable. He makes the gain of heaven to seem inconsiderable when weighed with the little loss which religion may involve. He hides from the soul the bliss of sin forgiven, of adoption into God's family, and the certainty of eternal glory, by throwing dust into the eyes, so that the mind cannot look at things truthfully.

What shall I say in closing but this: Are you lost, any of you? Upon the showing of the text all of you are to whom the Gospel is hidden. Well, but thank God you may be found yet; lost to-day, but you need not be lost to-morrow; lost while sitting in these pews, but you may be found before you leave the Tabernacle. The Good Shepherd has come out to find the lost sheep. Have you any desire after Him, any wish to return to Him? Then look to Him with trustful glance. You are not lost if so you look, nor shall you ever be. He that believes in Jesus is saved, and saved eternally. Are any of you blinded? You must so be if the Gospel is hid from you, so that you cannot see its brightness. Ah, but you need not remain in the dark. There is One abroad to-day who opens blind eyes. Cry to him as did the two blind men, "Thou Son of David, have mercy on me! Thou Son of David, have mercy on me!" The Messiah came on purpose to give sight to the blind; it was a part of His commission when He came forth from the Father's glory. He will give sight to you. Oh seek it!

Is the god of this world your master? He must be if you do not see the glory of the Gospel; but he need not be your god any longer. I pray the Holy Spirit to help you to DETHRONE THIS INTRUDER.

Why should you adore him? What good has he ever done to you? What is there about his character that makes him worthy to be your god? Break off the yoke; burst the fetters which now hold you his slave. The true God has come in the flesh to set you free, and to destroy all the works of the devil. Whatsoever keeps you from beholding the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ can be removed. I am sent to say in my Master's name, "Whosoever believeth in Him is not condemned; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

Trust the Saviour, trust the incarnate God; trust Him now and trust Him at once, and though a moment ago you were black as hell's midnight you shall be clean and bright as heaven's eternal noon. In one instant sins that have taken you fifty years to accumulate shall disappear; the transgressions of all your days shall be plunged beneath the sea, and shall be found no more. Only be willing and obedient, and yield yourselves up to the incarnate God, who ever liveth to take care of those who put their trust in Him. Amen.

A Child's View of a Doctrinal Point on which theologians have often disputed is given in the Youth's Companion. A little girl one day said to her mother, "Papa calls me good, auntie calls me good, and everybody calls me good; but I am not good." "I am very sorry," said her mother. "And so am I," said the child; "but I have got a very naughty think." "A naughty what?" "My think is naughty inside of me." And on her mother inquiring what she meant, she said: "Why, when I could not ride yesterday, I did not cry nor anything; but when you was gone I wished the carriage would turn over and the horses would run away and everything bad. Nobody knew it; but God knew it, and He cannot call me good. Tell me, mamma, how can I be good inside of me?" That was a question difficult for any one to answer who has not experienced the new birth (John 3:6).

An Expensive Estate.—"What is the Value of this estate?" said one gentleman to another with whom he was riding, as they passed a fine mansion surrounded by fair and fertile fields. "I don't know what it is valued at; I know what it cost its late possessor." "How much?" "His soul. Early in life, he professed faith in Christ, and obtained a subordinate position in a mercantile establishment. He continued to maintain a reputable religious profession till he became a partner in the firm. Then he gave less attention to religion, and more and more to business; and then the care of this world choked the word. He became exceedingly rich in money, but so poor and miserly in soul, that none would have suspected that he had ever been religious. At length he purchased the large estate referred to, built a costly mansion, sickened and died. Just before he died, he remarked, 'My prosperity has been my ruin.'" "What is a man profited if he shall gain the world, and lose his own soul?"

A School Principal's Daring Rescue.

HEROIC RESCUE BY A SCHOOLMISTRESS.

THE Albert Medal, which is given by the Queen of England for deeds of daring in the rescue of life, is a prize highly esteemed in Great Britain. It has recently been conferred on two persons whose heroism our illustrations on this page depict. The first is that of the principal of one of the common schools. Her heroic conduct is thus described in a notice in The London Gazette, the official organ of the British Government:

"The Queen has been graciously pleased to confer the Albert Medal of the second class on Miss Hannah Rosbotham, 23 years of age, assistant schoolmistress, Sutton National Schools. The following is an account of the services in respect of which the decoration is recommended: During a violent gale of wind on October 14th last, the stone belfry of the Sutton National Schools was blown down, and fell through the roof into the infants' schoolroom, where nearly 200 children were assembled, causing the death of one and injuring many others, and filling the room and its gallery with stones, slates, and timber.

"While others fled for safety, Miss Rosbotham—who at the time of the accident was teaching elsewhere—deliberately entered among the falling mass and cloud of dust, and, while fully conscious of the extreme danger to which she was exposed, remained on the spot until every child had been placed in safety. At the imminent risk of her own life, Miss Rosbotham removed four infants who were partially covered with the débris, and rescued therefrom a little girl who was completely buried, and who must have been suffocated had not such gallantry been displayed."

A CIVIL SERVANT'S HEROISM AT A FIRE.

THE Albert Medal has also been awarded to a clerk named Hinton, for gallantry exhibited at a fire at Hales Owen, England, in January, 1881, when he, at imminent risk to his own life, rescued from the flames a canister containing thirty pounds of blasting powder, and thereby saving a block of buildings, and, in all human probability, the sacrifice of a large number of lives.

It appears that Mr. Hinton, during the progress of the conflagration, ascertained from the proprietor of the building that there was a large quantity of oil and powder stored therein, and it was obvious that if the fire caught the powder a frightful catastrophe was inevitable. Mr. Hinton rushed inside, guided simply by verbal directions, and succeeded in securing several small canisters of gunpowder; but on regaining the street, scorched and half-stified, he was informed that a large canister of blasting powder was still in the burning building.

At the imminent risk of his life he dashed into the shop a second time, and after a short period of terrible suspense, for an explosion was momentarily expected, he found the deadly burden of which he was in search, and reappeared with it in his arms; and it is for this brave act that Mr. Hinton has just received the much-coveted reward, "The Albert Medal," which was presented to him in the name of Queen Victoria by Lord Lyttelton, a local magnate, at a large meeting of the inhabitants of Hales Owen.

A deed so noble as this deserved public recognition and the gentlemen who brought the matter under the notice of the Queen acted wisely. There is in the present day, both in England and this country, a rapidly growing spirit of selfish indifference to the welfare of others. Acts of kindness and disinterested efforts to benefit other people often provoke even in educated society a smile of contempt rather than of approbation. A man who foregoes his rights or who undertakes labor from which he can derive no profit, is looked upon as a simple-minded fool, and young people are quickly learning that the best way to obtain respect is to "take care of number one," and let the weak help themselves. To this spirit of selfishness the recognition of royalty which is highly valued by the English mind is a much-needed reproof.

The intrinsic value of the Albert Medal is small compared with the risk run by the brave man thus decorated. But no one regards the bit of gold given by the Queen as a payment for service. It is an indication that the Queen desires to distinguish a man who has performed a brave act, and it is intended to enlighten others who may be in danger of regarding acts of self-sacrifice as evidence of a weak and fanatical mind. The same principle should be active in the Christian Church. People are apt to wonder when they see men devote their time and labor to visiting the sick, trying to rescue the lost, working in the Sunday-school and preaching in the open-air when they might be taking much-needed rest of body and mind. The tendency to regard such men as fanatics is altogether too prevalent. Instead of despising them the Church ought to encourage and honor them, remembering that the King of kings has assured us that in the great day He will show them marked honor (Dan. 12 : 3).

GERALDINE'S COMMISSION.

HUGH CARSTON was a good specimen of a successful merchant. He had inherited at an early age a fair amount of capital, which was judiciously invested for him and which when he attained manhood he had put into trade. He was not accurately speaking, a religious man, though he recognized his responsibility for the wealth he possessed, and endeavored to make the homes and hearts of others happier by his generosity.

Mrs. Carston had been like sunshine to her husband and only daughter, Geraldine, but she died when Geraldine was just entering womanhood, leaving Hugh Carston a lonely, broken-spirited man. The light of his life had gone out, and for many months after his wife's death, in spite of all his daughter could do to cheer him, he spent his time in unavailing grief.

It is not difficult to understand why Mr. Carston was so overwhelmed. He had been taught when a boy by his pious mother that neither gifts of money nor a moral life would avail to save the soul. Many a time he had listened to sermons in which he was told that the only seed which would grow to life eternal is that planted by the Spirit in conversion. His dear dead wife also believed this, and he knew that she had during their years of union prayed constantly for his conversion. But he had been engaged heart and soul in business; he had his own way to make in the world, and he was convinced that success there, only comes to those who follow it with undivided attention. So he put off the consideration of religion until he should have made a fortune.

Mr. Carston reached middle life, his worldly fortune was secure, he had a beautiful home in the country, a devoted wife and a lovely daughter. Peace reigned all around him; now surely was the time to seek the Lord. Mr. Carston thought so, and he set about the business in the same way as he did when he insured his life. He wanted now to insure his soul, and he tried to recall the teachings he had listened to in his youth, and he made up his mind to talk to his wife about it. He could recollect the theory of salvation by faith, but as a business man he doubted whether that was sound. It did not seem reasonable to him. He had more faith in practical benevolence and gifts to the Bible Society and other religious enterprises. His past life seemed to him like an account in one of his own ledgers. On the debtor side were sundry trade tricks, venial sins, a little sharp practice here and there, a little negligence in the keeping of the Sabbath and nothing more. He read the commandments and examined his life and could find nothing more to enter against himself. On the credit side there was a very fair life as lives go. Strictly moral; he had wronged no man, he had defrauded no man. Looking at his life so, Mr. Carston decided that a munificent gift of money to a distinctly religious institution and a bequest of a further sum in his will, the two amounts aggregating a full tenth of his fortune, ought to balance the account between his God and himself.

Mrs. Carston heard these views with a saddened heart, and she begged him to apply to his life the higher rule, so that he might see how far it had fallen short of what God requires; and she prayed day and night that the Holy Spirit would enlighten him, would show him his lost condition, and force him to beg for mercy through Christ. While matters stood thus with Mr. Carston, his wife died very suddenly and he was alone with his daughter.

For many weeks Mr. Carston shut himself up in his own place and never stirred outside the gate of his garden. For hours together he remained in his library, and in the evening would wander about in his shrubby lonely and desolate. Geraldine carefully provided for his comfort, and knowing well all her mother had done for him, took care that in the household arrangements no little thing neglected should remind him of his loss. Beside this effort Geraldine was doing something else; she was praying for him. Three or four years ago she gave her heart to the Saviour, and many a time she had knelt by her mother's side and together the two women had prayed for the conversion of the man both so tenderly loved. Now that her mother was dead, Geraldine prayed alone, and she prayed that from the gloom of bereavement her father might come forth into the light of the Gospel.

One morning to Geraldine's surprise Mr. Carston said he should ride into the city. Since Mrs. Carston's death he had scarcely spoken to Geraldine except on ordinary matters connected with the household. That morning, however, noticing the look of surprise on Geraldine's face, he said, "My dear girl, forgive me. I have been selfish. In my grief I have forgotten how much you too have suffered. I have left you to bear your load alone, I—" but here his voice broke down and he wept long and bitterly. They were the first tears he had shed since his wife's death, and they were a relief to his pent-up woe. He said no more then, for his horse was brought round from the stables and he went out for his ride. Geraldine's thoughts were quick, and as she saw him cross the lawn an idea occurred to her that might lead to good. She tripped quickly across the grass and in a minute stood by the side of her father's horse, looking in her mourning dress, and her girlish face chastened by recent tears, more womanly than her father had ever seen her.

"Papa," she said, "would it trouble you too much to make a call in the city? You know the Watsons have gone there to live. Dear mamma was much concerned about them and she had a great regard for Mrs. Watson. I have heard nothing of them since they went to the city and I am sure if they are in trouble mamma would have liked us to help them. They are very poor and I should like for mamma's sake to give them a little help of my own. Will you give them this from me?" and she placed in Mr. Carston's hand a five-dollar gold piece. Mr. Carston, too, felt that this mission was congenial, for was it not something done out of regard for his dear dead wife? So he promised to call on the Watsons and give them Geraldine's gold piece.

The Watsons were people Mr. Carston knew well. Mr. Watson once occupied a handsome house not far from his own, but he had failed in business, had given up everything to his creditors, and had removed to the city with his sick wife and two daughters to begin life again as a clerk. Mr. Watson, however, was an earnest Christian man, and he bore his trial with Christian resignation.

Mr. Carston easily found their humble abode, and entering, saw that his daughter's fears as to their circumstances were well founded. They were very poor. Mr. Watson saved nothing from the wreck of his fortunes and had been unable to obtain employment. Worse than all the poverty, however, was the blow that had just fallen on the family in the death of Mrs. Watson, and the bereaved man seemed to Mr. Carston, as he entered, a very picture of misery. Remembering what an angel of light his wife would have seemed, entering on such a scene, he tried to do as she would have done and comfort the sorrowing man. The wealthy widower was stricken with the same grief as the destitute widower, but Mr. Carston could not help admitting that the man before him had a heavier burden than his own, for he was very poor. Almost the first few words he said, however, elicited a reply that surprised him. This man whom he was trying to comfort was a happier man than himself. "The Lord hath given and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord," were the words the suffering and bereaved Christian uttered. Mr. Carston had never been able to say that. The man's faith amazed him. He was attempting to console him on the dispensations of "an inscrutable Providence," and here was the man actually blessing the name of the Lord. What could be the cause of such a frame of mind?

Before Mr. Carston left that bereaved household he had learned much. He saw a light there which did more to alleviate sorrow than wealth had ever done for him, and as he rode slowly homeward he pondered the different circumstances in the two homes and the strange difference that religion had made. This "theory" of union with Christ, as he had been accustomed to call it, was something far more powerful than a theory, for it lightened a heavier burden than that the weight of which had crushed his own spirit. He resolved to know more of it, and soon Mr. Carston was a pretty constant visitor at the humble home of the Watsons. His influence in the city soon procured Mr. Watson honorable and lucrative employment, and so the Watsons profited by Mr. Carston's friendship. But what were Mr. Carston's profits? Eternity alone will reveal that to him. Religion, which had been only an empty theory to him before, which seen in action under exceptionally painful circumstances had astonished him by its power, became to him the mainspring of all his actions. Geraldine heard, and thanked God that the sudden thought which occurred to her on that particular morning and had led to her father's first visit to the stricken home had led to the result she and her dear departed mother had besought God for, for years. Her dear father was a Christian in heart and in life, and was now eagerly inquiring "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

The Most Miserable.

FELICITA pondered over the possibility of Roland having paid the penalty of his crime, and going back again to take up his life, walking more humbly in it evermore, with no claim to pre-eminence save that of most diligently serving his fellow-men. She endeavored to picture herself receiving him back again from the convict prison, with all its shameful memories branded on him, and looking upon him again as her husband and the father of her children; and she found herself crying out to her own heart that it would have been impossible to her. Phebe might have done it, but she—never!

The journey, though not more than fourteen miles from Stans to Engelberg, occupied several hours, so broken up was the narrow road by the winter's rains and the melting snow. The steep ascent between Grafenort and Engelberg was dangerous, the more so as a heavy thunderstorm broke over it; but Felicita remained insensible to any peril. At length the long, narrow valley lay before her, stretching upward to the feet of the rocky hills. The thunderstorm that had met her on the road had been raging fiercely in this mountain cauldron, and was but just passing away in long, low mutterings, echoed and prolonged amid the precipitous walls of rock. Tall, trailing, spectre-like clouds slowly followed each other in solemn and stately procession up the valley, as though amid their light yet impenetrable folds of vapor they bore the invisible form of some mysterious being; whether in triumph or in sorrow it was impossible to tell. The sun caught their gray crests and tinged them with rainbow colors; and as they floated softly and unhastily along, the valley behind them seemed to spring into a new life of sunshine and mirth.

It was past noon when Felicita was driven up to the hotel in the village. She told the driver she would be ready to return to Stans as soon as the horses were rested; and then she wandered out into the village street, thinking she might come across some peasant at work alone, or some woman standing idly at her door, with whom she could fall into a casual conversation, and learn what she had come to ascertain. But she met with no solitary villager; and she strayed onward, almost unwittingly in the direction of the cemetery.

In passing by the church, she pushed open one of the heavy swinging doors and cast a glance round; there was no one in sight, but the gabble of boys' voices in some vestry close by reached her ear, and a laugh rang after it which echoed noisily in the quiet aisles. The high altar was lit up by a light from a side window, and her eye was arrested by it. Still, whether she saw and heard, or was deaf and blind, she scarcely knew. Her feet were drawn by some irresistible attraction toward the grave where her husband was not buried.

She did not know in what corner of the graveyard it was to be found; and when she entered the small enclosure, with its wooden cross at the head of every narrow mound, she stood still for a minute or two, hesitatingly, and looking before her with a bewildered and reluctant air, as if engaged in an enterprise she recoiled from. A young priest was passing to and fro with his breviary in his hands and his lips moving as if in prayer; but at the unexpected sight of an English traveller thus early in the season, his curiosity was aroused, and he bent his steps toward her. When he was sufficiently near to catch her wandering eye, he spoke in a quiet and courteous manner.

"Is madame seeking for any special spot?" he inquired.

"Yes," answered Felicita fastening upon him her large sad eyes, which had dark rings below them, intensifying the mournfulness of their expression; "I am looking for a grave, the grave of a stranger, Roland Sefton. I have come from England to find it."

Her voice was constrained and low; and the words came in brief, panting syllables, which sounded almost like sobs. The priest looked closely and scrutinizingly into the pallid face turned toward him, which was as rigid as marble, except for the gleam of the dark eyes.

"Madame is suffering; she is ill!" he said.

"No; not ill," answered Felicita, in an absent manner, as if she was speaking in a dream; "but of all women the most miserable."

It seemed to him that the English lady was not aware of what words she uttered. He felt embarrassed and perplexed; all the English were heretics, and how heretics could be comforted or counselled he did not know. But the dreamy sadness of her face appealed to his compassion. The only thing he could do for her was to guide her to the grave she was seeking.

For the last nine months no hand had cleared away the weeds from around it, or the moss from gathering upon it. The little pathway trodden by Jean Merle's feet was overgrown, though still perceptible, and the priest walked along it with Felicita following him. Little threads of green were filling up the deep clear-cut lettering on the cross; and gray and yellow lichens were creeping over the granite. Since the snow had melted, and the sun had shone hotly into the high-lying valley, there had been a rapid growth of vegetation here as everywhere else, and the weeds and grass had flourished luxuriantly; but among them Alice's slip of ivy had thrown out new buds and tendrils. The priest paused before the grave, with Felicita standing beside him silent and spell-bound. She did not weep or cry, or fling herself upon the ground beside it as he had expected. When he looked askance at her marble face there was no trace of emotion upon it; excepting that her lips moved very slightly as if they formed the words inscribed upon the cross.

"It is not in good order just at present," he said, breaking the oppressive silence. "The peasant who took charge of it, Jean Merle, disappeared from Engelberg last summer, and has never since been seen or heard of. They say he was paid to take care of this grave; and truly when he was here there was no weed, no soil, no little speck of moss upon it. There was no other grave kept like this. Was Roland Sefton a relative of Madame?"

"Yes!" she whispered, or he thought she whispered it from the motion of her lips.

"Madame is not a Catholic?" he asked.

Felicita shook her head.

"What a pity! what a pity!" he continued, in a tone of mild regret, "or I could console her. Yet I will pray the good God and the Mother of Sorrows to give her comfort. If she only knew the solace of opening her heart, even to a fellow-mortal!"

"Does no one know where Jean Merle is," she asked, in a low but clear, penetrating voice which startled him, he said afterward, almost as much as if the image of the Blessed Virgin had spoken to him. With the effort to speak a slight color flushed across the pale, wan face, and her eyes fastened eagerly upon him.

"No one, Madame," he replied; "the poor man was a misanthrope, and lived here quite alone in misery. He came neither to confession nor to mass; but whether he was a heretic or an atheist no man knew. Where he came from, or where he went to, was known only to himself. But they think he must have perished on the mountains, for he disappeared suddenly last August. His little hut is falling into ruins; it was too poor a place for anybody but him."

"I must go there; where is it?" she inquired, turning abruptly away from the grave, without a tear or a prayer, he observed.

The spell that had bound her seemed broken, and she looked agitated and hurried. There was more vigor and decision in her face and manner than he could have believed possible a few minutes before. She was no longer a marble image of despair.

"If Madame will go quite through the village," he answered, "it is the last house on the way to Stans. But it cannot be called a house; it is a ruin. It stands apart from all the rest, like an accursed spot; for no person will go near it. If Madame goes, she will find no one there."

With a quick yet stately gesture of farewell Felicita turned away, and walked swiftly down the little path, not running, but moving so rapidly that she was soon out of sight. By-and-by, when he had had time to think over the interview and to recover from his surprise, he followed her; but he saw nothing of her; only the miserable hovel where Jean Merle lived, into which she had probably found an entrance.

Felicita had learned something of what she had come to discover. Jean Merle had been living in Engelberg until the last summer, though now he had disappeared. Perished on the mountains! Oh! could that be true? It was likely to be true. He had always been a daring mountaineer, when there was every motive for him to be careful of his life; and now what could make it precious to him? There was no other reason for suddenly breaking off the thread of his life here in Engelberg; for Felicita had never imagined it possible that he would return to England. If he had disappeared he must have perished on the mountains.

Yet there was no relief to her in the thought. If she had heard in England that he was dead, there would have been a sense of deliverance, and a secret consciousness of real freedom, which would have made her future course lie before her in brighter and more tranquil light. She would at last be what she seemed to be. But here, amid the scenes of his past life, there was a deep compunction in her heart, and a profound pity for the miserable man, whose neighbors knew nothing about him but that he had vanished out of their sight. That she should come to seek him and find not even his grave, oppressed her with anguish, as she passed along the village street, till she saw the deserted hut standing apart, like an accursed place, the fit dwelling of an outcast.

The short ladder that led to it was half-broken; but she could climb it easily, and the upper part of the door was partly open, and swinging lazily to and fro in the light breeze that was astir after the storm. There was no difficulty in unfastening the bolt which held the lower half, and Felicita stepped into the low room.

She stood for awhile, how long she did not know, gazing forward with wide-open, motionless eyes, the brain scarcely conscious of seeing through them, though the sight before her was reflected on their dark and glistening surface. A corner of the roof had fallen in during the winter, and a stream of bright light shone through it, irradiating the dim and desolate interior. The abject poverty of her husband's dwelling-place was set in broad daylight. The windowless walls, the bare black rafters overhead, the rude bed of juniper branches and ferns, the log seat, rough as it had come out of the forest; she saw them all as if she saw them not, so busy was her brain that it could take no notice of them just now.

So busy was it that all her life seemed to be hurrying and crowding and whirling through it, with swift pictures starting into momentary distinctness, and dying suddenly to give place to others. It was a terrifying and enthralling phantasmagoria which held her spell-bound on the threshold of this ruined hovel, her husband's last shelter.

At last she roused herself, and stepped forward hesitatingly. Her eyes had fallen upon a book or two at the end of a shelf as black as the walls—and books had always called to her with a voice that could not be resisted. She crept slowly and feebly across the mouldering planks of the floor, through which she could see the grass springing on the turf below the hut. But when she lifted up the mildewed and dust-covered volume lying uppermost, and opened it, her eyes fell first upon her own portrait, stained, faded, nearly blotted out, yet herself, as she was when she became Roland Sefton's wife.

She sank down, faint and trembling, on the rough block of wood, and leaned back against the mouldy walls, with the photograph in her hand and her eyes fastened upon it. His mother's portrait and his children's he had given up as evidence of his death; but he had never parted with hers. Oh, how he had loved her! Would to God she had loved him as dearly! But she had forsaken him, had separated him from her as one who was accursed, and whose very name was a malediction.

She had exacted the uttermost farthing from him, his mother, his children, his home, his very life—to save her name from dishonor. It seemed as if this tarnished, dishonored picture of herself, cherished through all his misery and desolation, spoke more deeply and poignantly to her than anything else could do. She fancied she could see him, the wayworn, haggard, weather-beaten peasant, as she had seen him last, sitting there, with the black walls shutting him out from all the world, but holding this portrait in his hands, and looking at it as she did now. And he had perished on the mountains!

Suddenly all the whirl of her brain grew quiet, the swift thoughts ceased to rush across it. She felt dull and benumbed, as if she could no longer exert herself to remember, or to know anything.

Her eyes were weary of seeing, and the lids drooped over them. The light had become dim, as if the sun had already set. Her ears were growing heavy, as though no sound could ever disturb her again, when a bitter and piercing cry, such as is seldom drawn from the heart of man, penetrated through all the lethargy creeping over her. Looking up, with eyes that opened slowly and painfully, she saw her husband bending over her. A smile of exceeding sweetness and tenderness flitted across her face, and she tried to stretch out both her hands toward him. But the effort was the last faint token of life. They had found one another again too late.

She had not uttered a word to him; but her smile and the tender gesture of her dying hands had spoken more than words. He stood motionless, gazing down upon her, and upon Phebe, who had thrown herself beside her, and was encircling her with her arms, as if she could snatch her away from the relentless grasp of death. A single cry of anguish had escaped him, but he was dumb now; and no sound was heard in the silent hut, except those that entered it from without. Phebe did not know what had happened; but he knew. Quite clearly, without any hope, or any self-deception, he knew that Felicitia was dead.

The dread of it had haunted him from the moment that he had heard of her hurried departure in quest of him. When he read Phebe's few words, imploring him to follow them, the recollection had flashed across him of how the thread of Lord Riversford's life had snapped under the strain of unusual anxiety and fatigue. Felicitia's own delicate health had been failing for some months past. As swiftly as he could follow he had pursued them; but her impatient and feverish haste had prevented him from overtaking them in time. What might have been the result if he had reached her sooner he could not tell; that there could ever have been any knitting together again of the tie that had once united them seemed impossible. Death alone, either hers or his, could have touched her heart to the tenderness of her farewell smile and gesture.

S.S. Lesson for July 9, Mark 10: 17-31. Golden Text, ver. 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN the beginning of our subject for to-day we read, "When He [Jesus] was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to Him, and asked Him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" It was not by chance that Jesus met with this young man. His Father awakened His ear morning by morning (Isa. 50: 4) to hear and know His will, and His daily life was to "do always those things which please Him" (John 8: 29). He made no plans of His own, and therefore His and His Father's never clashed; He was what He calls us to be, a ready instrument in the hands of God to carry out His will. When ear and eye are open to God, we are able to understand what He is doing, and to fall in with His plans in a loving, trusting, intelligent manner; and thus every circumstance has a voice for us, every incident speaks, we see the guiding hand at work, and all the powers of men and devils, and all the elements of nature subject to, and working out His will.

The question put to Jesus was that which is the cry of every awakened soul. "What shall I do? is ever rising up in such hearts. I see a blessing which I do not possess, how can I obtain it? what is its cost? what does it entail?" The enquirer knew nothing beyond the law, and Jesus took him on his own ground—that of the commandments. But first He brought him to reality about his way of addressing Him, "Good Master," or Teacher, and said, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one—God." It was as though our beloved Lord would give him an opportunity to recognize Him. But it was in vain, the young man was

and had no thoughts for Him. How do we name God? Almighty? Then how inexpressibly inconsistent is it in us to have a thought of unbelief in our hearts. Is He good? Then how can we give way to distrust in any circumstance? Is He perfect? Then how can anything fail which He undertakes? The very naming of God by any of His attributes is to pledge ourselves to take Him as that to us and for us, otherwise we are taking that name of God in vain.

Brought face to face with God's commandments, those which contained his duty toward man, this enquirer answered and said, "Master, all these have I observed from my youth." Undoubtedly he was in earnest, he had, like Paul, "lived in good conscience toward God" as far as his light went, but there existed in him a strong consciousness of something wanting; he had not what he sought. Probably no man could find fault with him; he was up to, and beyond, the average, even of religious men; but he could not say, "I have eternal life." He was ready to do anything, any "good thing," as he said (Matt. 19: 16), but the Lord wanted not his good things but himself. God was not going to strike bargains with him, but to conquer him and take possession. God would not go shares with him in that which he had, but would empty him of all he was and had, and then fill the void with Himself.

At every stage of our spiritual life, this controversy takes place. We want to take another step, we offer our little, be it experience, power, riches, faith, and seek to stretch it out to the requirements of a nearer life with God, and the answer of our God when we come with our need to Him is just that of Jesus to the young ruler: "One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, take up the cross, and follow me." "Sell whatsoever thou hast." Let yourself be stripped, be willing to be nothing and to have nothing, to make God owner of all you are and have, and see what He can make of it. The ruler might have said, "But if I give up all I have, my power to be benevolent is taken from me at once." A worker who has gloried in his success, when the Lord has called him to give up his work and to be nothing, feels that if it is taken away he may as well die, there is nothing to live for. This is just where our Lord would bring us.

BUT IT WON'T DO,

A man who has sought to obtain justification by his own merits and righteousness must, as we well know, learn that he is a lost sinner, and that all his righteousnesses are as filthy rags. A man who is seeking complete cleansing and power over present temptation, must come to a full surrender of himself, and all he is and has, as the first necessity, otherwise God has no purchase over him. A man seeking the fulness of the Spirit must become utterly nothing, and when he has thus lost all that he has, then the Spirit of God can possess and use him. Equally true is it that one who seeks healing from the Lord must learn to abandon spirit, soul, and body completely into the hands of God, for His will and His purposes, must cease to nurse or doctor, plan or calculate; and then, when he is fully abandoned to Him, Jesus comes in with pardon, with cleansing, with power, with healing.

This young ruler had not anticipated such terms as these: "He was sad at that saying, and went away grieved; for he had great possessions." No doubt his plan had been to retain the power which was in his hands, to be master of his property, and then, in a lordly way to distribute it and gain credit for it; but to cease to be a proprietor, to lose his position, to have remarks passed upon him as being one of that vulgar set who followed Jesus of Nazareth—no, this was too much, this could not be, his pride would not brook it. Anything consistent with his position, anything which the leading priests would assent to, O yes; but these eccentric people whom everybody remarks, I could not become one of them.

But the Lord says, "Come, take up the cross, and follow me," that pride of thine, those riches of thine, that position of thine, that appearance of thine, are standing in the way of my glory and of thy blessing, sell them all, give them all, part with them all, come and live for me, take up thy cross, as I have taken mine, and let thy vocation be to follow me. I have left my riches for thee, leave thine for me. I have left my position for thee; am I worthy that thou shouldst leave thine for me? I, the King of glory, am without form or comeliness for thee, wilt thou give up appearance for me? Come, it is worth while; take up thy cross, it will answer in the end, and follow thou me." But

HE COUNTED THE COST TOO DEAR.

"And Jesus looked round about, and saith unto His disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" The disciples were not prepared for such an announcement, they were astonished, and He repeated with explanation, "Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!"

Silver, gold, houses, lands, business, these are not the only riches in which men trust; anything which is an apparent advantage, and on which we place dependence, is a thing to be surrendered to Jesus. It is not our works or our possessions but ourselves which He wills, that He may mould us, and out of our nothingness make a new creation for His glory. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." In man's poverty, God has His riches, for He can manifest the wealth of His resources; He is always seeking to manifest Himself, and the very purpose of our existence is the manifestation of God. The Lord Jesus went on to say, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." If a camel entered under one of the small obelisks which were called needles, he must kneel down and crawl, and it was with great difficulty, because of his size and height; and thus every one who possesses anything in which he trusts, must come down, must become nothing, in order to enter into the kingdom of God.

The disciples were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves (or to Him), "Who then can be saved? And Jesus looking upon them, saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God; for with God all things are possible." It is against every bit of man's nature thus to strip himself, the very life of our nature is self, and if self goes, all goes. Yes, thank God, let it go, for with God, in His nature, all things are possible. Now we get from finite to infinite. Let God replace the money, strength, talent, influence, or whatever may be the riches in which we have trusted, and then illimitable possibilities lie before us.

Peter, who like many another since his time began to apply the lesson to himself and to his own advantage, said, "Lo, we have left all and followed Thee," as though to say, "At any rate

WE ARE ON THE RIGHT TRACK."

"And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the Gospel's, but he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life."

Every one who has had experience of giving up anything for God will understand the blessed truth of these words. None repays like God, there is nothing given up for Him which is not amply, richly repaid. Have we been persecuted by brothers and sisters, God gives us brethren and sisters in Christ more than we can number, and dear as our own lives; whenever for conscience' sake we have to endure the disapprobation of father or mother, how blessedly He raises us up fathers and mothers in the Gospel. If we give up our property for Him, how tenderly He cares for our every want; there is something feminine in the tenderness of our loving God when we run apparent risks for His sake; but He promises us nothing without persecutions. "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord" (Matt. 10: 25). "But many that are first shall be last and the last first." Those whom men reckon first, leading ministers, far-famed preachers, gifted men, men of note, these may all be last, and the last first; for God's thoughts are not as ours. Let us be gladly last in our own eyes and those of others, for so alone can we be God's first ones.

Engineer Melville's Discovery of the Bodies of Lieutenant De Long and his party is fully described in the later telegrams now received. Melville states that under about a foot of snow they found the bodies of De Long and Dr. Ambler about three feet apart, and Ah Sam lying at their feet, all partially covered by pieces of tent and a few pieces of blanket. The other bodies were close at hand. None of the dead had boots. Their feet were covered with rags, tied on. In the pockets of all were pieces of burnt skin and of the clothing which they had been eating. The hands of all were more or less burned, and it looked as if when dying they had crawled into the fire, Boyd lying over the fire and his clothing being burned through to the skin, which was not burned. Collins' face was covered with a cloth. All the bodies were carried to the top of a hill three hundred feet high, about forty versts to the southwest from where they were found, and there interred in a mausoleum constructed of wood from the scow, built in the form of a pyramid twenty-two feet long and seven high, surmounted by a cross twenty-two feet high and a foot square, hewn out of drift-wood, and conspicuous at a distance of twenty versts. The mausoleum was covered with stones and is to be sodded in the spring. The cross is inscribed with the record and names of the dead, cut in by the search party.

An Armed Rising in Ireland is Apprehended by the government. A telegram dated June 20th, says, "Instructions are being given to commanding officers in all the great military centres in the south and west, as well as in Dublin, regarding the course to be pursued in the event of a rising. In the present critical state of affairs it is felt that the authorities are wise in preparing for any emergency. Numerous police and military patrols are on duty nightly in Limerick. Admission to the military barracks throughout Ireland is prohibited. All the usual sentries have been doubled and precautions have been taken against explosives being taken into military quarters. Mr. Trevelyan, the Secretary for Ireland, said on June 23d, in the House of Commons, that "every day brought forward fresh reasons to regard the present position of the country, not with fear, but with the deepest and increasing anxiety."

A Denunciation of Mr. Michael Davitt and his scheme for the nationalization of the land of Ireland is published in the Dublin Freeman's Journal by Mr. Harris, a member of the Land League, one of the suspects who for nine months was imprisoned in Kilmainham Jail. Mr. Harris contends that Mr. Davitt's scheme will not satisfy any class of people in Ireland. He believes it would be opposed by the farmers because they would have no guarantee that they would get their rents lowered, or if lowered, fixed, while it would deprive them of all prospect of becoming proprietors. The middle and moneyed classes would be against the scheme, because they, naturally enough, regard it as the first step toward holding property in common. The landed gentry would oppose it because it would blot them out altogether. "Proceeding on we come to the most important element of all—namely, the masses of the people, or those who have nothing to rely on but the labor of their hands in Ireland. This class are nationalists at heart, and will oppose the scheme, which is undoubtedly opposed to their principles."

Anarchy still Prevails in Egypt. The flight of foreigners from the country has caused the suspension of all public works. The men engaged in them are now without employment and their manner indicates their readiness for any desperate enterprise. The safety of all the American residents and visitors is assured. The London Standard's correspondent at Alexandria reports that, owing to rumors of fresh calamities, the exodus of Europeans has recommenced. Admiral Seymour has made arrangements for the landing of a force of men in the event of another riot. Many Americans have left Alexandria in a vessel chartered by the captain of the United States steamer Galena. He also says that he is informed on the best authority that if France and England interfere actively in Egyptian affairs Arabi Pacha will blow up the Suez Canal, cut the railway to Cairo, and oppose the landing of European troops in Alexandria. If beaten he will retire to the desert, where he is promised the support of 30,000 Bedouins, partisans of Prince Halim. The Egyptian Ministry are prepared to sanction this programme on patriotic grounds.

The Probability of English Intervention in Egypt is reported. The Pall Mall Gazette, an English ministerial journal, published on June 23d an article in reference to the organization of a military expedition to Egypt, in which it assumes that the expedition has been already decided on. This belief is very general among members of parliament. An additional proof of the imminence of war is the heavy fall which has taken place in the government bonds. The plan which it is supposed England would pursue in the event of active hostilities breaking out would be to seize both ends of the Suez Canal and place guards at intervals, leaving Egypt proper to the settlement of its own affairs. If Arabi alone were to be consulted this plan would settle the question satisfactorily; but, it is stated that Italy strongly objects to the preponderance of England and France in Egypt, and is actively promoting the combination between Turkey, Germany and Austria to prevent the intervention of the Western Powers. The Conference which is now assembled at Constantinople and is sitting with closed doors will not consider the question of the Suez Canal, but will discuss only the best mode of enforcing order and the relations at present existing between Egypt and Turkey.

Another Nihilist Plot has been Discovered in Russia. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the New York Herald telegraphs that the police have seized thirty-eight pounds of nitro-glycerine and 120 pounds of dynamite in a house searched on June 22d, besides a quantity of bombs of the newest pattern, ten of which were loaded. Among the persons arrested are several naval officers and a Jewess. It is said also that an operetta singer is implicated in the plot. A Major of Hussars arrested had for some time been suspected and watched by the police. Agents disguised as coachmen followed him wherever he went, and without knowing it he had repeatedly been driven about by his spies. Latterly, too, he had unsuspectingly made himself a friend of the police agent, whom he was in the habit of meeting at a restaurant. Up to the present time about eighty persons have been arrested.

A Report that War has Broken out in Zululand is current in Europe. An English journal says, "A despatch from Durban announces that a civil war has commenced in Zululand. A large army under Dabuko, brother of Cetewayo, has defeated the chiefs Usibepu and Oham. It is expected that Dabuko will attack John Dunn." It will be remembered that at the conclusion of the late war between Great Britain and that country it was predicted that there would be civil war of an exterminating character before five years elapsed.

The Block in the Irish Land Courts Still continues. At the end of last month no fewer than 76,387 causes had been entered for hearing, of which number 664 had been dismissed and 469 had been withdrawn, thus leaving 75,256 to be dealt with. Of these latter, 4,449 have been decided, but nearly 1500 of them went afterward to appeal, and only 247 of the appeals have been settled. Hence, about 72,000 cases remain untouched.

The Settlement of Jews in Palestine is thus discussed in the Jewish Chronicle, the leading organ of English Jews. "The precautions which the Turkish Government are taking to prevent the settlement of Jews in Palestine postpone for the present the realization of the aspirations of the great mass of the Russian and Roumanian Jews. The Eastern Question is about to open, and the position of things will shortly be so unsettled that under any circumstances emigration to Palestine would have been attended with danger and difficulty. But all this may clear the way to Palestine under more favorable circumstances than have ever before existed. This question bears upon the Eastern situation generally, and the ultimate solution of the Jewish problem in Russia may be in the settlement of the race in their old land. This Egyptian question seems to be the beginning of the end. The old story about danger to be apprehended for the Jewish settlers in Palestine from Bedouins is not worthy of much consideration. There are splendid tracts both in Palestine and Syria where the inhabitants have never seen a Bedouin, and where the Bedouins are as likely to visit as Finsbury Square. Of course some may prefer sending their co-religionists to live in Texas, but even to that desirable consummation the difficulty of transport causes considerable obstacles. There is a whole nation of millions of people to be provided for. The great majority have turned their eyes to the South. It is not a question of encouraging them to go, but of seeing that they do not starve after going."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are still working in Glasgow with many tokens of Divine blessing. Mr. and Mrs. Willson, of New York, assisting Mr. Sankey in the singing. One visitor to the meetings says: "For more than an hour before the time of the weekly mass meeting in the evening we noticed the people moving into the Circus to secure good seats. We roamed about the neighboring streets, laying our hands on many whose dissipated looks proved their need of 'Great Deliverer,' and, like several others similarly engaged in gathering in the careless, we did labor in vain. Not a rough word was spoken to us, and not one refused our kind invitation. Every corner was filled. A great tea-meeting of reform drunkards was held on Tuesday, June 6th, in the Glasgow City Hall."

The Rev. W. M. H. Aitken, the Emine English revival preacher, whose sermons have occasionally been published in these columns, has met with a serious accident, which will incapacitate him from fulfilling his summer engagements. It appears that on June 1st, he was riding upon a tricycle not far from Bedford, and was going uphill, when he missed his footing on the treadle, the crank and he fell forward, his machine falling over on him. He was attended on the spot by a surgeon who discovered that Mr. Aitken had broken his left thigh. He was removed to Bedford where the fracture was set and he is now reported to be making progress toward recovery.

A New Temperance Bishop has been Added to the list of English prelates who are abstainers. In an editorial upon the appointment of Canon Ernest Wilberforce to the Bishopric of Newcastle a prominent journal says: "For several years has been a most untiring member of the Council of the Church of England Temperance Society, advocating its claims in the pulpit and on the platform with conspicuous eloquence, intense earnestness, and self-sacrificing devotion. Bishop Wilberforce will make the seventh abstaining bishop (exclusive of colonials), and, like his brethren of Exeter, Gloucester, Rochester, Durham, Dover, and Bedford, will no doubt speedily experience that to abstinence is, in some degree at least, a help to the faithful discharge of the duties of the office of bishop."

A Persecution of Native Christians has broken out in China. The Rev. G. Stott of Weichow, China, says that for some months Christians there have been suffering severe persecution. In one village they have been set upon again and again by a crowd of roughs, their doors torn down and taken away, every article in their houses more or less broken, and all their cooking utensils carried off; and the friendly neighbors have been threatened if they helped them. These Christians have also been very badly beaten, some of them four or five times. One man was beaten so badly that he could not stand, and then dragged along the road by the queue, and thrown into a cesspool. One woman was also treated in a dreadful manner and abused till she fainted, and then some of the persecutors carried drain-water in a bucket, and drenched her from head to foot. At another place the house of one of the Christians was twice set on fire because he would not contribute to the support of the God of Fire. He is now driven from his home, with his family, and completely ruined. They need sympathy and prayer.

It is impossible for the Christian to live a consistent life in this world unless he constantly and persistently looks to God for wisdom and strength. Whatever his vocation in life, temptations, open and disguised, surround him, and he is in danger of falling into sin and causing a reproach to be cast on the name of his Saviour. Watchful eyes are always upon him; more is expected of him than is expected of other men, and there are ever about him men ready to see and publish any inconsistent act, and who would rejoice in his fall. Worse than that there are enemies of religion who make it their chief delight to misrepresent his words and actions, and to set them in such a light as distorts them and causes them to appear other than what they are. The Christian must expect to be thus misunderstood, and must not be surprised if the world, and even his fellow Christians who ought to know better, judge him harshly, suspect him of unworthy motives, and without good reason condemn and malign him. It is, therefore, especially important that in whatever condition we may be placed we may not forget these facts, but give especial care and pray unceasingly for the help of God that we may not only avoid evil, but the very appearance of evil, lest we give occasion to the enemies of Christ to blaspheme.

In no position is this constant watchfulness more necessary than in the Christian soldier. The army is in all countries an attraction to men of idle and vicious character, who drift into it as an occupation congenial to their dispositions, and who hope to find there congenial associates. Among such men a soldier or an officer who has made a profession of religion is in sad case. If he is divinely guided and guarded he may do much good, but if he is easily led aside, easily influenced by his surroundings, heedless of his walk and conversation, he may do infinite harm. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week gives the portrait and life of an officer so placed, who by the grace of God was upheld in all his paths and who was enabled to do much good at a very trying time.

General Charles Alfred Browne was an officer who for thirty years resided in Madras, India, and latterly filled the high positions of Adjutant-General, and Secretary to the Government in the Military Department (posts equivalent to that of Secretary of the War Department in this country). His name was a household word in Madras, yet but few were intimate with him. He was known to be a man of deep religious principle and practice; but at the outset of his Christian career he shunned society, and, in self denying habits, was different from all around him, and, as he afterward admitted, was at one period of his life more of a monk than a Protestant.

General Browne went to India in 1820, and was from the first recognized as a remarkable young man. Though only of middle height, he was possessed of extraordinary strength and activity. Genial in disposition, he was full of life and fond of society, in which, however, he did not indulge, being very ambitious, and fearing that his attendance at balls and parties would interfere with his studies. He had great application, but this was surpassed by his powers of endurance. His abilities soon attracted the attention of Colonel Conway the Adjutant-General, who had him appointed Adjutant of the depot of the regiments engaged in the first Burmese war. At this depot he had charge of 4000 Sepoys and of the young officers who were being drilled for service before joining their respective regiments in Burmah.

APPLICATION TO DUTY AND CONVERSION.

So engrossing were his duties in this office, and so conscientious was he in their performance that on one occasion he was, for two weeks, twenty-two hours each day either on horseback or standing at his desk. He never sat down, and slept for only two hours out of the twenty-four. A swollen side and blisters were the results of this defiance of the requirement of nature; but even a severe attack did not lay him aside; and he at length obtained the ardent desire of his heart, permission to join his regiment in Rangoon. To his deep regret he found on his arrival that the war was virtually at an end. Having no books to occupy his time, he amused himself by getting his body tattooed almost all over with the pictures of wild animals. These figures never could be effaced, and were, as he always said, a memento of his youthful folly.

After the return of the troops from Burnah, Adjutant Browne's regiment was stationed in Quilon, where, about the year 1827-28, he was awakened to the paramount importance of eternal realities; and shortly after being appointed to Madras he was brought into the full assurance and joy of the Gospel, through the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Ridsdale. From an early period he had an enthusiastic, almost romantic, desire to go to Persia, as affording scope for his enterprising and ambitious spirit; and in order to prepare himself for the hardships of a wild uncivilized life, he commenced what he thought the best kind of training. He slept on a wooden bed with a plank for his pillow, as shown on the left side of the upper portion of the frontispiece, and denied himself not only the luxuries but the comforts of civilized life. This practice he continued after his conversion, which of course became generally known, and was considered to be part of his religion—in fact, Popish mortification of the body to save the soul.

SACRIFICES A DESIRABLE APPOINTMENT.

When he was remonstrated with upon these habits, his reply was "Why should I, as a Christian, indulge in luxuries which I relinquished from pure military ambition?" It was very remarkable, that when the coveted appointment to Persia was offered to him he declined it. It came to him after his conversion, when his motives and desires were radically changed. He sought the appointment as a means to gratify his ambition, whereas he now felt the appointment was useless to him because he could do nothing there for God's glory and the good of his fellow-creatures.

Previous to his conversion his liberal acts were of a refined kind; and he so utterly abhorred what appeared ostentation in giving money, that he made it a rule to help others in a secret way that could not be detected; and, at that time he gloried that in this respect he was superior to those around him. Till the day of his death he was simple and economical, giving all he could save for benevolence, public and private. One of his constant acts of kindness to his friends "up country," was the care he took of their wives and children when they were going to and returning from Europe, always going on board with those departing, and to meet those returning.

APPOINTED HON. SEC. TO THE C. M. SOCIETY.

Upon the sudden death from cholera of Mr. Ridsdale, the clergyman to whom, under God, he owed his conversion, and the broken-down health of Mr. Bannister, the honorary secretary to the Church Missionary Society, Captain Browne was led, in 1832, to undertake all the secretarial duties, which involved voluminous correspondence, both with the missionaries and the Home Committee. This work he usually commenced after his military duties for the day were completed, which frequently was not until about midnight, and he sometimes labored on, pen in hand until five o'clock in the morning. This pressure could not, however, last long. He was relieved of the secretaryship in the beginning of 1833, by the arrival of the Rev. John Tucker, who was appointed to that office, but Captain Browne continued to advise and assist the new secretary.

An intimate friend of General Browne, General Dobbs, describing the constant desire evinced by his friend to engage in Christian work, says: "One day as we were walking home from church, he observed a number of well-dressed, intelligent boys and girls playing in the street, and said, 'Could we not do something for the spiritual good of these neglected children?' (Our picture on the right of the portrait in the upper portion of the frontispiece depicts the scene.) Having been engaged in Sunday-school work before I left home, I replied, 'Why not commence a Sunday-school? This we at once decided on,' and obtained the use of the neighboring London Mission chapel, from 3 to 4 P.M. on Sundays. In this natural way commenced the in conducting which, with much divine blessing, we were assisted by Charles Dunhill, a pious young military clerk. The zeal of the Chaplain Verey being stirred up by our example, he commenced a school in the church, from 10 to 11 A.M., in which also we gladly taught, as the hour did not interfere with our own school. Brown subsequently formed another Sunday-school at Blacktown, in connection with the Church Missionary chapel there. From this small beginning Sunday-school instruction spread over the whole Presidency."

In 1834, the health of General Browne gave way under his overwhelming labors and excessive alertness. He had no actual disease, but was a complete breaking down of a powerful constitution. His body became of a purple color, and his limbs and bones were racked with pain, which deprived him of rest both day and night. The doctors gave him morphia to promote sleep; but this so stupefied his mind that he preferred to suffer the excruciating pain to having his communion with God disturbed. As there was no prospect of his recovery the medical authorities ordered him to Australia; and as there was no ship about to sail for that colony, he embarked for the Mauritius in a small French vessel.

THE POSITION OF CHRISTIANS IN THE ARMY.

In the end of 1835, he returned to Madras with restored health, and a few months later, in a letter to his friend, General Dobbs, he expressed his views on a subject which was at that time agitating the minds of Christians in India, and led a few both of the civil and military service, to resign their service of Government. The question was whether a Christian was justified in remaining in a position where he might be required to perform duties which his conscience disapproved of. The two friends agreed that the professed principles of the English Government did not require any man to perform any act which the Word of God clearly condemned; and as long as they individually were not called to countenance Hindoo and Mahomedan feasts and such like acts, they could, with a clear conscience, continue in office; while prepared to disobey and suffer the consequences, if ordered by their superiors to do what they believed to be morally wrong.

In 1836 General Browne resumed his appointment in the Adjutant-General's office, and was soon promoted from the rank of Assistant to that of Deputy; he also resumed his labors in connection with the Church Missionary Society, not only in committee, but also as honorary secretary during Mr. Tucker's absence in England on sick certificate. The influence he exercised for good over the East Indian or Eurasian community was most remarkable. This class have, from their position been always very sensitive and easily offended by real or apparent slights, at the same time ever grateful for kindness and consideration shown to them. General Browne, with the genuine kindness of an earnest Christian, and the noble spirit of one who sought not and assumed not any superiority, either as secretary, committee-man, or Sunday-school teacher, brought his high intellectual powers and extensive experience so to bear on every question that his views always prevailed—no one feeling his self-love wounded by thinking that he was under the control of a master-mind. His abilities were admired, but he was loved ever more than he was admired.

A letter to General Dobbs, written three months after his return from Australia, shows that his expectation of happiness in a recluse life was not gratified, and to the great satisfaction of all his friends he was married to Miss Ormsby, long known as an experienced Christian woman, and blessed with a sweet, amiable disposition—one truly calculated to be a helpmeet to him. The Brownes' house now took the place of Bachelors' Hall, a loving family residence, where the simplicity as ll as the hospitality of Bachelors' Hall was well intained. There were as many entertainments en in the house as when it was "Bachelors' ll," but there was now the added charm of a y's presence, whose voice and countenance ever ured her guests that they were welcome. [The t-hand panel in the lower part of our front ture, illustrates one of these social gatherings.] His promotion was now rapid, as rapid as the ulations admitted. As Deputy Adjutant- neral, his duties did not require him to attend the Commander-in-Chief, and Browne's retiring ure did not admit of his paying court in high ces. Colonel H. (the Adjutant-General) died er a tedious illness, and alter his death as during illness Browne performed the duties of the ice. After a few days he asked His Excellency om he intended to place over him. The com- ider significantly replied, "I do not intend to ce any one over you, Major Browne." Browne lained that his length of service was not suffi- nt to make him eligible for promotion. After e lapse of a few years, however, both the office of l-utant-General and that of Secretary to Govern- nt in the military department became vacant at e same time. Browne was offered either, and epted the latter.

THE INDIAN MUTINY

ke out in 1857. It was a time of terrible iety throughout India. The officers of the itish army did not know how far the discontent d spread or whether their native troops would itiny or not. No European's life was safe, for e most solemn protestations of fidelity were amelessly violated. Madras was far away from e scene of bloodshed in which the lives of refined lies and delicate children were taken after name- s outrage and in horrible barbarity. The news ched Madras of the awful massacre in which r ordinary butchers were sent into a room dowed with ladies and children with instructions kill and spare not. These instructions they faith- ly obeyed, as tresses of fair hair, fingers, hands d feet lying about the floor testified to the British ops when they arrived upon the horrible scene. For a time a panic prevailed in Madras, and neral Browne's superior officer advocated stern easures of repression which, had they been car- ed out might have caused an outbreak in Madras o. But General Browne had mixed with the ople in his Christian work. He knew them tter than any other officer in the army, and he is satisfied that they were faithful and would re- ain so. The event justified his conviction, for oughout the mutiny not a single soldier in the adras Presidency deserted his colors or gave gns of dissatisfaction.

URN TO ENGLAND: THE ULSTER REVIVAL. In 1859, Colonel Browne went home on sick rtificate, retaining his appointment. There was, wever, a general feeling that he would not re- rn to India, which led to a universal expression esteem and respect by all classes. Many in gh positions, who had no sympathy with his re- ion, united in bearing testimony to his abilities, s high character, and useful life. Browne, after iting the North of Ireland, and following the ual course of Englishmen, in paying compli- ents to the warm-heartedness, or, as he pressed it, India-like hospitality of the Irish, ncluded a long letter to General Dobbs, with the llowing notice of the remarkable revival which as then, 1859, exciting so much interest, not only Ulster, but throughout the Christian world:

"TRALEE, 14th October, 1859.

"I must not attempt at present to give you any ount of what we have seen and heard in Ulster I wish, indeed, I could say in Ireland. Our own pressions as to the work are very decided. ere has been, and still is, though not to the e extent, much of a questionable character; it this has been very manifestly from man, and oubtedly also from the devil. I indeed marvel w any really Christian men have gone to look on it, and yet remain unbelieving. I can only en it to the old story (Luke 24:11). The Irish- an's reply, when told that there were some who nsidered it to be the work of the devil, is just the ght one: 'Well, then, it must be a new devil intirely; for sure the ould one would never have been after such a work as this.' Just so! By their fruits ye shall know them; and Satan never yet wrought the fruits of the Spirit in men's souls, nor brought them to Christ—willing, as he may be, to transform himself into an angel of light, that he may draw souls down into darkness."

ACCEPTS A NEW APPOINTMENT IN INDIA.

General Browne returned to Madras in the end of March, 1860, when he resigned his appointment as Secretary to Government, and accepted a mili- tary command at Nagpore. His reasons for doing so are communicated in a letter to his friend:

"Bessie and I are getting old, and we need, what we can never get in Madras, more time for our souls. I feel, too, for myself that my eyes are getting too aged for office work, and that I should have run great risk of serious injury by longer continuance at the desk. I feel, too, that coming to me, as it seems to do, in the course of my posi- tion in the service, it would hardly be fair to de- cline, and so shut out my deputy from rising in his turn. I sometimes think, also, that my over-kind and, as I could not but feel, rather injudicious friends at Madras, fairly bowed me out when we took our departure for old England. All things considered, our way would appear to have been ordered for us by our Heavenly Father, and so we go forward without anxiety."

His new position at Nagpore forced him to take the lead as a spiritual teacher, as the following ex- tract from a letter to General Dobbs will indicate: "I am beginning, I think, to see one reason, at least, why I should have been sent to Kamptee, and it is just this, that I am so circumstanced here as to be compelled to stand to the front, a place, as you know, from which, in mere pride, I have always shrunk back. We have for our chaplain a gentleman from 'St. Augustine,' not a Tractarian—but in his way just as bad—a thorough-going Apostolical Succession and Baptismal Regenera- tion man. So we, that is, wife and I, have been driven to set up a 'Conventicle' in the artillery lines—she for the women, and I for the men—while Puckle, the Executive Engineer, a very dear brother, holds other meetings for the gists. We have also a 'gentry meeting' at our own house every Sunday evening, in which I am also obliged to take part. I feel very thankful for it. I am conscious that it is good for my soul now; and I feel, too, that if it be our Lord's will for us ever to return to the old country, and to pass our few re- maining years among our people, this will be quite our preparation for it."

In 1862 General Browne was transferred from Nagpore to the most important military command in the Madras Presidency, the highest command next to that of the Commander-in-Chief. The Brownes, however, were now seriously contem- plating their return to Europe, and greatly enjoyed the prospect; but their Father in Heaven did not see good to grant the fulfilment of their day-dreams of domestic happiness in their native land.

HAPPY DEATH OF MRS. BROWNE.

In 1863 Mrs. Browne was called to the upper sanctuary, and writing of her peaceful departure, the bereaved husband says: "I bless Him for all the grace manifested in her life, and for all the patience and the peace given to her in the time of sickness and of death. Never for a moment was there the slightest failure of either. Not the shadow of a cloud was allowed for a moment to rest upon her soul. 'I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day.' These were among her last words, and just this had been the habitual feeling of her daily life. She had lived and worked, simply staying her whole soul on Jesus, and so He kept her in perfect peace, because she had trusted in Him."

OFFICIAL WORK AND DEATH.

In 1864 General Browne left India and returned to England, and the following year he accepted the office of Honorary Secretary to the Church Missionary Society. After five months' work in that office, on the evening of the 14th February, 1866, when returning to his lodging, he fell dead on the street. After leaving the Church Missionary office he, by appointment, met some friends at the Tract Society office, to consult about union matters. One of these friends accompanied him some distance, and left him about nine o'clock, when he proceeded alone. He appears to have fallen down immediately after, and was identified by a card found in his pocket. Doubtless, if the Lord had given him the option, he would have said, "Lord, let me not be a burden to my friends;" and as he had neither wife nor child to suffer from the shock, he would, though with child-like submission, have chosen sudden death. [The right-hand section in the lower half of the front picture, represents the death of the good General.]

Thus the scene of the Christian soldier's life closed. He had fought a good fight, and while ful- filling honorably the duties of his profession he had lost no opportunity of engaging in the service of his Saviour. Among the irreligious of his own countrymen, and among the Mahomedans and Hindoos of India he sought to win souls for Jesus, and to show by a consistent life that a Christian is no less brave and honorable because he is a Chris- tian.

Dr. Bonar's Free Birth in Temperance was the subject of remark at one of Mr. Moody's meetings in Glasgow recently. Mr. Moody's ad- dress had been founded on the words, "If any man thirst," etc. Dr. Bonar followed, describing whiskey as "the water of death." Mr. Moody said to him: "You get through a deal of work; can you manage without stimulants?" Dr. Bonar said: "When you were at the assembly the other day, I was thinking if you were to ask me for my testimony I should be somewhat at a loss; then I remembered what Paul said to the captain who obtained his freedom at a great price—'but I was free born.' It has cost some here a great deal to give up stimulants; I never knew their power—I was free-born."

An Idol was Made into Shoe Lasts in Mexico

recently.—Mr. W. A. Walls, one of the Friends' missionaries at Gomez Farias, Mexico, relates the following: "An aged female who had long passed the threescore years and ten, used to have a wood- en idol in her house which she called St. Raphael, and to this she prayed and offered fruits and flow- ers, according to the custom here. About ten months ago, the evangelist Encarnacion Gonzalez and his wife visited at the houses in the village to which they could gain admission, and among others that of the old lady. They found her in trouble. She had by some accident broken off the head of the saint, and was saving up money to have it re- paired. After a time the Holy Spirit caused her to receive the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ; she then put the idol up in the loft, and some time afterward threw it out of the house, but her son-in-law, now a Christian, said it was a pity to waste fine wood and so he cut up the saint to make shoe lasts." So the wretched thing she had prayed to became useful in the end."

A Letter from Rev. J. Hudson Taylor of the China Inland Mission, who is now in China, was read at a meeting in London two weeks ago. Mr. Taylor says: "We may well give thanks and praise for the extension of our work to the capital cities of three important provinces, in two of which, mission premises have been rented. The first of these provinces, Si-ch'uen, the largest of the eigh- teen, and its capital, Chen-tu-Fu, is one of the larg- est of China's provincial capitals. Apart from its local importance, which is secondary to that of no city in the empire, it has peculiar interest to us, from its being on the high road to Thibet." In referring to the second of the provincial capitals, Si-gan Fu, the letter stated that it was interesting as having been the headquarters of a strong Nes- torian Mission more than 1000 years ago. In con- clusion Mr. Hudson Taylor wrote: "The review of the year shows that the warfare we are waging is conflict indeed, and that some have been unequal to the strain. But, on the other hand, the pro- gress made, the victories gained, the souls won for Christ, and many a heaven-illuminated Chinese deathbed, evidences that He whom we serve is with us of a truth. From the commencement more than 1300 Chinese have been baptized in connection with our mission."

THE BLUE AND GRAY.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, delivered on Sunday Morning, May 28, 1882, the Sunday preceding Decoration Day.*

"Such as went forth to battle, expert in war, with all instruments of war, fifty thousand, which could keep rank; they were not of double heart."—I. CHRON. 12:33.

ANOTHER way of saying that these men of Zebulun did not belong to the reserve corps but were in active service, understood how to fight, were thoroughly disciplined, and were in dead earnest. And what was said of these men of Zebulun may be said of the men of 1862 and 1863 and 1864 and 1865. "Such as went forth to battle, expert in war, with all instruments of war, fifty thousand, which could keep rank; they were not of double heart."

Lift up your eyes and see from San Francisco to Canada the thronging of a great multitude into the cemeteries. They bring flowers. The drum sounds the grand march, and the minute guns are the heart-throb of a nation's sympathy. They bring flowers in wreaths—that means honor. They bring flowers in crosses—that means awful suffering. They bring white flowers—that means resurrection. They bring crimson flowers. The seed for these was planted at Charlotte Court-House and Manassas Junction, planted in grave trench and covered with the iron rake of battle.

In this national observance we will not merely put a perishable wreath on the pillow of dust where the brave sleep, but we practically put a garland on the brow of Courage, a garland on the brow of Discipline, a garland on the brow of Self-sacrifice, a garland on the brow of Patriotism, a garland on the brow of Peace.

There is something absorbing in the military science of the Bible. Cain and Abel were the first combatants, and all the disputes between individuals and families and nations have been only

THE ECHO OF CAIN'S CLUB.

In olden times all the men were enrolled for the army—all the men between twenty and fifty years of age. Then a levy was made for a special service. There were only three or four classes exempt: Those who had built a house and had not occupied it. Those who had planted a garden and had not reaped the fruit of it. Those who were engaged to be married and yet had not led the bride to the altar. Those who were yet in the first year of wedded life. Those who were so nervous that they could not look upon an enemy but they fled, and could not look upon blood but they fainted—all these of course were exempt.

The army was in three divisions—centre and right and left wings. The weapons of defence were helmet, shield, breastplate, buckler. The weapons of offence were sword, spear, javelin, arrow, catapult—which was merely a bow swung by machinery, shooting arrows at vast distances, great arrows, one arrow as large as several men could lift; and ballista, which was a sling swung by machinery, hurling great rocks and large pieces of lead to vast distances.

The shields were made of woven willow work, with three thicknesses of hide, and a loop inside through which the arm of the warrior might be thrust; and when these soldiers were marching to attack an enemy on the level, all these shields touched each other, making a wall moving but impenetrable; and then when they attacked a fortress and tried to capture a battlement this shield was lifted over the head so as to resist the falling of the missiles. The breastplate was made of two pieces of leather, brass covered, one piece falling over the breast, the other falling over the back. At the side of the warrior the two pieces fastened with buttons or clasps.

The bows were so stout and stiff and strong that warriors often challenged each other to bend one. The strings of the bow were made from the sinews of oxen. A case like an inverted pyramid was fastened to the back, that case containing the arrows, so that when the warrior wanted to use an arrow he would put his arm over his shoulder and pull forth the arrow for the fight. The ankle and the foot had on an iron boot.

When a wall was to be assaulted a battering ram was brought up. A battering ram was a great beam swung on chains in equilibrium. The battering ram would be brought close up to the wall and then a great number of men would take hold of this beam, push it back as far as they could and then let go, and the beam became a great swinging pendulum of destruction.

Twenty or forty men would stand in a movable tower on the back of an elephant, the elephant made drunk with wine, and then headed toward the enemy, and what with the heavy feet and the swinging proboscis and the poisoned arrows shot from the movable tower, the destruction was appalling. War chariots were in vogue, and they were on two wheels so they could easily turn. A sword was fastened to the pole between the horses, so when they went ahead the sword thrust, and when they turned around it would mow down.

The armies carried flags beautifully embroidered. Tribe of Judah carried a flag embroidered with a lion. Tribe of Reuben embroidered with a man. Tribe of Dan embroidered with cherubim. The noise of the host as they moved on was overwhelming. What with the clatter of shields, and the rumbling of wheels, and the shouts of the captains, and the vociferation of the entire host, the prophet says it was like the roaring of the sea.

have been advancing all these years you are not to conclude that these armies of olden times were an uncontrollable mob. I could quote you four or five passages of Scripture showing you that they were thoroughly drilled; they marched step to step, shoulder to shoulder, or, as my text expresses it, they were "expert in war, fifty thousand which could keep rank." While we all pray for the day of universal peace and we want the time to come when the last weapon of war shall be turned into an implement of agriculture, none of us without being drilled can stand in the presence of armed men. We involuntarily keep step to the drum. We are thrilled with the blast of a bugle. Any man who has any soul in him takes off his hat and waves it as the regiment passes.

While the renegade and the vicious have often taken up arms, we cannot forget the fact that Joshua was a soldier, and Caleb a soldier, and David a soldier, and Hedley Vicars a soldier, and Havelock a soldier, and Washington a soldier; and though the latches of the helmets of the fifty thousand men of the text have long ago been lifted from under the chin, and all their weapons of war have been unstrung, we cannot to-day without a thrill see them marching in the text, fifty thousand men shoulder to shoulder, step to step, keeping rank.

I. In this national observance we put a garland on the brow of DISCIPLINE.

What was true in the text was true in 1776 in this country, true in 1812, true in 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865. The troops that were disciplined were the valuable troops. These men whose death you mourn and over whose grave you put garlands fell in the ranks. As in the time of the text, so in our time, it is drill, drill, drill. These men whom you honor, when they first went forth into the service were laughed at by our older soldiers. There was impatient reproof perhaps because they seemed so clumsy in the line, but they went on, they practised, they drilled, until they came to efficiency, a they marched like the men of the text, expert war, keeping rank.

What is true in the world is true in the church. There is no efficiency without drill and without discipline. It seems so easy to preach, and so easy to plead law, and so easy to build up a business, a so easy to bargain, and so easy to achieve great influence in the world that plenty of people start on but at the first assault they surrender. There must be drill, drill, drill for Christian work as well for secular work. What though in the first attempt at public prayer you break down? The sands of the best of Christians have broken down. Keep on, keep on, practice, practice—drill, drill. What though in your first effort to address an audience on the great themes of the Gospel you break down? Hundreds of men have broken down. Keep on, keep on—practice, practice drill, drill.

These men in David's time, those men in 1862 were drilled for the service. Do you drill for the service. We want fifty thousand Christian soldiers, aye fifty millions, who can keep rank. At so next Tuesday we are going to put a garland on the brow of Discipline.

II. So in the national observance we put a garland on the brow of COURAGE.

These men of the text were brave men. It was so. Those men who fell in the contest of 1862 were men of prowess. They were courageous in the conflict. It is a very easy thing to keep rank on a parade day amid a shower of bouquets and with the streets lined with enthusiastic huzza, and all the people are clapping their hands. It is not so easy to keep rank, face blackened with smoke, the uniform covered with earth ploughed up, whizzing bullet and bursting shell, one half a regiment cut to pieces and the officers still crying, "Forward, march!" That requires old-fashioned valor, I tell you. So we put a garland on it. We want to honor it in the church and outside the church.

The great trouble in the kingdom of God this day is the cowards. They are splendid on parade day and on communion day when they have on their best clothes of Christian profession; but to put them in a battle, or under the first sharp shooting of scepticism, and they dodge, they fall back, they break ranks. We want to put a garland upon Prowess.

There are a great many Christians who would like to go out on an expedition or campaign with satin slippers, and holding a parasol over their heads to keep off the heavy dew, and have ratios of canvas-back duck and lemon-custard, but if they cannot have them they want to go home—like the twenty-two thousand I read of in the chapter at the beginning, they want to go home. Cowards in the conflict. Splendid on parade day. Great at communion season. Nothing out in the world where men are called to fight the world, the flesh and the devil. They are nothing there. Cowards. They fly.

We want to put a garland on courage next Tuesday. We want to put a garland on courage now. We want more soldiers of Jesus Christ like Paul who could say, "None of these things move me neither count I my life dear unto myself so that might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." Looking through the Mamertine dungeon when they asked him if he is ready to go out on the road to Ostia to die, he says: "Yes, I am; I am now ready to be offered up."

Men like John Bunyan, who, after he had lain for years in a loathsome prison, could say: "By the help of God I will lie here in prison till the morning grows on my eyebrows before I give up my principles and my faith in God." Men with the courage of Thomas Chalmers, who, when he was caricatured of people in high places and by the aristocrats of Edinburgh, because of the theory by which he proposed to elevate the poor, went right on to do his work, so that Thomas Carlyle, who was then a comparative boy, wrote: "What a glorious old

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, is now enabled to fulfil the promise made in its issue of June 1, of publishing, at the first opportunity, this sermon, which, as was then explained, could not be inserted in that number.

an that Thomas Chalmers is. While we stand ringing our hands over the filth and wretchedness of our cities, he takes a shovel and goes down into the dirtiest puddle of Blackport, Edinburgh, clears it the sewers and fills them with living water. glorious old Thomas Chalmers."

Men of the courage of Massena, who, when Napoleon sent word to him, "How long can you hold out?" replied, although he had been forty days in consecutive battle, "Tell the emperor I will hold out two hours, or six hours, or twenty-four hours, or until France has victory."

That is the kind of courage, that is the prowess we want in the kingdom of God—amid all assault, amid all hardship, amid all caricature, amid all persecution keeping rank.

III. Yea, in this national observance we want to put a garland on

THE BROW OF PEACE.

There never has been such a time of thorough peace in this country as now. Did you notice that last week the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, South, sent overtures to the Presbyterian Church North—Atlanta greeting Springfield. Ah! that is going to close the last gap ecclesiastical and the last gap national. Beside that there never has been a time when Northern and Southern graves alike were decorated and without any protest.

I was a few years ago delivering the oration at Washington, at Arlington Heights, at the decoration of the soldiers' graves, the President and his Cabinet, and the officers of the navy present. Time of great solemnity it was to my heart; but at that time, while a Southern woman had put a garland on the grave of her dead husband, a Northern man wearing an epaulet, went and took up the garland, tore it to pieces and threw it to the winds. He had a soldier's dress, but he was no soldier; he was not one of the kind of men spoken of in the text; he was not one of the kind of men who fought in 1862, and 1863, and 1864. I think he was a soldier of a time of peace. I have noticed that the men who fought on the side of the North and who fought on the side of the South can easily settle their quarrel. The soldiers settle it and the men of the navy settle it. The people who cannot settle it are the people who stayed at home and made speeches! They never settle it.

A beautiful gift has been sent by these three men of the North to the Confederate in Virginia, and they have made an arrangement by which, in a short time, they are to meet in the City of Washington—these three men of the North, one a member of this church, and this Confederate officer of the South—and then from Washington they are going to visit the Manassas battle-field and talk it all over again—how they were wounded, and how they were helped, and how they were saved. That is the Gospel. That is magnificent. How does that compare with the man wearing an epaulet who tore to fragments the garland put by a widow upon her husband's grave?

O! I am glad that all the graves are to be decorated North and South. I happened to be in Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina about a month ago, when they were making arrangements to decorate their graves—for their Decoration Day comes a few weeks earlier, according to the climate—and I heard that there were Northern men who put garlands on the graves of Southern troops, and it will be now, on Tuesday, that Southern men will put garlands on the graves of Northern troops. It must be so.

It is in about this way: two brothers get into a terrific fight and they are both killed. The mother hears of it. She goes right away. She comes down to the place where they are stretched out upon the grass. She does not stop to ask which one was right in the quarrel, or which one was wrong. She puts one arm around Thomas and the other arm around George. She kisses them both. So it is in this spring-time. The United States Government will come forth, our mother—the United States Government—will come forth, and she will put one arm over the Northern grave and the other arm over the Southern grave and leave her benediction on both. I tell you it is time the scars of battle were covered up. The dead are at peace. Cannot we, the living, be at peace? They suffered more than we have. If they can be at peace, can we who suffered the less deny peace?

"O!" you say, "why make ado about soldiers' graves when, according to Edmund Burke, there have fallen in battle thirty-five times the population of the earth? That was Edmund Burke's estimate in Parliament forty or fifty years ago, that thirty-five times the present population of the earth had fallen in battle. Why then make such ado about these graves when there are such things from century to century?" Ah! my friends, these are our graves. You have great regard for Greenwood, but there is one lot that is nearer your heart than any other. It is the family lot. It is the place where your kindred lie. While we regard the graves of the dead all the earth over, I want you to understand that these soldiers' graves are our family plot in the cemetery of the nations. Some of them went off from our homes.

came forth and the father started away from his farmhouse for the village post-office, and he got the newspaper and he read the proclamation, and though he had many errands in the village he stopped not but hastened home and said to his wife: "Mother, do you think our boys will have to go?" In the evening the sons came in and they took up the war proclamation, read it and then stepped into another room and talked a little while together. They came out and said: "Father, you are too old to go, you stay home and take care of mother, and we will take the first train."

There was the gathering up of a few valuables, and three or four daguerreotypes and a hasty goodbye, and the train halted at the village depot, and there were three times three for the volunteers, and then the train was off. A few weeks or months pass on and there is a rumor of a great battle. Father hastens to the village post-office, gets the newspaper, with trembling hands and trembling heart opens it, begins to read the long line of the killed, beginning clear at the top, reading on down slowly, cautiously, until almost at the foot of the column he sees something at the sight of which he drops as though he were dead.

Now, there are two pictures over the mantel; they are the pictures of the boys that went off to the war and never came back, and when Decoration Day comes, although the mother is now too feeble to go out to the cemetery she will go into the front dooryard and pluck some old-fashioned daffodils and put them around the two pictures, or she will take the two pictures down and hug them to her heart. And next Tuesday the United States Government will come forth to look for the graves of those boys, and will take two garlands—one for the father and one for the mother—and the night dew will fill those flowers with tears.

It is our family plot in the cemetery of the nations. Every flower put upon a grave will be an oath of patriotism. O! how much dearer our country is to us when we reflect what others have suffered for it. Why is it you sang with so much spirit the hymn before the sermon?

"Land where my fathers died,
Land of the pilgrims' pride,
Of thee I sing."

Look out how you talk treason in the presence of a man whose son sleeps under the sod at Gettysburgh! Look out how you malign our institutions in the presence of a woman whose husband perished in the awful charge at Ball's Bluff! Look out how you malign our liberties in the presence of a man whose father was starved to death in a military prison! Malign our institutions in the presence of an old man whose home was desolated by the war, and you will find the color coming back to the faded cheek, and the fire to the lustreless eye, and the strength to the palsied tongue, and you will feel the all-consuming power of an old man's curse. This nation, with its hand on the brow of the fallen brothers and fathers, has sworn before high Heaven that it will protect the institutions for which they perished.

IV. While to-day we are arranging to put garlands on the brow of the dead, I put one garland on the brow of the living. If we honor the men who fought and fell we must honor the men who fought and live. I am glad to know in so many of our cities all over this country men are occupied in post-offices, and have gubernatorial chairs and high positions of authority because they suffered for the land—men with one foot worth more than they used to be with two feet, men with one arm mightier for the public good than when they had two arms. While I put a garland upon the dead I must put

THIS GARLAND UPON THE LIVING.

I want your children charged to remember what these liberties of ours have cost in the first establishment and then in the re-establishment of our government. What Marathon was to the Greek, let Kennesaw Mountain and Malvern Hill and Shiloh be to your children, and when you want to impress them with what our institutions have cost, if you can think of no other names, perhaps you can think of two names suggestive of all the rest—the one the name of a man who fell at the opening of the war, and the other the name of a man who fell at the close of the war—two names dear to every American heart, two names never to die; Ellsworth, the first; Abraham Lincoln, the last.

So let Decoration Day go down from generation to generation. Strew flowers over the heads that ached, and over the hearts that bled, and over the feet that were blistered in the long march. O! you throng of departed heroes, stoop down and breathe the perfume of a nation's thanks. Stoop down and take the kiss of a nation's love. Stoop down and hear the shout of a nation's deliverance. May God hasten the time when war shall be buried—war, that old, grim breaker of hearts. Carry him out on a rusty shield. Let him down in the most desolate part of all the earth; bury his sword with him; heap on the grave hillock broken chariot wheels; let widowhood and orphanage come out and clap their hands in joy at the obsequies, while the winds howl the requiem: "This is the second death!"

A Sailor was Picked up in a Gutter in England some time ago and carried into one of the mission homes called the Sailor's Rest. He thus describes the results to Miss Weston, who was instrumental in founding the institution: "I will tell you the truth, miss. I came in here over a man's shoulder like a sack of coal. I used to spend all my money at the 'Duke of Cambridge,' hard by. One night, having spent all, I wanted the landlord to trust me. We had words because he would not, and I was helped to the door quicker than I came in, and very soon I found myself in the gutter. I rolled about and shouted aloud, and somebody came and helped me. He tossed me over his shoulder, and carried me straight in here. I was kindly treated, put to bed, my clothes were washed, and my arm, which had been hurt, was tied up and bandaged. The next morning I found myself at the Sailor's Rest. I made some good resolutions, the first was that I would give up the drink, and another was that I would make the Sailor's Rest my home." "Well," I asked, "and how has it turned out?" "You can see," he said, "by the badge on my arm how I have got on in the service. I am glad also to be able to help the cause a bit. I love my Bible, and I love prayer now, but I never cared for them before, and they are leading me to better things still, and I am ready to say so anywhere, in public or in private."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Ball-Room on Fire.—Mr. Scroggie, Speaking in the Circus, Glasgow, on June 4th, said: "I remember reading in the newspapers of a ball that took place in Paris. When the revelry was at its height, there was a cry of 'Fire!' It was ascertained that a conflagration had broken out in the room below the dancers. For a few moments there was a pause. Then a dashing young officer, excited by the wine he had drunk, shouted, 'I will have another dance in defiance of the fire!' The music again struck up, and the dancers again whirled round, when suddenly the flooring gave way. There was no time to escape; all were lost. So people go on carelessly and thoughtlessly though on the very brink of hell fire. They are warned of their danger, and intend to be saved, but they let the golden opportunity pass and are lost!"

A Mother's Letter.—At the Meeting on June 5th, Mr. R. Simpson said: "At one of the meetings I spoke to a young mother, who is under thirty years of age and has three children. Her husband is a Christian, and she herself at one time was a Christian worker, busy in the Lord's work, and yet during the past five years she had been a hopeless, helpless drunkard, dragging her three little children down to woe, and breaking the heart of her loving, Christian husband. She has been brought to the feet of Christ. I will read a few lines of a letter received from her: 'Beloved and honored sir—Burning gratitude fills my soul as I take my pen to write a few lines. God bless you, is my heart's desire. I feel an overwhelming love for you because you were the instrument in God's hand in leading me to cast myself on Him whose precious blood has released my soul from sin. I pray earnestly and constantly that God may keep me from the cursed drink, which by slow and insidious steps drags down to certain ruin.'"

Taking a Battery.—Dr. Somerville, in Speaking of the great work now being done among the intemperate, said: "A young officer was engaged in the Peninsular campaign whom the Duke of Wellington ordered with his troop to assault a battery and to take it. To go up to the mouth of the guns with his small company seemed to be certain death, but though his nerve quailed for an instant, he did not hesitate. He kept his watch in his hand, and at the time stated he gave the word, 'Forward!' The battery at once opened fire, and it looked as if he and all his men were sure to be swept away; indeed, at times, as he led the way, he was lost to the view of the men, so dense was the smoke. But other troops had been ordered by the commander to attack the battery at the same time. Of this the officer was not previously aware, but it was by this combined action, and by assailing the battery at the same moment, that the British troops triumphed. So Christians need to join hands with other friendly forces in the attack on the stronghold of intemperance and all other forms of sin."

The Text on the Ticket.—A Man About thirty years of age said: "On the 23rd of April last my little girl came home from a Sunday-school with a text on a ticket. She had to learn it and say it to her teacher on the following Sunday. The text was, 'Be not wise in thine own eyes; fear the Lord and depart from evil.' I was teaching my wee daughter to learn this, and I thought it strange for me to teach my child what I did not do myself. I had seen a bill announcing that that Sunday evening Mr. Moody would be holding the last of his services in the St. Andrew's Hall, and I resolved to go. I was late, and could not get near enough to hear the preaching, but one of the hymns went to my heart. Those who were for Jesus were asked to stand up. I wished to do so, but a voice seemed to say, 'Don't. There will be some here who know you, and they will be laughing at you.' I said in my heart, 'I am coming, Lord'; but all the while I was sitting still. Then I bethought myself that the Bible says that no liar shall enter the kingdom of God, and I saw that that applied to me. I got up at last, and though my eyes were so blinded that I could see nothing outwardly, my inward vision was clear, and I saw my sins rising up against me as big as great stones. I asked God to forgive me for Christ's sake, and when I reached home I realized that He had done so. I was saved that day, and now I am trying to save others."

A Swearer Stopped by Prayer.—Another Intelligent and healthy man, who said he had been a "hard" drinker for ten years, and now by God's grace had no more desire for intoxicants than if he had never tasted them, added: "This day four weeks one of my shopmates tried to tantalize me by cursing and swearing. I thought as Christ had done me good and saved my soul I must stand up and say a word for Him. I spoke to the man about the injury he was doing to the young lads and men in the shop, and he ceased swearing for an hour or two; but then he began again. I talked to him again of the evil he was doing, and he again ceased. I put up a silent prayer from my bench that the Lord would give me strength to say a word that would reach the man. About half an hour before we left work he began to curse and swear a third time, and feeling stronger, I spoke to him once more. The next morning he came to me about half past six o'clock, shook me by the hand, thanked me for what I had said to him; and he has never sworn at me again, but is earnestly seeking the way of salvation through Christ."

Preparing for the Lord's Coming.—On June 6th, in urging a spirit of hourly watchfulness for the Lord's coming, as one conducive to personal holiness, Mr. Scroggie said: "When I was a lad I was in service at one time with a good minister of the Free Church, in the north of Scotland, my employment being principally to drive his pony and phaeton. He went away to help a brother minister in Aberdeen, for some days, and he told me when to expect him back. However, he returned a day sooner than I expected him, and instead of being at my work in the garden, I was in my own room doing some work for myself, in my master's time. All at once I saw a conveyance come in sight. There was the minister. If I had gone through the door he would have seen me. So I scrambled through a loft, and out of a window into the garden, almost breaking my bones in so doing. My master had come unawares. If we are really looking for the coming of Christ, it will constitute a mighty power in keeping us from the evil of this world, and stimulate us to seek the immediate salvation of sinners."

A Mere Sham.—At the Testimony Meeting on June 5th, a middle-aged man said: "On the 1st of May last, prompted by curiosity, I went to the Circus, and heard Mr. Moody preach on the handwriting upon the wall—'Tekel, thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting.' No sooner were those words uttered than I felt myself in a most unpleasant position. The farther the preacher entered on his subject I got to see myself bit by bit in a worse light, and I saw that my religion all along had been a mere sham—that if it was not infidelity in theory, it was the greatest infidelity in practice; it was, in fact, the merest formalism. Then when toward the end of his address Mr. Moody said, 'If the scales were to descend would you dare be weighed with Christ in the balance beside you?' I said to myself 'Dare I be weighed if those scales descended before me? I dare not.' I became very restless, but I was riveted I believe by God to the seat where I was sitting. On the following Sunday I took Christ to be my Saviour. I at once felt a great calm settle upon my soul. I feel as certain as these fingers are part of my body, that Jesus Christ has saved me."

Run Over by Seven Trains.—A Cripple who as he stood leant heavily on crutches, made the following statement: "I am very thankful to God for saving me. I was a hard drinker for nine years. I was in the employment of the North British Railway Company, and in November, 1875, while intoxicated, I attempted to cross the line, when a passenger train knocked me down. I lay there from five o'clock to a quarter to seven. During the time I was lying there seven trains passed over me. I was more than six weeks in the Royal Infirmary, and every day I was there the Rev. Dr. Fergus Fergusson came to see me. When I left the infirmary I again took to drinking.

I had a little business and lost it through drink. made up my mind to throw myself away; a walked down Tureen Street to the edge of the Green, when a hand seemed as it were placed on my shoulder, and a voice seemed to say, 'Give him another trial.' I went to the Hall in Jam Morrison Street on the following Sabbath morning. Mr. Moody spoke about a little girl who said 'Lord Jesus I can neither read nor write, but take me as I am.' That got into my heart. I tried to get rid of my burden, and attended the service night after night, but I could not find rest until eight weeks ago, when I found Christ. I am now rejoicing humbly in His salvation."

Arrows and Oil.—At the Mid-day Prayer meeting, June 7th, Mr. Dewar, speaking on the importance of Christians "agreeing to differ" on certain subjects, said: "I knew two ministers of the Highlands who lived in contiguous parishes. They were godly men. One of them preached the law very much, and there was a general awakening under him; while his neighbor preached the Gospel very much. Of course both preached the law and the Gospel at times; but you understand what I mean. The awakened ones did not find food for their souls under the minister by whose ministrations they had been awakened, and they crossed over to the other parish, where they heard more of the Gospel. This minister was grieved at the fact, and, meeting his neighbor, he said, 'Brother, some of your people are coming over to me, and you are better fitted to teach the Gospel of grace than I am.' 'Oh, brother,' said the other, 'when the Lord of the harvest sent me out to the field, he furnished me with a quiver full of arrows. I have been discharging them ever since, but I have not yet expended them all. He furnished you with a cruse of oil, and you are pouring that into the wounds. Your oil is not exhausted yet. Let us go on and work in our respective spheres. They agreed to differ. They were friends before, but they were better friends after they had had this conversation.'"

SATANIC WONDERS.

Satanic Miracles will be Startling and Seductive—Fire Commanded from Heaven.

THE VIEW OF THE ANCIENTS.

It is acknowledged, both in Scripture and in the classics of Greece and Rome, that the "immortals" whom the heathen adored, were once men, and Paul assures us that the sacrifices of the Gentiles made to these "immortals," were sacrifice to demons, and that their sacred feasts were in honor of demons. (1 Cor. 10: 20-21; comp. Deut. 18: 10; 32: 17; Lev. 17: 7; 2 Chron. 11: 15; Psa. 106: 37.) This would seem to give us Scriptural authority for believing that demons are what the Jews and early Christians believed them to be. Dr. Charles Beecher expresses the same opinion in his "Review of the Spiritual Manifestations." He says, "The Jews before Christ, and the Fathers after, believed that departed human spirits lurked in images, spoke in oracles, controlled omens, and in various ways encouraged men to worship them."

"As to the New Testament cases of possession, let Josephus indicate the popular belief: 'Demons are no other than the spirits of the wicked, that enter into men and kill them, unless they obtain help against them.' Compare this with the Patristic uses: 'Those persons who are seized and thrown down by the souls of the deceased,' says Justin Martyr, 'are such as all men agree in calling demoniacs.'"

DEMONIACAL POSSESSION.

"Indeed, it is generally admitted, even by the opponents of the reality of demonic possessions, that it was the general belief of the Jewish nation except the Sadducees, and of most of the other nations, that the spirits of dead men, especially the wicked, were permitted to enter the bodies of men.' Nor is the word in the New Testament ever applied to Satan or the fallen angels. Such, then, being the meaning of the word, what inference is to be drawn from the facts of the narrative, as to the truth of the popular belief? Christ stood between the Sadducees on the one hand, an earnest minority, and the Pharisees and populace on the other, a powerful majority. Had the weaker party had truth on their side, Christ, 'born to bear witness to the truth,' would have stood by them. He did not do so. All His words and acts sustained in the fullest manner the reality of that against which the Sadducees protested. Either, therefore, Christ was deceived, or a deceiver, or the popular belief was correct."

There can be no doubt as to the classical meaning of the term "demon." "All Pagan antiquity affirms," says Dr. Campbell, "that from Titan and Saturn, the poetical progeny of Cælus and Terra, down to Æsculapius, Proteus, and Minos, all their divinities where ghosts of dead men, and were so regarded by the more erudite of the Pagans themselves." Indeed the only distinction between the classical and Scripture usage of the word, seems to be that in Scripture the demons are evil spirits—the souls of lost men.

DEMONS THE SPIRITS OF WICKED MEN.

In corroboration of the arguments adduced by the writers above quoted two thoughts may here be added. In the first place, have we not a striking though indirect indication of the truth of the opinion that the demons are the souls of wicked men, in the fact that while, as we have seen, the abyss is the special place of the demons, the last personal Antichrist who is to be apparently a resurrected man, is distinctly said to "ascend out of the pit of the abyss" (Rev. 17 : 8). Have we not here, then, some warrant for concluding that this pre-eminently wicked man is a "demon," and hence that the "demons," as a class, are the spirits of wicked men? Another indication that this is the case seems to be afforded by the curious circumstance that the demons seem to feel a painful sense of nakedness, and an intense desire to gain possession of the bodies of other men, or even of the lower animals. (See Luke 8 : 26-33.)

THEY SEEK REINCARNATION.

"Demoniac possessions," says Dr. Charles Beecher, "have their law; and their law is, that spirits of the departed, restless and miserable, and longing to get back unto life, will thrust themselves in whenever and wherever the psychological conditions of the organism will let them. To this everything said about them in the New Testament corresponds. Christ speaks of them as 'wandering through dry places, seeking rest and finding none' (Matt. 12 : 43), and at length, through very weariness, returning to the victim they had left. They ask not to be sent 'out of the country' (Mark 5 : 10), as if lingering about the scenes of their earthly life. They dread the abyss (Luke 8 : 31). Rather than be exiled from life's scenes, they harbor in the organism of swine.

"They ask not to be tormented before the time, as those that must appear at the judgment-seat to give account of deeds done in the body. The presence of Christ agonizes them: 'Away!' they cry, 'what have we to do with Thee, Jesus of Nazareth?' They confess that there is naught in common between them and their Judge; forlorn, lost, they seek connection with the living to escape, not to inflict, suffering. Hence they seek impressive subjects—those, namely, in whom the mysterious bond between soul and body is less firmly fastened, and so capable of partial disadjustment. And why is this? Is it not because having been once incarnate they retain both the desire and the capacity for reincarnation. We have no evidence that an angel can become incarnate. There is not a single instance of it in Scripture. But in the disembodied human soul there remains the potentiality and prophecy of bodily resurrection."

WROUGHT BY THE POWER OF SATAN.

III.—That the outward manifestation of the evil supernaturalism of the last days, originated, as we have seen, by Satan himself, and produced by the spiritual agency of his demons, is to take place in immediate connection with the revelation of the last personal Antichrist is quite clear from several Scriptures. Thus, in 2 Thess. 2 : 9, we read concerning the lawless one, or Antichrist, that his "coming is after the working of Satan with all power, and signs, and wonders of falsehood." Again, in Rev. 13 : 2, we are informed that the dragon gave to the beast "his power and his throne, and great authority" while, in the same chapter, we read concerning the second beast, or false prophet, that "he exerciseth all the power of the first beast in his presence." And "he doeth great signs, and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the presence of the Beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image of the Beast," etc.

Now the reason why Satan will thus delegate the power of working miracles to Antichrist is very obvious. Miracles have ever been the credentials of each new ambassador from the court of heaven. Hence, in sending a new law-giver, like Moses, or in establishing a new revelation, like the Gospel of Christ, it has pleased God to invest His messengers with the power of working miracles. Our Lord Himself produced His miracles as the credentials of his divine mission. "The works that I do," He declared, "bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me." And the Jewish people accepted them as such. "We know," said Nicodemus, "that Thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him" (John 3 : 2).

THE CREDENTIALS OF ANTICHRIST.

Since, then, Antichrist is to set up what may in a certain sense be called a new religion, and one of a most exclusive character—a religion, that is to say, which is not to exist side by side with other religions already in existence, but to supersede them all, it seems essential that it should be miraculously supported. Negatively the religion of Antichrist will be pure atheism, inasmuch as he will deny alike "the Father and the Son" (1 John 2 : 22); but positively it will be the apotheosis of fallen humanity, for he, a man, "the man of lawlessness," "shall oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" (2 Thess. 2 : 3-4). Thus the blasphemy of Antichrist will consist essentially in the substitution of humanity for God as the sole and supreme object of worship.

And do we not already hear this blasphemous cry in our ears? What says a high authority among the German communists? "Man alone is our God, our father, our judge, our redeemer, our true home, our law and rule, the Alpha and Omega of our political, moral, public, and domestic life and work. There is no salvation but by man. Man must no longer be a means, but must be everywhere and always an end. There is nobody above man, there is neither supernatural power nor consecrated person; neither deity nor divine right. The will of man be done, hallowed be his name."*

"GREAT SIGNS AND WONDERS."

Now, claims so unexampled and audacious will assuredly need the attestation of supernatural power to pass current even during his brief reign. "What sign showest thou unto us?" was the challenge addressed to our Lord by the unbelieving Jews of old; and Antichrist will meet the same challenge by the exhibition of those "great signs and wonders" which Satan will enable him to work. Hence it becomes a matter of vital importance to mankind, that they should be able to test the real power of this usurper of the divine honor, and be forewarned of its supernatural character. It is doubtless to this end that it has been written for our learning that the coming of the Antichrist will be "after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders." Simply as a man he can, of course, work no miracle, for a miracle must be, per se, in some sort superhuman. But this man is to have at his command Satanic power and to be aided by the unseen ministry of demons. Thus the question finally resolves itself into this definite form: Can the devil work miracles? a question which was decided in the affirmative in my last paper.

In this connection, the Rev. P. Carlyon thus writes: "St. Paul, in predicting the coming of Antichrist, directly affirms that the devil can work miracles, for wonders literally signify miracles. Nothing, however, can be deduced from the mere literal meaning of the words. They are described as "lying wonders," and yet that does not imply that they are false or unreal prodigies, like tricks of jugglery, but rather wonders in support of lies and signs of the very power that works them. No tricks of jugglery or sleight of hand are likely to serve the ends of an impostor in these days. The world has seen too many of them to let them pass for anything more than amusement. They can never buttress a new divinity.

Nor does it appear how the marvels of science can be made subservient to accredit a spiritual fraud. All the reasonings from science either concentrate in the proof of the unity of the true God, or stop in the recognition of second causes, and thus end in sheer materialism. The latter effect could alone be perverted to the purposes of imposture, and its influence would tend in the very opposite direction rather than promote a belief in supernatural power. No alternative remains to the claimant of divine homage, but the ability of working real miracles, or the detection of his imposture.

And whereas the man of sin, who is to appear and show himself that he is God, will gain a mastery for a little while, and practise upon the credulity of mankind, even in an age when 'many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased,' we conclude that his 'power and signs and lying wonders' will be real miracles, for which, wrought in support of fraud and for ends of mischief, no assignable cause or sufficient agency can be produced but the power of the devil."

SATANIC MIRACLES.

IV.—But the miracles which Antichrist and his mysterious coadjutor, the False Prophet, will perform by the delegated power of the Dragon, will not only be real miracles, but miracles of a most startling and seductive character. They are not only spoken of as "great signs and wonders" (Matt. 24 : 24), whereby he will 'deceive them that dwell on the earth; but in the thirteenth chapter of the Revelation two specimens of them are adduced, from the consideration of which we may judge of them as a whole. Firstly, then, in the thirteenth verse of this chapter, it is asserted "And he doeth great signs, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men."

FIRE COMMANDED FROM HEAVEN.

Now, in order fully to realize the significance of this most startling "sign," we must recall a very remarkable scene in Old Testament history. I mean, of course, that which took place at Mount Carmel, as recorded in the eighteenth chapter of 1st Kings, when Elijah assembled the prophets of Baal, the obscene deity of the Canaanites and Phœnicians to whom Israel had in the reign of Ahab apostatized, in order to put to a crucial test the rival claims of their false and foul idol, and those of the true and living Jehovah. The test of fire was accepted by the people; but though the prophets of Baal offered their bullock, and "called on the name of Baal from morning even until noon," even cutting themselves with swords and lances till the blood gushed out upon them, "there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded," but when in answer to Elijah's prayer the fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench, the people fell on their faces; and they said, The Lord, He is the God; the Lord, He is the God."

Mark here, then, how the very "sign" which the prophets of Baal were unable to perform will be performed on behalf of Antichrist, and how the awe-inspiring "miracle" which carried conviction of the divine power of Jehovah to the hearts of these apostate Israelites of old, will be available to support the blasphemous claims of him who shall hereafter "sit in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The House Passed the Internal Revenue Bill on Tuesday, June 27th, by a vote of 127 to 80. Twenty-three Democrats voted in the majority in favor of the bill, and eleven Republicans voted against it. A change was made in the details of the bill at the previous day's sitting reducing still further the tax on cigars and cigarettes. It was explained that the adoption of this amendment would reduce the revenue from the articles mentioned, on the basis of last year's receipts, by the sum of $5,899,387, a reduction greater by $3,233,387 than the committee had recommended. This will more than offset the failure to reduce the special taxes on rectifiers, liquor dealers, brewers, etc., and will make the entire reduction, on the basis of last year's business, $23,982,880—about $6,333,000 more than the bill originally proposed. This is made up chiefly of the abolished tax on bank deposits, on matches, patent medicines, and cosmetics, in addition to the reductions already mentioned.

Ex-Secretary Robeson's Naval Appropriation bill is being vigorously criticised in the House. Mr. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, denounced it on June 28th in a long speech. He plainly charged Mr. Robeson with having squandered when in office thirty-five million dollars, and declared that the object of the bill then before the House was to restore and perpetuate the autocratic power which characterized and disgraced the administration of the Navy Department from 1872 to 1877. Other members also criticised the bill, which Mr. Robeson defended.

Another Attack on Mr. Lowell was Made in the House on Wednesday by Mr. Robinson, the Irishman from Brooklyn, who complained bitterly "that there is not sufficient courage in the American Congress to say whether the British lion's tail shall be wrung or the American eagle's neck twisted," and that nine American citizens "are bleeding and suffering and sickening and dying in filthy prisons." Mr. Robinson fiercely demanded the impeachment of Mr. Lowell, but as the House fully understood that the Americans in prison might have their release and a free passage to America at any time they chose, Mr. Robinson's shrieks only excited laughter.

Mr. Jay Hubbell as an Exponent of Ethics is so surprising a phenomenon that his appearance in that character should not escape the notice of the public. Mr. Hubbell is the politician who signed the circular recently received by the clerks, laborers, errand boys, and even the women engaged in the civil service, making application for contributions to the campaign fund. Mr. Hubbell suggests to one day laborer, who has a wife and children to support and who receives only two dollars a day for his services, that his contribution should not be less than fifteen dollars, and an errand boy thirteen years of age is informed that his contribution should be three dollars and a half. All these people, too, are well aware that the circular, cautiously as it is worded, implies a threat of the axe as certainly as if that weapon had been engraved on every circular. After signing these documents Mr. Hubbell has now written an open letter to Mr. George W. Curtis, giving that gentleman his definition of manly and honorable conduct. Mr. Hubbell lecturing Mr. Curtis on ethics is a spectacle of a very suggestive character. If Mr. Hubbell had kept silence and shunned publicity the public would not have been surprised.

The Prohibition Amendment has been Carried in Iowa by a decisive majority. Six districts were still to be heard from at the end of last week, but the returns of the other counties were all in and gave a net majority for prohibition of 26,888. All-day prayer-meetings were held in all the cities of the State, and in other cities prayer was offered at largely attended meetings for success in Iowa. The victory achieved has given an impetus to the prohibition movement in Wisconsin, Indiana, and Michigan, which seems likely to bring the question to a vote at an early day in all of the States named. Indiana is considered the most hopeful field by the friends of temperance, and they express great confidence in their ability to carry the measure there.

Supplies of Food have been Sent to the starving people of Patrick County, Va., in abundance. Flour, corn, meal, bread, bacon and coffee have been despatched by sympathizing citizens; and a telegram from Danville, dated June 28th, says that "letters have just been received from leading citizens of Patrick County, by the Committee of Distribution there which say that the provisions on hand, and those of which they have notice of coming, will be sufficient for their people." A report issued by interested parties who hoped to make a market out of the urgent needs of the starving people said that the accounts previously published were exaggerated, but it has been ascertained that several cases of death from starvation occurred, and one case has been clearly established in which a woman and five of her children starved to death in that county before assistance could reach them. The number of persons who have suffered for want of food is between five thousand and six thousand, nearly half the population of the county. Citizens generally, since the suffering began last winter, have divided their supplies with their destitute neighbors until all the corn and other provisions were exhausted, and there is not now anywhere in the county as much as five bushels of grain in the hands of any one excepting the Committee of Distribution, to whom supplies have been sent. Liberal assistance has been received from various cities and sections of the Union. No speculation upon the destitution of the people has been practised, and none would be tolerated if attempted.

A Marriage at the Indian School at Carlisle was celebrated on June 20th. The bridegroom, Elahdhiwh, a Kiowa brave, explained in a naive way how the alliance was brought about. He said: "Long time ago, in Indian Territory, I hunt and I fight; I not think about girls. Then you take me to St. Augustine. I learn much, but I not think about girls. I go to Carlisle; I learn more; I do right; I not think about girls. I go to my home; I do not think about girls there. But Laura, she thinks. I bring her to Carlisle. When I can work I will take care of her." He has since finished his studies and learned how to make a living. The bride and bridegroom were accompanied to the altar by twelve attendants selected from the various tribes represented at the school. The ceremony was made a very solemn one for the purpose of impressing the Indians with its sacredness. It may be hoped that purpose will be consummated, for in the influence of domestic ties consists much of the hope entertained of Indian civilization.

The Execution of Guiteau, the Assassin of President Garfield, on Friday, June 30th, forms the last scene of the melancholy tragedy of which the shot which echoed around the world on July 2d, 1881, was the opening. Persistent efforts had been made to deliver the miserable wretch from his just doom. The plea of insanity, which had been so successful in other cases in enabling criminals to escape, was the capital employed; and it was carried in vain from court to court and was finally pressed on the President. But having had a fair trial, in which unusual privileges were afforded him, and in which the plea of insanity was raised and decided, it would have been improper to have commuted the sentence. Guiteau was accordingly hanged on the day appointed, dying easily and not in the slow lingering, agonizing way in which his victim died. The blasphemous creature died, as he had lived, unrepentant, and with his mouth full of imprecations. He predicted that the vengeance of Heaven would fall upon the nation in punishment for his death, though when he slew Garfield he appeared to think that human life had no sanctity. He wished to be considered a martyr, yet instead of prayers for the forgiveness of the people who put him to death he expressed his gratification at the thought that they would suffer eternal torment. He proved that he could reason logically, and in spite of medical opinions convinced the world that he was sane and responsible. The sentimental sympathy for him which the Washington correspondents during the past month have industriously labored to arouse would, even if it had been successful, have been utterly wasted. He was a bad, depraved man, and he grounded his hope of escape on the opinion wicked men generally hold that others are as bad as they. He believed that President Arthur was so vile as to protect him from punishment, and when he learned his mistake he showed by his curses how degraded he was. His crime was a cruelty to his victim, an outrage on the nation, and a blasphemy against God. It is very gratifying that he should have been protected from lawless vengeance to die by the hand of the common hangman with all the signs of national contempt and abhorrence.

The Swiss Colony at Mount Airy, Ga., is reported as exceedingly prosperous. It now comprises twenty families, and several more are expected soon. Each family brought from $2000 to $5000, and now owns a farm which, in comparison with the scanty measures of Switzerland, seems like a kingdom. The average size of the farms is 160 acres, and they already show the intelligence and honest industry of their owners. The colonists call their settlement, upon which they have expended about $60,000, New Switzerland.

A Humiliating Spectacle was Witnessed in New York every night last week, when the laborers employed in the place of the freight-handlers who have struck for an advance of pay, marched through the city to their homes guarded by the police. They are a poor, ragged, half-starved looking set of men whose faces bear the marks of abject poverty. They have been employed by the great transportation companies so that the companies may avoid paying the three cents an hour extra which the men requested. That the demand was not excessive is patent to every citizen, for it has been shown that the cost of living, owing to the advance in the price of provisions and in rents, is now one-fourth higher than it was in 1881. But the companies refused the advance, and have replaced the men who could no longer pay their way on their wages with this gang of foreigners, whose necessities compel them to accept any terms. Meantime, we read of the capitalists living in lavish splendor with accumulations of money, in one case amounting to over a hundred million dollars, and who are yet so greedy and avaricious that they engage in a contest with their employees over three cents an hour, which they ask to enable them to live clear of debt. It is not surprising that they find it necessary to invoke the assistance of the police, lest the men, maddened by the injustice, should commit some desperate and lawless act. God has expressly warned the wealthy against this selfishness (1 Tim. 6: 17, 18), and history demonstrates that more than once the patience of the poor has been exhausted and has inflicted a terrible punishment on those who have done them injustice and disregarded God's commands in this matter. It is time that plain words are spoken, for among the guilty and in the foremost rank are men who make a profession of religion.

A Book Cover Caused the Serious Illness of child, and nearly cost it its life, last week at Troy, N. Y. The child while playing with some water-color paints, looked about for a palette, and seized a small book—attracted by the bright green color of its cover. He mixed the paints on the cover of the book for some time. Then he was suddenly taken with convulsions. Physicians who were hastily summoned declared that he had been poisoned. They administered antidotes, but the child went into convulsion after convulsion, and it was only after three days' incessant labor that the physicians saved his life. The child's parents afterward had the book cover tested for poison, and discovered that the dye with which the binding was colored contained poison. In wetting the paints on the book-cover the child had innocently wet also the dye—and soon transferred some of the poison to its own lips. This case in its peculiar features is said to be unprecedented, though unapparently it is not at all uncommon for moral poison to be communicated by the contents of a book.

A Lost Pound of Candy Delayed a Train crowded with passengers for a considerable time on Saturday, June 24th, at New London, Conn. Just as the special train for Norwich at New London was about to start a well-dressed young man went to the conductor and asked him if he would delay his train a few minutes while he went for a valuable package he had left in the palace car of the Shore Line Road. He replied, "I will," and kindly waited. The young man sped on his mission and returned without finding his package. The conductor saw the young man on board and then gave the signal to start. Thinking there might have been Government bonds or priceless jewels in the missing package, he asked the young man what was in it, that he might aid him in recovering it. At first the young man declined to answer, but he finally replied, "A pound of French candy." The conductor's chagrin at having lost time and hindered over fifty passengers for so trifling a cause may be imagined. It was only a question of relative value. This is the principle for which Christians contend. In eternity, when property is appraised at its true worth, we shall see that he causes us to suffer to delay our spiritual progress are like this young man's pound of candy, miserably over-valued (Matt. 16 : 26).

Broken Watch-Springs are Cited as Evidence of the electrical character of the cyclone which on June 17th desolated Grinnell and other cities in Iowa. A letter from Des Moines, dated June 26th, says: "Observers of the cyclone cloud at Grinnell say it was luminous with electric fire, and there was a continuous report from electric explosions like torpedoes. It is besides clear that there must have been electric disturbance, as otherwise it is impossible to explain the fact that the main-springs of watches were broken in extraordinary numbers all along the track of the storm for thirty miles wide. In this city alone thirty watches were taken to jewellers on Monday with main-springs broken Saturday night." It seems strange that there should be any connection between such a phenomenon as that raging, destructive tornado, tearing up trees and overturning houses, and such a delicate instrument as a tiny watch-spring. It was not to the wind that the sensitive coils responded but to the subtle electric power present in the storm. There was a recognition in those broken springs of a mighty power, as in that other storm centuries ago on Horeb, when in the still small voice Elijah recognized the presence of God (1 Kings 19 : 11-13). In the terrible scenes yet to come on the world there will be similar recognition in suffering which might be escaped if Christians read aright "the signs of the times."

The Increase of Leprosy in New York during the past year was the subject of a paper read at a meeting of the County Medical Society last week by Professor Henry G. Piffard. The lecture was illustrated by the examination of a patient in the tuberculous stage of the disease. The patient was a native of Japan who came to this country several years ago. At home his business was that of an agricultural laborer, but after his arrival here he went to work in a packing-house. The disease was developed in this climate, and he was admitted to the New York Hospital in the latter part of May and subsequently sent to the Island, where he came under the notice of Professor Piffard and Professor Sturgis. His limbs were already covered with well-marked leprosy tubercles, shrunken, and rather ghastly in appearance. A discussion followed in which Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Sturgis and other eminent physicians took part tending to show the symptoms which distinguished leprosy proper from other kindred diseases. There seemed to be a general agreement that all its forms had a common origin. That origin, as indicated by the physicians, renders the comparison between the disease and sin, which is frequently drawn, very remarkable. It is also noteworthy that we read of no cases of cure except by miracle, and that Christ dwells upon the cleansing of the lepers as one of the proofs of His divinity (Matt. 11 : 5).

A Murderer Voluntarily Surrendered Himself to the police at Hoboken, N. J., on June 28th, and confessed his crime, committed ten years ago. He is described as a man of more than ordinary intelligence. He told his story in a cool, straightforward and rational manner, that entirely precluded any idea that he is insane or laboring under a hallucination. He states that in 1872, in Somerset County, Pennsylvania, he and another man waylaid a third, whom they struck with iron bars and killed. To prevent the discovery of their crime they carried the body to the railroad and placed it on the track, to be run over by the next train. The locomotive failed to do its work properly, and the body was thrown to the side of the track with one of its arms crushed. The medical examination revealed the fact that the victim had died from a series of blows on the head, and two men were arrested, but no evidence could be obtained and they were discharged. The self-accused man says he has been haunted by his victim ever since, and finally concluded to confess his crime and abide his punishment. The man seemed relieved of a mental burden when he had made his confession and was locked up. It doubtless gave him a temporary peace, but unless he seeks the pardon of God through the blood of Jesus he can have no true and permanent peace. The tortures of self-reproach he has suffered here will be but a slight foretaste of what he must endure beyond the grave (Matt. 13 : 41, 42).

An Amateur Physician's Prescription and its results are described in a Boston journal. It appears that a boat's crew from a New Bedford ship off the coast of Patagonia were set upon by the savages and the mate of the ship was caught and carried off to the village. Relating the experiences of his captivity, he says that the savages persisted in regarding him as a wonderful physician. Thinking that this veneration for the healing art might give him a chance to escape he humored them in their belief. He had, however, considerable difficulty in keeping up his assumed character. On one occasion he was called to attend an old squaw widow who had suddenly fallen ill. Arrived at her tent he found her crouched on a horse's skin, and she was the filthiest creature he ever beheld. He produced his watch with much solemnity and felt the old squaw's pulse in the approved medical manner. He fumbled at the wrist for some time without finding the artery, but very justly reflecting that he would have been no wiser had he found it, he was not much disconcerted. The prescription was the next thing, and there he was puzzled, for he knew nothing of the savage or any other Pharmacopœia. He thought, however, that the woman would be no worse for a good bath, so he ordered that, with minute directions as to the scrubbing being smart and thorough. His instructions were carried out, and when the layers of dirt were removed, the old woman recovered, and the amateur physician's reputation was established among the natives. Had the mate received a thorough medical training it is doubtful if he could have given a better prescription in this case, but there are cases in which cleansing would not have cured disease. In the affairs of the soul both healing and cleansing are necessary and they both come from the hands of the Great Physician (Psa. 103 : 3).

"JEHOVAH-ROPHI."

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I am the Lord that healeth thee."—Exodus 15 : 26.

The Lord a Different Being to His Foes and Friends—To His Foes Destruction—To His Friends Healing—Heavenly Surgery—A God of Surprises—A Trinity of Questions—I. God's Healing of His People's Circumstances—By Changing them Altogether—By Putting in a New Ingredient—By Giving a Submissive Spirit—II. Healing of the Body—By Preventing Sickness—By Restoration—By Blessing Outward Means—III. Healing of the Soul—Sin Made as Bitter as Marah—The Foolishness of the Perfectly Sanctified—The Sweetening Tree—The Change Miraculous—Spiritual Healing Fully Accomplished—The Lord will Do it.

WE shall consider this passage in its connection, for I have no doubt that the miracle at Marah was intended to be a very instructive illustration of the glorious title which is here claimed by the covenant God of Israel—"I am Jehovah-Rophi, the Lord that healeth thee." The illustration introduces the sermon of which this verse is the text. The healing of the bitter waters is the parable of which the line before us is the lesson. How different is the Lord to His foes and to His friends. His presence is light to Israel and darkness to Egypt. Egypt only knew Jehovah as the Lord that plagueth and destroyeth those who refuse to obey Him. He overthrew their armies at the Red Sea, and drowned their hosts beneath the waves; but to His own people, in themselves but very little superior to the Egyptians, God is not the terrible avenger consuming His adversaries, but "Jehovah that healeth thee."

Their mental and moral diseases were almost as great as those of the Egyptians whom the Lord cut off from before him, but He spared His chosen for His covenant sake. He bared the sword of justice against rebellious Pharaoh, and then He turned His tender, healing hand upon His own people, to exercise toward them the

of His grace. Israel knew Him as the Lord that heals, and Egypt knew Him as the Lord that smites. Let us adore the grace which make so wide a difference, the sovereign grace which brings salvation unto Israel, and let us confess our own personal obligations to the mercy which has not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.

Again, how differently does God deal with His own people from what we should have expected. He is a God of surprises, He does things which we looked not for. God deals with us not according to our conception of His ways, but according to His own wisdom and prudence; for as the heavens are high above the earth so high are His thoughts above our thoughts. You would not have supposed that a people, for whom God had given Egypt as a ransom would have been led into the wilderness of Shur; neither would you have guessed that a people so near to Him that he cleft the sea and made them walk between two glassy walls dry shod, would have been left for three days without water. You naturally expect to see the chosen tribes brought right speedily into a condition of comfort; or, if there must be a journey ere they reach the land that floweth with milk and honey, you look at once for the smitten rock and the flowing stream, the manna and the quails, and all things else which they can desire.

How singular it seems that after having done such a great marvel for them the Lord should cause them to thirst beneath a burning sky, and that too when they were quite unprepared for it, being quite new to desert privations, having lived so long by the river of Egypt, where they drank of sweet water without stint. We read at other times, "Thou, Lord, didst send a plenteous rain, whereby thou didst refresh thine inheritance when it was weary;" but here we meet with no showers, no brooks gushed forth below, and no rain dropped from above. Three days without water is a severe trial when the burning sand is below and the blazing sky is above. Yet the Lord's people in some way or other are sure to be tried; theirs is no holiday parade, but a stern march by a way which flesh and blood would never have chosen.

The Egyptians found enough water, and even too much of it, for they were drowned in the sea, but the well-beloved Israelites had no water at all. So is it with the wicked man; he often has enough of wealth, and too much of it, till he is drowned in sensual delights and perishes in floods of prosperity. He has his portion in this life, and in that portion he is lost, like Pharaoh in the proud waters. Full often the Lord's people are made to know the pinch of poverty; their lives are made wretched by sore bondage, and they faint for a morsel of bread.

Thus he made His people know that the wilderness was not their rest, nor their home; for they could not even find such a common necessary as water wherewith to quench their thirst. He made them understand that the promised brooks that flowed with milk and honey were not in the wilderness, but must be found on the other side of Jordan, in the land which God had given to their fathers, and they must journey thither with weary feet. "This is not your rest," was the lesson of their parched lips in the three days' march.

You know what teaching there is in all this, for your experience answers to it. Do not marvel, beloved, if with all your joy over your vanquished sin, which shall be seen by you no more forever, you yet have to lament your present grievous want. The children of Israel cried, "What shall we drink?" This was a wretched sequel to "Sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously." Have you never made the same descent? If you are in poverty you are, no doubt, tempted to put that trinity of questions, "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" You are not the first to whom this temptation has happened. Do not marvel at all if up from the triumph of the Red Sea, with a song in your mouth and a timbrel in your hand, you ascend into the great and terrible wilderness, and enter upon the land of drought. This way lies Canaan, and this way you must go. Through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom, and therefore let us set our minds to it.

We shall try this morning to set before you, by the help of the divine Spirit, this grand character of God, that He is the God that healeth us. First, we shall notice the healing of our circumstances, dwelling upon that in order the better to set forth the greater fact, "I am the Lord that healeth thee." Secondly, we shall remember the healing of our bodies which is here promised to obedient Israel, and we shall set forth that truth, in order to bring out our third point, which is the healing of our souls: "I am the Lord that healeth thee,"—not thy circumstances only, nor thy bodily diseases only, but thyself, thy soul, thy truest self; for there is the worst bitterness, there is the sorest disease, and there shall the grandest power of God be shown to thee, and to all who know thee.

I. The glorious Jehovah shows His HEALING ON OUR CIRCUMSTANCES.

The fainting Israelites thought that when they came to Marah they should slake their thirst. Often enough the mirage had mocked them as it does all thirsty travellers; they thought that they saw before them flowing rivers and palm trees, but as they rushed forward they found nothing but sand, for the mirage was deluding them. At last, however, the waters of Marah were fairly within sight, and they were not a delusion; here was real water, and they were sure of it. No doubt they rushed forward helter-skelter, each man eager to drink, and what must have been their disappointment when they found that they could not endure it. A thirsty man will drink almost anything, but this water was so bitter that it was impossible for them to receive it.

I do not read that they had murmured all the three days of their thirsty march, but this disappointment was too much for them. The relief which seemed so near was snatched away; the cup was dashed from their lips, and they began to murmur against Moses, and so in truth against God. Here was the proof of their imperfection: they were impatient and unbelieving. Have we not too often fallen into the same sin? Brethren, let your conscience answer! When you have felt a sharp affliction, and it has continued long, and you have been wearied out with it, you have at length seen a prospect of escape, but that prospect has completely failed you.

What woe is this! When the friend you so surely relied upon tells you that he can do nothing; when the physician upon whom you put such reliance informs you that his medicine has not touched the malady, when the last expedient that you could adopt to save yourself from bankruptcy, the last arrow in your quiver has missed the mark—how your spirit has sunk within you in dire despair! Then your heart has begun to wound itself, like the scorpion, with its own sting. You have felt as if you were utterly spent and ready for the grave. The last trial was too much for you, you could bear up no longer. Happy have you been if under such conditions you have not been left to give way to murmuring against God.

Now, dear friends, in answer to prayer God has often healed your bitter waters and made them sweet. I am about to appeal to your personal experience, you that are truly pilgrims under the guidance of your heavenly Lord. Has it not been so with you? I should have no difficulty in refreshing your memories about Marah, for very likely its bitterness is in your mouth even now, and you cannot forget your sorrow. But just now I wish to refresh your memories about what came of that sorrow.

DID NOT GOD DELIVER YOU?

Did He not, when you cried, come to your rescue?

Has not the Lord oftentimes made our bitter waters sweet by changing our circumstances altogether? When the poor in heart have been oppressed, God has taken away the oppressor, or else taken the heart away from the oppression. When you have been in great straits and could not see which way to steer, has not the Lord Jesus seemed to open before you a wider channel, or Himself to steer your vessel through all the intricacies of the narrow river, and bring you where you would come? Have you noticed in your lives that most remarkable changes have taken place at times when anguish took hold upon you? I can bear my witness, if you cannot, that the Lord has great healing power in the matter of our trials and griefs. He has changed my circumstances in providence, and in many ways altered the whole aspect of affairs.

On other occasions the Lord has not removed the circumstances, and yet He has turned sorrow into joy, for He has put into them a new ingredient, which has acted as an antidote to the acrid flavor of your affliction. You were not allowed to leave the shop, but there came a fresh manager, who shielded you from persecution; you were not permitted to quit your business, but there came a wonderful improvement in your trade, and this reconciled you to the long hours. You were not made to be perfectly healthy, but you were helped to a medicine which much assuaged the sharpness of the pain; thus has your Marah been sweetened. Have you not found it so? You have been at Marah, but even there you have been able to drink, for a something has been put into the waters of afflictive providence which has made them endurable.

And where this has not been done the Lord has by a heavenly art made your bitter waters sweet by giving you more satisfaction with the divine will, more submission, more acquiescence in what the Lord has ordained. After all, this is the most effectual remedy. If I cannot bring my circumstances to my mind, yet if God helps me to bring my mind to my circumstances the matter is made right. There is a degree of sweetness about pain, and poverty, and shame when once you feel, "The loving Lord ordained all this for me; my tribulation is of His appointing." Then the soul, feeling that the affliction comes from a Father's hand, accepts it, and kicks against the pricks no longer.

Have you never said when under tribulation, "I could not have believed it; I am perfectly happy under my trial, and yet when I looked forward to it I dreaded it beyond measure. I said it would be the death of me, but now I find that by these things men live, and in all this is the life of my spirit." We exclaim with Jacob, "All these things are against me," but the Lord gives us more grace, and we see that all things work together for good and we bless the Lord for His afflicting hand. So you see the Lord Jehovah heals our bitter waters and makes our circumstances endurable to our sanctified minds.

Sustaining providences are to the saints sure pledges of grace. The sweetened water is a picture of a sweetened nature. I had almost said it is a type of it. God binds Himself by the gracious deliverances of His providence to give you equal deliverances of grace. It is joyous to say, "He is the Lord that healed my circumstances," but how much better to sing of His name as "The Lord that healeth thee." Do not be contented till you reach to that; but do be confident that He who healed Marah will heal you; He that has helped you to rejoice in Him in all your times of trouble will sustain you in all your struggles with sin, till you shall more sweetly and more loudly praise His blessed name.

II. Let us now proceed a step further. As we have spoken of God's healing our circumstances so now we have to think of the Lord's HEALING OUR BODIES.

This frail, sensitive, and earthly frame, which Paul calls "this vile body," grows weary and worn, and by and-by it will fade away and die, unless the Lord shall come; and even if He should come this feeble fabric must be totally changed, for flesh and blood as they now are cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither can corruption dwell with incorruption. Even unto this day the body is under death because of sin, and is left so on purpose to remind us of the effects of sin, that we may feel within ourselves what sin has done, and may the better guess at what sin would have done if we had remained under it, for the pains of hell would have been ours for ever.

These griefs of body are meant, I say, to make us recollect what we owe to the redemption of our Lord Jesus, and so to keep us humble and grateful. Aches and pains are also sent to keep us on the wing for heaven, even as thorns in the nest drive the bird from its sloth. They make us long for the land where the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick.

Yet the Lord does heal our bodies. First He heals them by PREVENTING SICKNESS.

A prevention is better than cure. Do we sufficiently praise God for guarding us from disease? I am afraid that His preserving care is often forgotten. Men will go thirty or forty years almost without an illness, and forget the Lord in consequence. That which should secure gratitude creates indifference. When we have been ill we come up to the house of the Lord and desire to return thanks because of our recovery; ought we not to give thanks when we are not ill, and do not need to be recovered? Should it not be to you healthy folk a daily cause of gratitude to God that He keeps away those pains which would keep you awake all night, and wards off those sicknesses which would cause your beauty to consume away like the moth.

But we see this healing hand of the Lord more conspicuously when, like Hezekiah, we have been sick, and have been restored. Sometimes we lie helpless and hopeless like dust ready to return to its fellow dust; we are incapable of exertion, and ready to be dissolved. Then if the Lord renews our youth and takes away our sickness, we do praise His name; and so we ought, for it is not the doctor, it is not the medicine—these are but the outward means; it is the Lord who is the true Physician, and unto Jehovah-Rophi be the praise. "I am the Lord that healeth thee." Let those of us that have been laid aside, and have been again allowed to walk abroad, lift up our hearts and our voices in thanksgiving to the Lord who forgiveth all our iniquities, who healeth all our diseases.

According to the analogy of the healing of Marah, the Lord does this by means; for He cast a tree into the water. Those who will use no medicine whatever certainly have no Scriptural warrant for their conduct. Even where cures are given to faith, yet the apostle says, "Is any sick? Let him send for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." The anointing with oil was the proper medicine of the day, and possibly a great deal better medicine than some of the drugs which are used nowadays. To the use of this anointing the promise is given, "and the prayer of faith shall raise the sick." Hezekiah was miraculously healed, but the Lord said, "take a lump of figs, and lay it upon the sore." God could have spoken a word and turned Marah sweet, but He did not choose to do so; He would exercise the faith and obedience of His people by bidding them cast a tree into the waters.

The use of means is not to hinder faith, but to try it. Still, it is the Lord who works the cure, and this is the point which is so often forgotten. Oh, come let us sing unto Jehovah who hath said, "I am the Lord that healeth thee." Do not attribute to secondary means that which ought to be ascribed to God alone. His fresh air, and warm sun, or bracing wind, and refreshing showers do more for our healing than we dream of, or if medicine be used, it is He who gives virtue to the drugs, and so by His own Almighty hand works out our cure. As one who has felt His restoring hand, I will personally sing unto Him who is the health of my countenance and my God.

Note this, that in every healing of which we are the subjects we have a pledge of the resurrection. Every time a man who is near the gates of death rises up again he enjoys a kind of rehearsal of that grand rising when from beds of dust and silent clay the perfect saints shall rise at the trumpet of the archangel and the voice of God. We ought to gather from our restorations from serious and perilous sickness a proof that the God who brings us back from the gates of the grave can also bring us back from the grave itself whenever it shall be His time to do so.

III. Now we come to the

HEALING OF OUR SOULS.

The Lord our God will heal our spirits, and He will do it in somewhat the same manner as that in which He healed Marah. How was that? First He made the people know how bitter Marah was. There was no healing for that water till they had tasted it, and discovered that it was too brackish to be endured; but after they knew its bitterness then the Lord made it sweet to them. So is it with your sin, my brother. It must become more and more bitter to you. You will have to cry out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?" You will have to feel that you cannot live upon anything that is within yourself. The creature must be made distasteful to you, and all trusts that come of it; for God's way is first to kill, and then to make alive; first to wound, and then to heal. He begins by making Marah to be Marah, and afterward He makes it sweet.

What next? The next thing was there was prayer offered. I do not know whether any of the people possessed faith in God, but if so they had a prayerless faith, and God does not work in answer to prayerless faith. "Oh," says one, "I am perfectly sanctified." How do you know? "Because I believe I am." That will never do. Is a man rich because he believes he is? Will sickness vanish if I believe myself to be well?

Some even think it useless to pray because they feel sure of having the blessing. That putting aside of prayer is a dangerous piece of business altogether. If there is not the cry to God for the blessing, ay, and the daily cry for keeping and for sanctification, the mercy will not come. Again, I say, healing comes not to a prayerless faith. You may believe what you like, but God will only hear you when you pray. Faith must pour itself out in prayer before the blessing will be poured into the soul. Moses cried, and he obtained the blessing; the people did not cry, and they would have been in an evil case had it not been for Moses. We must come to crying and praying before we shall receive sanctification, which is the making whole of our spirits.

Marah became sweet through the introduction of something outside of itself—a tree, I know not of what kind. The rabbis say that it was a bitter tree, and naturally tended to make the water more bitter still. However that may be, I cannot imagine any tree in all the world, bitter or sweet, which could have power to sweeten such a quantity of water as must have been at Marah. The transaction was miraculous, and the tree was used merely as the instrument, and no further. But I do know a tree which, if put into the soul, will sweeten all its thoughts and desires; and Jesus knew that tree, that tree whereon He died and shed His blood as a victim for our sin.

Again the task of turning Marah sweet was a very difficult one. No human power could have achieved it; and even so the task of changing our nature is not only difficult, but impossible to us. We must be born again, not of the will of man, nor of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. There was no turning Marah sweet by any means within the reach of Moses or the myriads that came up with him out of Egypt. This wonder must come from Jehovah's hand. So is the change of our nature a thing beyond all human might. Who can make his own heart clean? God must work this marvel. We must be born again from above, or else we shall remain in the gall of bitterness even unto the end.

What a blessing is this! If I had to make myself holy I must despair; and if I had to make myself perfect and keep myself so it would never be done; but the Lord Jehovah can do it, and has already begun to do it. Things which I once hated I now love; all things have become new. Simple faith in Jesus Christ, the putting of the cross into the stream, does it all, and does it at once, too, and does it so effectually that there is no return of the bitterness, but the heart remains sweet and pure before the living God.

The task was completely accomplished. The people came and drank of Marah just as freely as they afterward drank of Elim or of the water that leaped from the smitten rock. So God can and will complete in us the change of our nature. Paul saith, "I am persuaded that He that hath begun a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Christ." The Lord has not begun to sweeten us a little with the intent of leaving us in a half healed condition, but He will continue the process till we are without trace of defilement.

That sweetened Marah was all of God; our renewed nature shall be all of God. We shall not be able to take the slightest particle of credit to ourselves, nor shall we wish to do so. Brethren, he will be sure to do it because it will glorify His name. Let us draw comfort from this fact; there will be no interfering with the Lord by a rival claimant to honor, no idolatry in us taking away part of His praises; therefore He will do it, and change our bitterness into perfect sweetness. Blessed be His name, He can do it; nothing will baffle the skill of "the Lord that healeth thee." Whenever I am cast down under a sense of corruption, I always like to get a hold of this divine name, "The Lord that healeth thee."

THE LORD WILL DO IT;

Now, as you have believed in God for your justification and found it in Christ, so believe in God for your sanctification, that He will work in you to will and to do according to His good pleasure; that He will exterminate in you the very roots of sin; that he will make you like Himself, without taint or speck, and that, as surely as you are trusting in Christ, you shall be whiter than snow, pure as the infinite Jehovah, and you shall stand with His Firstborn, accepted in the Beloved. My soul seems to grasp this, and to hold it all the more firmly because the Lord has turned my bitter circumstances into sweetness, and He has healed the sickness of my body. Because of these former mercies I know that He will heal the sickness of my spirit, and I shall be whole, that is to say holy, without spot or trace of sin, and so shall I be forever with the Lord. "Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Amen.

"NOT A DROP."

It was well meant, no doubt. It was kindly said. It was, moreover, just the kind of weather for a glass of something hot.

Nevertheless, Bill Heard at once refused it.

And if the first offer was well put, the subsequent one was kinder than ever. Indeed, the pressure was almost embarrassing. Bill would confer a great favor by accepting the steaming glass.

The tone of his voice, was, however, none the less decided, the shake of his head none the less vigorous, as he again refused.

Was it that the offerer was piqued by this two-fold refusal, and was chafed at his failure? His raised tone of voice, and his almost blustering vehemence, as he made his offer for the third time seemed to point to such a temper. And, to judge by Bill Heard's reply, a similar suspicion had crossed his mind, for now his words assumed a tone of decision more unmistakable than ever.

"Not a drop," he said.

And what he said he stuck to, repeating his "Not a drop" with every subsequent offer, until the baffled treater went muttering away.

Now, it is because all men are not like Bill Heard, that I have brought him to the front. I want to show by a few contrasts how much better it would be if some of the feeble ones would move up a step or two, and take his decided tone of "Not a drop."

There's Harry Squirrel, for instance, whose "No" is a whole "Yes."

"Have a drop, Harry?"

"No—o—o—o, thank you," says he.

But you can see in a moment that he is longing for it with all his heart. Indeed, I am half inclined to think that his limp, wavering "No," is only intended to quiet his conscience, so that having once uttered it, he may feel at liberty to say "Yes." And so his "No" is said in such a tone, and with such manifest tokens of reluctance, as shall be understood to mean "Yes." Harry Squirrel's "No" is not an honest refusal. Nothing so confirms me in this opinion as the expression of Harry's face when once his "No" is accepted as his real wish. So regretful, so disappointed, so troubled.

But I am bound to say this rarely happens, for, through long practice, Harry's "No" is such a perfect masterpiece, that no ordinary man could mistake it. Its "Yes" shines out through its flimsy outside as clearly as though he said "Yes" all the while.

Then there's Tom Turner, the man whose "No" means half a "Yes." He doesn't want to drink, and yet he does want to drink. He feels convinced that if he accepted the offer he would be likely to get into mischief. He does not feel at all confident in his ability to stop at the first drop, and so fears to accept it. And yet there is the thirst and the yearning pushing him on to an eager "Yes, yes." What should he do? Of course he must say "No." But, isn't there any middle kind of "No" which doesn't quite mean "No"? Yes, properly accompanied and assisted by look, tone, and gesture, a "No" may be so translated as to leave it an open question which he means. It will then be half a "Yes." Then, supposing he is pressed hard, and has to yield, it will be more the fault of the treater than of anybody else. And so he escapes blame.

"Have a glass, Tom?"

"No, thank you. Not to-day." This is said very decidedly.

"I think I won't. I suspect I should be better without it. It's very good of you, but perhaps I'd better not." This is said as an immediate continuation of the other, but in a qualified, doubtful, and ambiguous manner.

Of course the necessary pressure is put on. And of course the necessary result follows. Tom gets his glass, and a few more, and maintains an easy conscience.

Then, there's Peter Toddy, whose "No" rings out clearly enough, and resolutely too, but who makes that refusal in his own strength. He sees the evil of the drink, and desires earnestly to keep clear of its trammels, and his "No" is a true expression of his inward wish. But he trusts himself too much. Rather a boaster is Peter. Hasn't he made up his mind? Hasn't he a mind to make up? Hasn't he a will of his own?

It would be tedious to follow the whole course of the struggle, to trace how at first by slight degrees, and afterward by degrees not insignificant, he yields ground. The upshot of the whole is that Peter Toddy is seen disappearing with a skip and a jump inside the public-house door, a willing captive, to celebrate his defeat with something strong supplied therein.

How refreshing to come back to Bill Heard, to contemplate his triumphant course, to hear his decided, manly, and persistent "Not a drop."

But then, Bill was a man of God, and had given his heart to his Saviour. And so he had learned to trust Him for the strength he needed as much as any man. He was ever pondering that grand promise, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

AN OLD MAN'S TESTIMONY.

Two young men were spending a vacation some time ago at a sea-side resort where they occupied their time chiefly in fishing. Their fondness for that sport led to their becoming acquainted with an old fisherman who, though generally taciturn and seldom speaking except in reply to a question, occasionally made a remark full of wisdom and in which there was not a little wit. The old man liked the boys and they were always welcome to his little cabin, where he would show them all kind of fishing appliances and tell them how they should proceed.

One day the two youths were sitting in the old man's cabin as usual, talking to each other rather than to him. The conversation turned on a temperance meeting to be held in the town that night to which both had been invited. One of the youths in the course of the conversation said, as defining his attitude on the temperance question: "I drink to make me work."

The old fisherman heard the words, and to the surprise of both his hearers joined in the conversation. He said: "That's right; thee drink, and it will make thee work! Harken to me a moment, and I'll tell thee something that may do thee good; you see that bottle"—pointing to one in the window. "I should not have been here now if it had not been for that stuff. I was once a prosperous farmer. I had a good loving wife and two fine lads as ever the sun shone on. We had a comfortable home, and lived happily together. But we used to drink ale to make us work. Those two lads I have laid in drunkards' graves. My wife died broken-hearted, and she now lies by her two sons. I am seventy-two years of age. Had it not been for drink, I might now have been an independent gentleman; but I used to drink to make me work, and mark, it makes me work now. At seventy years of age I am obliged to work for my daily bread. Drink! and it will make you work."

LILIAN TOWERS' LETTER.

In an old house in a Southern State a clergyman was pacing to and fro in a long, rather narrow room, which was called the picture gallery. The walls were almost covered with pictures except where, here and there, an old cabinet stood, on which were displayed rare specimens of old china and other curiosities. The clergyman had a habit of walking in this room when his mind was deeply absorbed in the preparation of his sermons, or in any subject demanding close and profound thought. The room was seldom used, and he could enjoy the deep stillness, broken only by his own foot-falls or an occasional half audible ejaculation from his own lips as a conclusion was reached in the process of thought.

On this particular morning, as he sauntered through the room, he thought, after he had been there a few minutes, that he heard a suppressed sob. He listened intently for a moment but he heard no more, and, concluding his fancy had deceived him, proceeded with his walk. But again he heard the slight noise, and this time he was convinced he had not been mistaken and he was also sure of the direction from which it came. He walked along the gallery and drawing aside a heavy curtain that screened an alcove room the mysterious sound was explained. There, on the floor near a window, on which the rain was beating in a torrent sat Lilian Towers, the governess whom he had engaged to conduct the education of his three young daughters after the death of their mother. Her attitude was expressive of intense grief and her tears seemed to rival, in the rapidity with which they fell, the raindrops as they trickled down the panes of the window. One hand covered her face and in the other she grasped a letter which was clearly the cause of her trouble.

The sight was a very distressing one to the clergyman, whose heart was so tender that even the spectacle of an animal in pain moved him deeply. The governess had obviously been attracted to the gallery by its retirement and quiet and she had gone there, unaware of his habit, to weep over her trouble unobserved. His first impulse was to retire unobserved as he came, but his heart went out toward the distressed lady and it might be that he could offer her words of Christian consolation which would lighten her burden. "You appear to be in bitter sorrow, Miss Towers," he said kindly.

Lilian was startled, and looking up quickly she uttered some words of apology and would have arisen to go to her room, had not the clergyman restrained her. "I am sorry to see you so distressed," he said. "I might be able to assist you if you would confide in me; or if I could not do that I might be able to console you."

Lilian thanked him through her tears for his kindness and sympathy, but she was sadly conscious that the good clergyman could not assist her, and in her present state she believed no one could console her. With gentle pressure, however, she was induced to tell her story. The letter in her hand came from a man who was the companion of her betrothed husband. It told her that the man she loved was dead. Very briefly, for the writer was himself ill, it told her how the two young men venturing out on a fishing excursion had been carried out to sea by a strong current, and when they were laboring hard to reach the shore their boat was upset. The writer had clung to the overturned boat, but Hugh Glyn, his companion, Lilian's lover, was unable to reach it, and he had last seen him swimming bravely but hopelessly. He had himself been rescued by the crew of a fishing vessel, but then Hugh was nowhere to be seen, and it was feared that either his strength had failed him or he had been run down by an outward bound steamer then just fading from view on the horizon.

Such was the sad story that had well nigh broken Lilian's heart; for she was very lonely in the world; her mother and father both were dead, and she had neither brother nor sister to comfort her. The clergyman sympathized with the grief-stricken lady, and when her grief was somewhat subdued, directed her thoughts to Him who came "to comfort all that mourn," and who would if she gave her heart to Him be more to her than lover or husband, father or mother. Lilian listened, and when the good clergyman prayed with, and for her, it seemed to her as if, though she must sorrow all her days, yet there was a bright hope for her beyond the grave. Her rebellious heart was softened and she who had been ready to say, "the Lord hath dealt very bitterly with me," could now say, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good."

After a wakeful, troubled night Lilian sank toward morning into a deep, dreamless sleep, from which she was awakened by the rays of the sun pouring in through her window. In the first moments of consciousness she wondered what had happened, but as her memory recalled the harrowing reality she burst into a new flood of tears and felt very desolate indeed. Still the words she heard the previous day were not forgotten, and kneeling by the side of the bed she prayed long and earnestly for strength, resignation, acquiescence in the Divine will, and for courage and faith to tread her lonely path through the world consistently and usefully. She rose from her knees refreshed, and proceeded to dress quickly, for it was long past her usual hour for appearing in the children's study.

She was scarcely through with her task when a knock was heard on her door. "Some one to see you, Miss Towers," said the servant. Who could it be? She feared it was the writer of the letter she received yesterday, and she braced herself to receive him and to listen to the narrative of the tragical occurrence. She descended to the library, and there she had scarcely entered the room when she was clasped in her lover's arms. He had not been drowned but being picked up by the outward bound steamer had returned in the pilot's boat. Hearing of the letter that had been sent to Lilian he hastened to the house to relieve her of her grief.

It seemed as if the dead had returned to life. The clergyman was called in and acquainted with the glad news, and thanked for the kindly Christian sympathy he had shown to Lilian. Then he spoke very tenderly to the young people, and soon they were all upon their knees offering heartfelt thanks to God for the life preserved, which Hugh in simple faith and trust, solemnly consecrated in the strength of God to the Saviour's service.

CREMATION IN INDIA.

THE illustration on this page represents a scene common enough in India, and which but a short time ago was accompanied by horrible crime. It represents the burning or cremation of the dead body of a native in one of the burning ghats often described by travellers in that ancient land.

The custom of burning the bodies of the dead

has been practised in all lands. It prevailed among the Indians of America, among the prehistoric inhabitants of Europe and in all Asiatic countries in remote times. The Bible informs us that the corpses of Saul the first King of Israel and Jonathan his son were burned after the battle in which they fell (1 Sam. 31:12), and incidental mention of the custom is made in the prophecy of Amos (Amos 6:10). When Christianity was first preached in Europe the custom was prevalent both in Greece and Rome, but as the belief in a future resurrection took root cremation became abhorrent to the minds of the converts and the bodies were committed to the earth in the sure and certain hope of their rising again.

The mode adopted in those ancient times was, and it is still continued in India, to lay the corpse on a pile of wood covered with oil and spices and incense. The wood was then lighted, and as soon as the body was reduced to ashes they were quenched with wine and then gathered up reverently and placed in an urn, which was placed in a subterranean cell or buried in the earth. In India a part of the body is removed from the pile and cast into the Ganges, the sacred river of the country.

As late as the year 1835 the horrible custom prevailed in India of Suttee, or burning alive the widow of a dead man, and this was done on the same pyre with the corpse of the husband. It was Lord William Bentinck, the British Governor-General, who made these living sacrifices illegal. He prohibited them first of all in Bengal, and afterward the prohibition extended throughout India. How necessary the Governor-General's interference was may be inferred from the fact that in the period of eleven years immediately preceding the promulgation of his edict in Bengal alone seven thousand living women were thus sacrificed in the fire that consumed the bodies of their dead husbands, and in the year 1817 seven hundred widows thus lost their lives.

Though it is probable that in many cases the widows were unwilling victims, and were forced by their friends and the priests to undergo this horrible death, it is a fact that a large number sacrificed themselves voluntarily, deluded by the superstitions of heathenism. It is not long since a woman was with difficulty restrained from thus sacrificing her life.

A young British officer stationed in India relates that during an early morning ride he met a procession of police bearing a litter. He asked what the matter was, and the only answer he got was the awful word, "Suttee." His heart leaped to his mouth. He said, "Is the woman dead?" "No, Sahib, but she is dying fast; her husband died yesterday morning, and when the body was being burned, she rushed into the flames. We pulled her out, telling her Suttee was not allowed, but she was very angry, and said she would kill herself somehow. We locked her up, and she screamed all day, refusing food or water. At three in the morning she was senseless, so she was put into the litter, to be taken to the dispensary."

There is even in such an account evidence of superstition of a most depressing kind. It is to people so benighted that missionaries go to carry the glorious Gospel of Christ, and in that Gospel alone is there hope for them of emancipation from this gross darkness.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

For One Moment.

In after life Jean Merle never spoke of that hour of agony. But there was nothing in the past which dwelt so deeply, or lived again so often, in his memory. He had suffered before; but it seemed as nothing to the intensity of the anguish that had befallen him now. The image of Felicity's white and dying face resting against the blackened walls of the hovel, where she had gone to seek him, was indelibly printed on his brain. He would see it till the hour of his own death.

He lifted her up, holding her once more in his arms and clasping her to his heart, as he carried her through the village street to the hotel. Phebe walked beside him, as yet only thinking that Felicitita had fainted. His old neighbors crowded out of their houses, scarcely recognizing Jean Merle in this Monsieur in his good English dress, but with redoubled curiosity when they saw who it was thus bearing the strange English lady in his arms. When he had carried her to the hotel and upstairs, to the room where he had watched beside the death-bed of the stranger who had borne his name, he broke through the gathering crowd of on-lookers, and fled to the mountains.

He had always told himself that Felicity was dead to him. There had not been in his heart the faintest hope that she could ever again be anything more to him than a memory and a dream. When he was in England, though he had not been content until he had seen his children and his old home, he had never sought to get a glimpse of her, so far beyond him and above him. But now that she was indeed dead, those beloved eyes closed for evermore from the light of the sun, and the familiar earth never again to be trodden by her feet, the awful chasm set between them made him feel as if he was for the first time separated from her.

Only an hour ago and his voice could have reached her in words of entreaty, and of passionate repentance, and humble self-renunciation. He could have spoken with her face to face; and he might have had a brief interval for pouring out his heart to her. But there had been no word uttered between them. There had been only that one moment in which her soul looked back upon him with a glance of tenderness, before she was gone from him beyond recall.

He came to himself, out of the confused agony of his grief, as the sun was setting. He found himself in a wild and barren wilderness of savage rocks, with a small black tarn lying at his feet, which just caught the glimmer of the setting sun on its lurid surface. The silence about him was intense. Gray clouds stretched across the mountains, out of which a few sad peaks of rock rose against the gray sky. The snowy dome of the Titlis, towering above the rest, looked down on him out of the shadow of the clouded heavens with a ghostly paleness. All the world about him was cold, and wan, and solemn, as the face of the dead. There was death up here and in the valley yonder, but down in the valley it bore too dear and too sorrowful a form.

The recollection of Phebe's loneliness, and her distress at his absence, at last aroused him; and with slow and reluctant steps he retraced his path through the deep gloom of the forests to the village. There was much to be decided upon before he reached the hotel.

Two courses were open to him. There was no longer any reason to dread a public trial and conviction for the crime he had committed so many years ago. It was quite practicable to return to England, account plausibly for his disappearance, and the mistake as to identity which had caused a stranger to be buried in his name, and take up his life again as Roland Sefton.

It was improbable that any searching investigation should be made into his statements, but the old rumors and suspicions would be awakened and strengthened a hundredfold by the mystery surrounding his return. No man could compel him to reveal his secret; he had simply to keep his lips closed in impenetrable silence. True, he would be a suspected man, with a disgraceful secrecy hanging like a cloud about him; and he could not live so at Riversborough, among his old townspeople, of whom he had once been a leader. He must find some new sphere, and dwell in it, always dreading the tongue of rumor.

But his son and daughter? How would they regard him if he maintained an obstinate and ambiguous silence toward them? They were no longer little children, scarcely separate from their father, seeing through his eyes, and touching life only through him. They were individual, living souls, with a personality of their own, the more free from his because of his long absence and supposed death. It was a young man he must meet in Felix, a critic and a judge like other men; but with a keener interest in the criticism and the judgment he had to pass upon his father. His son would ponder deeply over any account he might give of himself. Hilda, too, was at a sensitive and delicate point of girlhood, when she would inevitably shrink from any contact with the suspicion and doubt that would surround this strange return after so many years of disappearance.

Yet how could he let them know the terrible fraud he had committed for their mother's sake, and with her connivance? If he returned to them with the truth in his lips, they would lose the happy memory of their mother, and their pride in her fame. He understood only too well how dominant must have been her influence over them, not merely by the tender, common ties of motherhood, but by the fascinating charm of her whole nature, reserved and stately as it had been. He must betray her and lessen her memory in their sorrowful esteem. To them, if not to the world, he must disclose all; or resolve to remain a stranger to them for ever.

that a humble path lay before him, following which he might again live a life of lowly discipleship. He had repented with a bitter repentance, and out of the depths into which he had fallen, he had cried unto God, and been delivered. He believed that he had received God's forgiveness, as he knew that he had received man's forgiveness. Out of the wreck of his past years he had constructed a little raft, and trusted to it bearing him safely through what remained of the storm of life. If Felicity had lived he would have continued in the service of his father's old friend, proving himself of use in numberless ways.

He had not been long enough in Riversborough to gain any influence in the town as a poor foreigner; but there had been a hope dawning within him, that he might again do some good in his native place, the dearer to him because of his long and dreary banishment. In time he might perform some work worthy of his forefathers, though under another name. If he could so live as to leave behind him the memory of a sincere and simple Christian, who had denied himself daily to live a righteous, sober, and godly life, and had cheerfully taken up his cross to follow Christ, he would in some measure atone for the disgrace Roland Sefton's defalcations had brought upon the name of Christ.

This humble, unambitious career was still before him, if he could forego the joy of making himself known to his children: a doubtful joy. For had he not cut himself off from them by his reckless and despairing abandonment of them in their childhood? He could bring them nothing now but sorrow and shame. The sacrifice would be on their side not his. It needs all the links of all the years to bind parents and children in an indestructible chain; and if he attempted to unite the broken links it could only be by a knowledge of their mother's error as well as his. Let him sacrifice himself for the last and final time to Felicity, and the fair name she had made for herself.

He was stumbling along in the dense darkness of the forest with no gleam of light to guide him on his way, and his feet were constantly snared in the knotted roots of the trees intersecting the path. So must he stumble along a dark and rugged track through the rest of his years. There was no cheering gleam beckoning him on to a happy future. But though it was thorny and obscure, it was not an ignoble path, and it might end at last, even for him, in the welcome words, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

His mind was made up before he reached the valley. He could not unravel the warp and woof of his life. The gossamer threads of the web he had begun to weave about himself so lightly in the hey-day of his youth, and prosperity, and happiness, had thickened into cables, and petrified; it was impossible to break through the coil of them, or find a way out of it. Roland Sefton had died many years ago. Let him remain dead.

Phebe was sitting by a table in the lonely salon, her head buried in her arms which rested upon it; a forlorn and despondent attitude. She lifted up her face as he entered, and gazed pitifully into his; but for a minute or two neither of them spoke. He stood just within the door, as he had done on the fateful night when Felicity had told him that she chose his death, rather than share the disgrace attaching to his crime. This day, just drawn to a close, had been the bitterest fruit of the seed then sown. Jean Merle's face, on which there was stamped an expression of intense but patient suffering, steadfastly met Phebe's aching eyes.

"She is dead!" she murmured.

"I knew it," he answered.

"I did not know what to do," she went on, after a slight pause, and speaking in a pitiful and deprecating tone.

"Poor Phebe!" he said; "but I am come to tell you what I have resolved to do. We must act now as if I was only what I seem to be; a stranger to you, and a passing guide, who has no more to do with these things than any other stranger. We will do what I believe she would have desired; her name shall be as dear to us as it was to her; no disgrace shall stain it now."

"But can you never throw off your disguise," she asked weeping; "must you always be what you seem to be now?"

"I must always be Jean Merle," he replied. "Roland Sefton cannot return to life; it is impossible. Let us leave her children at least the tender memory of their mother; I can bear being unknown to them for what remains to me of life. And we do no one any harm, you and I, by keeping this secret."

"No; we wrong no one," she answered. "I have been thinking of it ever since I was sure that she was dead, and I counted upon your doing this. It will save Felix and Hilda from bitter sorrow; and it would keep her memory fair and true for them. But you—there will be so much to give up. They will never know that you are their father; for if we do not tell them now we must never, never betray it. Can you do it?"

"I gave them up long ago," he said; "and if there be any sacrifice I can make for them, what should withhold me, Phebe? God only knows what an unutterable relief it would be to me if I could lay bare my whole life to the eyes of my fellow-men, and henceforth walk in their sight in simple honesty and truthfulness. But that is impossible. Not even you can see my whole life as it has been. I must go softly all my days, bearing my burden of secrecy."

"I, too, shall have to bear it," she murmured almost inaudibly.

"I start at once for Stans," he went on; "and go to Lucerne by the first boat in the morning. You shall give me a telegram to send from there to Canon Pascal; and Felix will be here in less than three days. I must return direct to Riversborough. I cannot perform the last duties to the dead; even that is denied to me."

"But Felicity must not be buried here," exclaimed Phebe, her voice faltering with an accent of horror at the thought of it. A shudder of repugnance ran through him also. Roland Sefton's grave was here; and what would be more natural than to bury Felicity in it?

"No, no!" he cried; "you must save me from that, Phebe. She must be brought home, and buried among her own people. Promise to save her and me from that."

"Oh! I promise it," she said; "it shall never be. You shall not have that grief."

"If I stayed here myself," he continued, "it would make it more difficult to take up my life in Riversborough, unquestioned and unsuspected. It can only be by a complete separation now that I can effect my purpose. But I can hardly bear to go away, Phebe."

The profound pitifulness of Phebe's heart was stirred to its inmost depths, by the sound of his voice, and the expression of his hopeless face. She left her seat, and drew near to him.

"Come and see her once more," she whispered.

Silently he made a gesture of assent, and she led the way to the adjoining room. He knew it better than she did; for it was here that he had watched all the night long the death-bed of the stranger, who was buried in Roland Sefton's grave. There was but little change in it to his eyes. The bare walls and the scanty, homely furniture were the same now as then. There was the glimmer of a little lamp falling on the tranquil figure on the bed. The occupant of the chamber only was different; but, oh! the difference to him!

"Do not leave me, Phebe!" he cried stretching out his hand toward her, as if blind, and groping to be led. They stepped noiselessly across the uncarpeted floor, and looked down on the face lying on the pillow. The smile, that had been upon it in the last moment, yet lingered about the mouth, and added an inexpressible gentleness and tenderness to its beauty. The long, dark eyelashes shadowed the cheeks, which were suffused with a faint flush. Felicity looked young again, with something of the sweet, shy grace of the girl, whom he had first seen in this foreign mountain village so many years ago.

He sank down on his knees, and shut out the sight of her from his despairing eyes. The silent minutes crept slowly away unheeded, he did not stir, or sob, or lift up his bowed face. This kneeling figure at her feet was as rigid and as death-like as the lifeless form lying on the bed; and Phebe grew frightened, yet dared not break in upon his grief. At last a footstep came somewhat noisily up the staircase, and she laid her hand softly on the gray head beneath her.

"Jean Merle," she said, "it is time for us to go."

The sound of this name in Phebe's familiar voice roused him. She had never called him by it before; and its utterance now marked as a thing irrevocably settled, that his life henceforth was to be altogether divorced from that of Roland Sefton. He had come to the last point which connected him with it. When he turned away from this rigid form, in all the awful loveliness of death, he would have cut himself off forever from the past. He laid his hand upon the chilly forehead; but he dared not stoop down to touch the sweet, sad face with his lips.

With no word of farewell to Phebe, he rushed out into the dense darkness of the night, and made his way down the valley, and through the steep forest-roads he had traversed only a few hours ago with something like hope dawning in his heart. For in the morning he had known that he should see Felicity again, and there was expectation and gleam of gladness in that; but to-night his eyes had looked upon her for the last time.

SUFFERING AND SERVICE.

S. S. Lesson for July 16, Mark 10 : 32-45. Golden Text, ver. 45. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Sacrifice Leading the Way to the Altar—The Perplexed Disciples—Their Fear that Opportunities were Missed—Our Own Blindness—As to Soul and Body—What the Disciples had not Surrendered—Prevalence of Overvaluation—Suffering to be Accepted not Sought—The Functions of Christ's Great Ones.

A FOURTH time our blessed Lord sought to teach His disciples the lesson of the cross. "They were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them." "When He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them" (John 10 : 4). He who was to be the Sacrifice led the way to the altar. Shall we not sing, "Where He leads I will follow, I will follow all the way?" The disciples "were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid." Things were so different from what they had anticipated: time went on, He whom they believed to be the Messiah was not publicly recognized; He Himself shunned anything like glory; He was despised, and they were despised with Him, and He had just called upon the young ruler to sell all that he had and give to the poor, and he should have treasure in heaven. Probably they thought it was LOSING A GRAND OPPORTUNITY, for the spread of Christ's kingdom. He might have had a young man of position, of family, and of fortune among His followers; and their Lord was counting all these advantages as nothing worth, and even when Peter spoke in self-conscious justification, "We have left all and followed Thee," He gave no hint of worldly prosperity, all which was renounced for Him should indeed be repaid, but "with persecutions." Then when should the glorious promises of a reigning Messiah be fulfilled? when should He restore the kingdom to Israel? (Acts 1 : 6).

The Lord Jesus saw their perplexity, and sought again in His own patient way to teach them the truth. We may wonder at their stupidity and dullness: but let us look back to trace the way by which the Lord has led us. Are there not truths which have remained long hidden from us, and a veil was upon our hearts? How long some of us sought to make ourselves right before God, and sought to do something to secure salvation; but when we turned away from our sins, our doings and strivings, and turned to the Lord, "the veil was taken away" (2 Cor. 3 : 15, 16), and we saw that Christ had done it all. Again, how long some of us went on sinning and repenting, up and down, hot and cold, and seemed to think there was no better life to live; the veil was upon our heart. But the time came when, looking away from our own experience and that of others, we turned to the Lord Himself, acknowledged that His holy standard of truth and practice was a true and right one, gave ourselves up completely to Him to do with us what He would. Then the veil was taken away, we became conscious of the precious cleansing power of the blood of Jesus to take out the stains of sin; not only in removing our condemnation, but in delivering our very thoughts, our recollections, and our whole being from its taint, and bringing us into a pure atmosphere of light, joy, liberty, with "a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man."

Some of us have gone over the same ground about bodily healing; we have believed God was able to heal us, but we were not sure of His will, and instead of coming immediately to Him in all simplicity, knowing that our Father would be sure to tell us if we were in the wrong, with the veil upon our hearts we have made the care of our bodies our own affair. But when we turned with our entire being to the Lord, spirit, soul, and body, and put all trustfully into His hands, then the veil was taken away, and we have known Him really and practically as the great Healer.

It was but a repetition of the same story which Jesus before had told to His disciples, "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of Man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn Him to death, and shall deliver Him to the Gentiles; and they shall mock Him, and shall scourge Him, and shall spit upon Him, and shall kill Him; and the third day, He shall rise again." How little they understood Him is manifest in the request made by James and John immediately afterward. The heart of these disciples was occupied, not with their Master, but with themselves, not with that which He should suffer, but that which they should gain; they had left all to follow him, and it was that self which took Jesus's place in them. "Master," they said, "we would that Thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire." Jesus "knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man" (John 2 : 24, 25). He was aware of their desiring self-glorification, and nevertheless He said, "What would ye that I should do for you?" "Grant unto us that we may sit the one on Thy right hand, and the other on Thy left hand, in Thy glory."

Perhaps, because they, with Peter, had been the chosen witnesses of the raising of Jairus' daughter, and of the transfiguration of their Lord, they thought of themselves as specially favored; and as Peter had been twice rebuked, they may have thought they were higher, and stood better in the Lord's eyes, than any other of the disciples. Oh this overvaluing of ourselves, how terribly prevalent is it among us! The Master answered, "Ye know not what ye ask; can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" Oh! how many there are who pray and long for great spiritual blessing and power, but when they see the price which must be paid, the cup of Christ, the baptism of Christ, they shrink back; the disciples had not counted upon this. Many rejoice in the thought of being "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ," but forget to add, "if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together" (Rom. 8 : 17).

Reader are you willing to go all lengths with Jesus and for Jesus? are you willing to be anything or nothing, to go anywhere, to spend any amount of time, or money, or strength for Jesus, to deny Him nothing, yourself everything? Jesus is worthy, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive" all this, and also "power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing" (Rev. 5 : 12). They answered Jesus, "We can." And He said, "Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of;" He promised them a real share in His sufferings. It is the privilege of each follower of Jesus to be as His Master, to take Him for better for worse. But the reward of a special place as reigning with Him upon the earth, or as reigning with Him hereafter, is not to be revealed now, but it is "for whom it is prepared."

It is our privilege as followers of Jesus to accept, not to seek, suffering. He did not invite the smiters, but when the Lord opened His ear He was "not rebellious, neither turned away back," "He gave His back to the smiters and His cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: He hid not His face from shame and spitting" (Isa. 50 : 5, 6). It is our privilege to suffer for Christ, and suffer we must if we are faithful; but for His sake. If we try to make an easier way, we have a condemning conscience, a constant uneasiness of spirit, a restless uncertainty about our words and actions; and we are strangers to the "peace which passeth all understanding" (Phil. 4 : 7).

When the ten heard the request of these two disciples "they began to be much displeased with James and John. But Jesus called them to Him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them." The world's great ones rule, Christ's great ones serve, it is greater to serve than to rule; it is kingly, it is divine, because it is like Jesus. O the dignity of lowliness! O the real greatness of being small! how every one feels its power, and is conscious of its superiority! Whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister; and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. "For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

these were the characteristics of the life of Jesus. "Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich" (2 Cor. 8 : 9). Shall we shrink from becoming poor if His cause demands it? He had not where to lay His head, shall we complain of inconvenience? Does it become us to seek for ourselves, and be vexed if we do not get, a better portion than our Lord?

Our Lord gave His life as capital which was sunk in the undertaking He had in hand—the salvation of men; and therefore His whole life, birth, growth, education, occupation, eating, drinking, walking, sleeping, were all part of His ministry; all were an offering, a whole burnt offering to God, on behalf of men. Now "let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2 : 6, 7). He would do nothing upon earth which He did not do for you; will you be found doing anything which you cannot do for Him? His life was all ministry, all service; is it becoming in us that ours should be anything else?

When once our vocation to minister and to give is understood and accepted, our whole life undergoes a change. Instead of being ever occupied with the maintaining of our rights, providing for our comfort, seeking our enjoyment or looking after our spiritual benefit, we shall set the Lord always before us, and letting Him care for us, our care will be to give Him His rights, seek His convenience, His honor, His benefit. And then He comes, lives His own life within us, and makes us what He would have us to be; explains to us His purposes, leads us to enter into His thoughts, makes us one with Him in a way which nothing but fellowship in His sufferings could make us, so that every affliction for His sake becomes intensely precious, dearer than life, or joy, or comfort.

This is the true preparation for eternal union with Jesus as His chosen bride. He maketh all things new in His presence; whatever the circumstances there is fulness of joy, and at His right hand pleasures for evermore. It is the fulfilment of the promise, "The Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones; and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Copy of the Memoranda Found on the dead body of Lieutenant De Long of the Jeannette has been sent to Washington by Engineer Melville. The story it tells of suffering, hardship, and Christian heroism, is a very terrible one. The first entry in the book was on October 1st, 1881, and when it reaches October 10th, the ominous entry is made: "Eat deer-skin scraps. Yesterday morning ate my deer-skin foot-tips. Very hard going. At three halted, used up. Crawled into a hole in the bank. Nothing for supper except a spoonful of glycerine. All hands weak and feeble, but cheerful. God help us." The next day we read, "Unable to move. No game. One spoonful of glycerine and hot water for food. No more wood in our vicinity. Everybody getting weaker and weaker. Hardly able to get fire wood." On October 13th, "No news from Nindermann. We are in the hands of God, and unless He relents we are lost. We cannot move against the wind, and staying here means starvation. Afternoon went ahead for a mile. After crossing another river, or a bend of the big river, missed Lee. Went down in a hole in the bank and camped. Sent back for Lee. He had laid down and was waiting to die. All united in saying Lord's Prayer and Creed." Afterward the entries are more brief, as De Long himself was breaking down. The following pitiful sentences are among the sad record: "Friday.—Kaack was found dead about midnight, between the Doctor and myself. Lee died about noon. Read prayers for sick when we found he was going. Too weak to carry the bodies of Lee and Kaack out on the ice. The Doctor, Collins, and myself carried them around the corner out of sight. Then my eyes closed up. Everybody pretty weak. Slept or rested to-day and then managed to get enough wood in before dark. Read part of divine service. Suffering in our feet. No foot gear." The last entry was on Sunday, October 30th: "One hundred and fortieth day—Boyd and Gartz died during the night. Mr. Collins dying." This is the end of Lieutenant De Long's diary. De Long, Surgeon Ambler, and Ah Sam, the cook, must have died soon after the last note was written. The narrative is very pathetic, but it is consolatory to learn that throughout their fearful sufferings their faith in God never broke down.

The Conference now in Session in Constantinople on the affairs of Egypt is reported as making little progress. Direct intelligence is not obtainable, but such reports as are received indirectly through the English and French capitals indicate that the attitude and policy of Turkey are distrusted. One report says: "If the Porte persists in its refusal to negotiate for the re-establishment of order in Egypt the ambassadors will be obliged to recommend their governments to come to an understanding between themselves in regard to the measures to be taken." The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times asserts that England is the only Power resolutely opposed to an arrangement with Arabi Pacha, and from an independent source information is received that England is isolated at the Conference, the Eastern Powers having decided to recognize Arabi and the national party as the rulers of Egypt.

Extensive Preparations for War are being made in England, and a report is current that the British Government have resolved to assume the responsibility of the protection of the Suez Canal, not only in the name of British interests but in the interests of all civilized commercial nations. It is stated that General Sir Evelyn Wood has been ordered to be ready to proceed to Egypt. The London Times, in an editorial, says: "In view of information we have received from various quarters we cannot doubt that preparations for the protection of the Suez Canal are maturing on a considerable scale. We have reason to believe that, should it be necessary to strike a sudden blow, there would be no difficulty in despatching 20,000 men to Egypt in a few days." A despatch from Simla confirms the report that the British Government is communicating with India in regard to the despatch of Indian troops to Egypt. The reserve siege train at Woolwich is being moved into position to be ready for service, and a siege train complete with stores and appliances is already at Malta. Arabi Pacha still persists in his determination to destroy the Suez Canal should the British or French troops attempt a landing, and it is stated that a large store of explosives is already collected in the vicinity ready for immediate use.

Another Terrible Double Murder has Taken place in Ireland. John H. Blake, agent to the Marquis of Clanricarde, and his servant, named Teddy Keane, were shot dead near Loughrea on June 29th. Mr. Blake was a justice of the peace. He was driving with his servant from his residence at Rathville, Kiltulla, to Loughrea. They were fired at by a party of men concealed inside a hedge, and riddled with bullets. Both were instantly killed. On the same day at Ballyclare, county Antrim, a railway station near Belfast, a merchant named McCausland and his servant were attacked by a man named McCullagh with a reaping-hook. This was done in the presence of several persons. McCausland, who is seventy years old, has died from his wounds, and his servant's life is despaired of.

Renewed Activity Among the Russian Nihilists is reported. A plot to seize a line of sleeping torpedoes belonging to the government has been discovered on the eve of execution. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the New York Herald says, "The St. Petersburg side of the Neva, like many points in the environs of Kronstadt, is defended by lines of sleeping torpedoes which, by a simple electric current, can be instantly rendered murderous. The nihilists desired to get possession of these torpedoes, which would enable them to arrange submarine mines in places of their choice as they have already done in the streets or on railways. The point of Lissinos was chosen, being close to the land, at a place where ships cannot pass on account of the shallowness of the water. These designs were discovered from papers found in the house of a nihilist, where the police arrested a young man about twenty-six years of age. In view of the probable trips of the court by sea or river the police had received orders to survey the neighborhood of the coast. They learned that a man had hired a country house and was living there alone. The commissary of police determined to examine him, but on presenting himself at the house the man escaped into the wood, which was immediately surrounded by the police. A search was organized, and the fugitive was observed in a tree, from the top of which he fired several shots from his revolver at those approaching him. Several of the boldest of the police got to the foot of the tree and began to saw it, defended against the balls by the branches. The tree at last fell and the man surrendered. Among the bombs found in his possession were several of a new form, quite flat, with loops attached, permitting them to be concealed under the clothing or in the hat."

At a Meeting of Two Thousand Railroad men in London on June 7th Mr. Samuel Morley, who presided, delivered an address in which he said one reason why religion seemed to be making so little way in the world, is owing to the fact that those who profess Christ are wanting in vitality and earnestness; drinking habits also standing in the way of the people, socially, politically, and above all religiously.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the Singing Pilgrim, and his son, are now making an evangelistic tour in Europe. The English papers report them at Exeter Hall and other places in London. They gave a song service on behalf of the building fund of a mission chapel, on Friday, June 2d. Dr. R. Paramore introduced the singers and spoke some very encouraging words to all. The service proved all that could be desired; the singing was very impressive and thrilling.

An Opium Smoker's Conversion is thus Described by the Rev. L. Lloyd, of Fuh-chow, China: "Toward the end of 1880, a man in a deplorable state of poverty, and clothed in a filthy sackcloth garment, came into our chapel and was remonstrated with by the catechist, to whom he was known as an opium-smoker and an idle, dissolute fellow, who had been cast out of his father's house in consequence of his evil doings. Much to the catechist's surprise, instead of speaking rude on being reproved, he exclaimed, 'I really do want to live a better life; will you teach me your doctrine, that I may be enabled to do so?' The catechist promised to let him have a room in the house he occupied if his father was willing to support him; pointing out to him that God alone could give him strength to overcome his habit, and that I must pray to Him for help. The catechist, with one or two of the leading Christians, went to the young man's father, who is a respectable, well-to-do farmer, and made themselves answerable for his son's good behavior. On these conditions the father advanced money and provided clothing for his son, and from that time to the present he has abandoned opium, and, best of all, he has been converted to Christ."

A Pharisee has been Converted in Germany. The Rev. P. E. Gotthel, of Stuttgart, lately narrated the following incident: "A Jewish brother had been anxiously laboring to establish a righteousness of his own, toiling and toiling to conquer step by step a right to the inheritance of heaven. For above four years we had almost daily intercourse, and I watched with deep and anxious interest the issue of the struggle; for he had at the same time set before him Jesus as the Lord of Righteousness. Unhappily, on seeing a great many faithless and sin-indulging Christians around him, he was much strengthened in his own good opinions of himself, consoling himself with the poor comfort: 'Oh, we Jews are better than them and surely God must be more pleased with us than with them.' Yet there was no peace in his soul. One morning he came to me and said: 'Jesus has proved Himself too strong for me; I must throw away everything, and trace my way to Calvary and cast myself down at the feet of Jesus, taking from Him, by grace alone, pardon and peace.' He had done so to his soul's peace, and has had the further blessing that his wife and children have joined him now and are learning the way of Christ from him. He is engaged in the work of colportage among his kindred, and is cheered by signs of the divine approval."

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has been Analyzing Mrs. Partington's observations. He says the author who invented Mrs. Partington made her utter more of the truth than she thought when she said "Dear me! nothing don't do me so much good as to go to church Sunday morning, and hear precious minister dispense with the Gospel! Yes, dear soul, that is exactly what some of them do; they give us anything and everything but the glad tidings of salvation, and then they wonder that their chapels become empty. Yet it does no good to say as much, or you will have a hornet's nest about your ears. Of course, they preach gospel—that is to say, a gospel, if not the Gospel. What is the difference? Only the indefinite for the definite article, only sand instead of rock, only opinion in the place of truth! Blessed is he who dispenses the Gospel, but cursed is he that dispenses with it!"

THE three portraits which adorn the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week need little introduction to the readers of this journal. Mr. and Mrs. Willson were, at their first appearance on the Christian platform, cordially welcomed by the great army of Christ's workers, as the near relatives of one whose valued services had recently come to a tragic close. It was not long, however, before they established a claim to popular regard on their own account. The sweetness of their songs, their depth of feeling, and their evident earnestness left a deep impression wherever they were heard. Especially in New York, when only a few months ago the Cooper Union services were enlivened and impressed by these wondrous songs, was it felt that a new power for good had been called forth.

Mr. Clark Willson was one of those whom the Lord calls to bear the yoke in his youth. He was left fatherless when an infant. His father died in February, 1836, when the future evangelist was only six weeks old. His mother, left a widow at the age of thirty, was called upon to undertake the management of her family of six children—three sons and three daughters—and to direct the realization of a large estate, which was so encumbered and in so unsettled a condition, that its settlement involved loss as well as serious trouble. It finally left a balance so trifling that the widow saw with surprise and dismay that her children's bread must be won by hard work, and that she had no means even to educate them.

At the early age of twelve the subject of our sketch went from his mother's immediate guardianship to fight life's battles alone. At this time he could not even write, and could read only with difficulty, and he has a most vivid recollection of the fact that his first letters to his mother were dictated to a friend, by whose hand they were written. But the lad was determined to secure at least the elements of education, and therefore, with a heroism unusual in one so young, the first money he earned was expended in the purchase of a few books, which he assiduously studied after the day's work was done. In this manner, subduing one difficulty after another, he laid the foundations of his present mental and intellectual acquisitions.

HIS CONVERSION TO CHRIST.

For some years he led a prayerless, irreligious life, and as his earnings increased and he had money and time at command, he sought gratification in sinful pleasures, and found delight in the companionship of youths as wild and reckless as himself. But when he was about twenty years of age, he was convinced of sin by the Holy Spirit, and made to feel his lost position, as a sinner, before God. A brief period of deep distress of soul followed, and then he was led to accept Christ as his Saviour. The change was most marked. New motives were brought into operation, and the servitude of Satan was exchanged for the service of Christ.

Though characterized by much natural timidity and nervousness, he was gradually led to take a part in the social and religious meetings of the Church, and his natural love of music and the possession of a melodious and powerful voice led him especially to the Song Services, which were led by the late Mr. P. P. Bliss, so well known to the whole Christian world by the rich legacy of sacred song which he has left, and which finds a responsive chord in the hearts of all who are privileged to listen to it.

LESSONS FROM MR. BLISS.

About this time, 1857, Mr. Bliss, a tall, honest-hearted country boy, with large expressive eyes, handsome face, and sunny demeanor, with a kindly word for everybody, began giving instruction in singing, and under his tuition, Mr. Willson learned the rudiments of music. In the class, he formed the acquaintance of the teacher's amiable sister Mary Elizabeth, whom three years afterward, in 1864, he married. Attracted toward each other, as they were, by the sweet charm of music, they had one unflinching source of pleasure, and their first week of union was rendered memorable to them by attending a great Singing Convention in Pennsylvania.

SERVICES OF SACRED SONG.

It was not long before the qualifications of Mr. Willson to take a prominent part in leading the public praises of God were recognized and highly appreciated. He was appointed choir-master in the church with which he was identified, and his wife sustained the position of chief soprano, and also presided at the organ. But they did not confine their services to the congregation to which they formally belonged. They realized that they were stewards of the gifts with which they were intrusted, and were ever ready to assist neighboring churches as opportunity offered.

HIS SUCCESS AS A MUSIC TEACHER.

In 1869 Mr. and Mrs. Willson began teaching vocal music, and their success was remarkable. Inspiring their pupils with an enthusiasm kindred to their own, their fame travelled far and wide, and unceasing requisitions were made upon them to sing in different parts of the land. At length, in 1874, it was deemed advisable by them to devote the whole of their time to the organizing and conducting of musical conventions, Mrs. Willson invariably, and with rare skill, presiding at the organ, and Mr. Willson acting as conductor. It is worthy of notice that at the very hour when Mr. P. P. Bliss and his wife were killed in the Ashtabula Railway bridge disaster, in December, 1876, his sister and her husband were closing, amid applause, a two weeks' Convention in Central Pennsylvania, with a concert. This was the last secular concert they ever gave.

Referring to the event which we have just described, Mr. Willson himself thus pathetically writes: "The sudden and awful death of our dear brother and sister was to myself and to my wife also, at once the greatest sorrow and the greatest blessing of our lives. In the depth of our bitter sorrow we were led to give ourselves more fully to the Saviour, and our talents and time exclusively and evermore to His service."

CALLED TO A NOBLER SERVICE.

Two months after this resolution was made, Major D. W. Whittle, of Chicago, whose richly-blessed evangelistic labors in this country and in Europe have made his reputation world-wide, asked Mr. and Mrs. Willson to assist him in his efforts to reach and win the masses of the perishing for Christ. For a considerable time Mr. Bliss and Major Whittle had worked happily and successfully together, and they had continued in this blessed connection of Gospel ministration till that disaster dissolved the union, and ushered one of the beloved laborers into the presence of his Lord. There was a propriety therefore in Major Whittle asking Mr. and Mrs. Willson to continue their brother's work. Happily, they recognized it as such, and with a sense of the divine nearness and sufficiency which they had never before experienced, they at once solemnly and without reserve, laid themselves upon the altar of Christ's service, and devoted themselves to the holy enterprise of publishing the glad tidings of salvation in sweet accents of sacred song.

A CHEERFUL RETROSPECT.

In looking back upon more than five years of continuous work in the principal cities and towns of the Union, Mr. Willson says, "I can say thankfully that we have never received an unkind notice in a newspaper, and everywhere, both in our own loved land and in Great Britain, the people and the press have helped us greatly by generous reports of our work and expressions of good will."

But the goal of yesterday becomes the starting-point of to-morrow, and having experienced so much of the guidance of God, and enjoyed so rich a revenue of blessing in serving Him, in 1880 Mr. Willson began to be impressed with the conviction that he must not only sing the Gospel but speak it also. As opportunity offered therefore in connection with the Song Services, he commenced to give public Bible-readings, which were most highly appreciated, and resulted in great blessing to many souls. Calls to conduct evangelistic service now poured in with a frequency and earnestness which proved embarrassing, but, as health permitted, Mr. Willson, with his devoted wife, have spent the past two years especially in seeking to win sinners to Christ, and the divine benediction has rested richly upon them.

WORK IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. and Mrs. Willson have been in Great Britain for about three months, during which time they have been present at some of the large and successful meetings conducted by Mr. Francis Murphy in Scotland, Ireland, and elsewhere on behalf of Gospel Temperance; and during the stay across the Atlantic their ambition has been to win souls to Christ, and help His people to closer walk with Him, and they are still glad accepting invitations to labor in the towns and cities of Great Britain.

MRS. CLARK WILLSON.

Birth in 1842—Memories of Childhood—Portrait of Her Father and Mother—A Humble but Happy Home—The Public Worship of God—Lessons in Music and School Work—Marriage in 1860—Her Brother's Death—First Meeting with Mr. Murphy—A "Wandering Boy" Led to Christ.

MARY ELIZABETH, the accomplished wife of Mr. Clark Willson, whose portrait accompanies that of her husband on our front page, was born at Clearfield, Penn., on May 1st, 1842. Her parents were in humble circumstances but pre-eminently pious, and their highest earthly hope was to see their children called early by divine grace, and become earnest and devoted servants of Christ.

Mrs. Willson's memories of her parents and of the home of her childhood are of the most pleasant character. Of her father she says, "He was a poor but honest farmer, a man of godly principle and of simple and childlike faith. His aim was to live honestly and uprightly, so that he could look both God and man in the face, and keep a clear heart and a clear conscience." Speaking of her mother she writes: "She was a noble-hearted Christian woman, whose desires to serve others far transcended her ability, and her life was rendered beautiful through perpetual communion with God, whose glory she sought in everything she did." There were five children, two of whom died in early life, leaving two daughters and one son. One of the daughters is the subject of the present sketch, and the son was the late beloved P. P. Bliss, author of "Hold the Fort," and many other hymns in Mr. Sankey's hymn book.

While the family were still very young, they removed to Vernon, Trumbull County, where Mrs. Willson remembers spending some of her happiest girlhood days. They lived in a little cottage by the road side—

A HUMBLE BUT HAPPY HOME.

The next removal of the family was into the very heart of the untutored wilds of Pennsylvania, and here in the northern county of Tioga, Mrs. Willson's father bought a tract of wild land, and built a modest home in the midst of the great maple and hemlock forest, where but seldom the axe of the woodman had been heard to ring.

"So very humble indeed was the house," says Mrs. Willson, "that there were only two rooms, but sweet are the reminiscences which even to this day gather around it." And no wonder. For there the honest, clear-browed, loving-hearted Christian father was accustomed as the evening shadows closed in on the day's work to gather his children with their mother around the great open fireplace, and reverently read and expound to them the Word of God. Then kneeling down he would ask the blessing of God to rest abundantly upon them, making his son and daughters true disciples of Christ and useful in His blessed service. His prayers have been answered even beyond his expectations.

Here, amid these primeval forest solitudes, the family resided for several years, in circumstances sometimes bordering upon need of the very necessities of life, but happy in each other's society, and rich in an abiding sense of the presence and protection of God. "My dear father toiled long and ently, frequently sitting up all night through to the sap of the maple-trees that he might provide his little household with sugar." But the respect is associated with nothing but joy in the life of Mrs. Willson. "Here," she says, "many of us have I roamed through those dear old woods, singing and shouting with my beloved brother," "it is to this woodland life that she attributes the clearness of voice, naturalness of tone, and strength of lungs which have characterized both brother and herself in the rendering of Zion's songs.

LESSONS IN MUSIC AND SCHOOL-WORK.

When Mrs. Willson was fifteen years old her father Philip crossed over into the adjoining country of Bradford, and took her with him. For a time the young man taught a select element-school, and brother and sister made their home with a most excellent Christian family named Jennings, who were also very musical. Miss Young, the sister of Mr. P. P. Bliss, his first lessons in singing and music, and she eventually became his wife, and for a brief life of usefulness in Christ's earthly service, they entered heaven together. There was a singing school in the village, and Miss Young, and the two Blisses, regularly attended its classes, though Mrs. Willson herself admits "I cannot remember ever learning to read notes at sight; it seems to me that I always knew how."

During the two following years (1858-59) we were engaged in teaching her first school, and the following year she went on a visit to her sister, who had married a Mr. Jennings, and resided at Addison, N. Y., by whom she was eventually solicited to accept the charge of the day-school in that place. She did so, and continued to teach there until her marriage with Mr. Willson on March 4th, 1860, when she accompanied him to their present home at Towanda. From this time onward the life of the youthful couple has been lived in the same channel, experiencing the same vicissitudes, carrying the same burdens, sharing the same sorrows, and rejoicing in the unfailing presence of the same divine consolations.

HOW SHE HEARD OF P. P. BLISS'S DEATH.

The reference which Mrs. Willson makes to the death of her brother is so remarkable in its gracefulness that we are constrained to quote it here. She says: "No such trouble had entered our home before, and our hearts were crushed and bleeding. It was then that I said, 'I can never sing again, but I will go on singing.' Very shortly afterward a call came to us from Chicago, where for Mr. Whittle was engaged in evangelistic effort, requiring our immediate aid. We at once responded, and most cordially worked with him and Mr. M. Morton, State Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. of Chicago, for three months, and God greatly blessed us during that time."

THE FIRST MEETING WITH MR. F. MURPHY.

Concerning the association of Mr. Willson and herself with Mr. Francis Murphy in his great temperance work, she says: "It was while in Lowell Hall, Chicago, one day, at the noon prayer-meeting, that I first met Francis Murphy. He did I imagine then that there was such a work before us as has since been done by this vigorous worker and ourselves by God's help. The following summer we were engaged to conduct the musical part of a Gospel Temperance Camp Meeting, presided over by Mr. Murphy. It was a glorious meeting, and its magnificent results eternally alone is able to reveal."

Mr. Murphy then asked Mr. and Mrs. Willson if they would join him in his work, and "Sing the Gospel for him." After much consideration and prayer they decided to accede to his request, and a few weeks afterward united with him in the conduct of a great convention held at Cleveland, Ohio, and for nearly three years co-operated with him, and thousands have been won from sin and brought to Christ through their associated efforts. It was marked by the success of this campaign, that Mrs. Willson was led to believe that God would have her entirely consecrate her voice and self to His service. She therefore gave up home and family, and all her personal interests, and stepping forth into the world as an evangelist, the Lord gave her grace to do His work, and astounding and gratifying have been the results. Visiting many of the principal towns and cities in the Union, divine attestation was given to the ministry of herself and husband, and "the effects are plainly visible still in the happy homes and hearts, and by numerous additions to the churches."

Having received an invitation from Mr. Murphy to visit Great Britain and assist him in his work there, she and her husband yielded to his request, and on February 13th, 1882, they set sail for Liverpool. Already her sweet voice has charmed large numbers of people in Ireland, Scotland, and England, and we hope that God will continue to use the gift with which He has so richly endowed her for the winning of sinners to Christ, and the furtherance of His kingdom.

A "WANDERING BOY" LED TO CHRIST.

As an evidence of her power of sacred song, we may quote the following incident. After singing, "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" one evening in Bristol, a young man went to Mr. Willson, and begged the privilege of shaking hands with his wife. As she took his hand, she saw the effects of strong drink upon him, and he said, "Mrs. Willson, I couldn't stand that song; I want to sign the pledge. Oh, my wife, and poor old mother will be so glad." She responded, "I want you to give your heart to the Lord, and trust Him to keep you." Mrs. Willson also kindly asked him to write to her, as she was about leaving that place, and shortly afterward she received a letter from him, saying that he had been attending Messrs. Moody and Sankey's meetings, and had given his heart to Christ.

MR. P. P. BLISS.

Birth in 1838—His Early Proficiency in Music—His Conversion to Christ and Union with the Church—Joins Major Whittle in Evangelistic Work—His Last Journey and Death at Ashtabula in 1876—Reception of the News at Mr. Moody's Tabernacle.

MR. P. P. BLISS, whose portrait accompanies that of his sister, Mrs. Clark Willson, in our frontispiece, was born in Clearfield County, Penn., on July 9th, 1838, and at the time of his decease in December, 1876, had entered the thirty-eighth year of his age. He has been described as a noble specimen of physical manhood, of commanding presence, naturally dignified in movement, and of easy address, possessing in a rare degree the elements of personal popularity, which always attracted the attention of the multitude whenever he appeared in public, and won hosts of friends, who without intermission held a warm place in his great affectionate heart.

His love of music was intense, and his proficiency was remarkable. At an early age he became a popular teacher of singing, and subsequently was called to occupy a prominent position in the musical conventions conducted by Bradbury, Root, and others. He himself afterward became a successful conductor of such gatherings, and devoted much of his time to that branch of labor, until, as the intimate friend of Mr. Moody, the way opened for engaging in evangelistic work. Meanwhile, he had become widely known as a writer of pleasant Sunday-school and prayer-meeting hymns, sometimes both words and music, some of which attained remarkable popularity, as for instance, "I am so glad that Jesus loves me," which went like a sunbeam round the world.

HIS EARLIEST EFFORTS FOR CHRIST.

Mr. Bliss was for a time in the employment of the publishing firm of Root & Cady of Chicago, and held musical conventions at leading points throughout the Northwest. His early religious connections were with the Methodists, but on going to Chicago he united with the First Congregational Church, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Goodwin, and became the leader of the choir and the superintendent of the Sunday-school.

When Major Whittle, induced by the example and urgent entreaty of Mr. Moody and other Christian friends, surrendered a lucrative commercial position, and gave himself to the work of a lay evangelist, Mr. Bliss decided to become his fellow-laborer, and to "sing the Gospel" while Mr. Whittle preached it. And in this congenial work he continued for the three years prior to his death, visiting numerous places in the Western States and elsewhere with much success.

Being tall and finely-developed, with clustering black hair, and a handsome face, with easy and polished manners, combined with a joyous temperament and a wealth of sympathy, he impressed most favorably those who saw and heard him, whether in public or in private. His singing, like that of Mr. I. D. Sankey, often led sinners to Christ by its pathetic presentations of Gospel truth.

HIS LAST JOURNEY AND DEATH.

Mr. Bliss was on his way to Chicago to engage in special evangelistic labor when the accident occurred which terminated his beneficent career. An extension of the New York Central, which runs from Buffalo to Chicago, is called the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. About sixty-five miles east of Cleveland, Ohio, this railway crosses a deep ravine, through which flows Ashtabula Creek. It is a narrow shallow stream flowing between high banks, and the single span iron Howe truss railway bridge (as shown in our picture) crosses at an elevation of seventy-feet above the water, and is one hundred and fifty feet long.

During December 28th and 29th, 1876, snow fell almost incessantly in that region, a high wind drifting it, so that it was everywhere at least two feet deep, and in some places much more. Railway trains were run with much difficulty, and the "Pacific Express" which left Buffalo for the West, about noon on the 29th, was three hours behind time when it approached the creek at eight P.M. As it neared the bridge it slowed up, preparatory to stopping at the station just beyond. The train had stretched itself across the bridge, the engines being almost over, when suddenly the structure fell into the chasm beneath, carrying with it the train and its precious living freight.

THE DISASTER AT ASHTABULA.

The fall of seventy feet shattered nearly all the carriages, and the broken lamps and stoves, together with the hot coals from the overturned locomotives, quickly set the wreck on fire, so that in five minutes the portion that had not sunk beneath the water was a mass of flames. There were about 180 persons in the train, about 120 of whom were killed. The survivors said that the greater part would have been saved had it not been for the fire, but many of those who escaped destruction by the fall, were burned or drowned, while many others were frozen to death. Every horror that could enter into a disaster of the kind made havoc here, and so general was the destruction that only seven persons escaped unhurt, while not more than sixty escaped alive, and of these several were so seriously injured that they afterward died.

Mr. Bliss, after the accident, escaped from the wrecked carriage in which he had been travelling, but immediately returned to save his wife. Finding that she could not be extricated from the debris, he remained with her, and together they were caught up as by a "chariot of fire" into the kingdom of the Eternal.

When the news of the death of Mr. and Mrs. Bliss reached Chicago Tabernacle, it was at once draped in deepest mourning. Mr. Moody could scarcely give utterance to his feelings, and Mr. Sankey at times begged to be excused from singing alone; at other times he sang some of Mr. Bliss's songs literally through his tears. Of his friend, Mr. Moody said: "He was a noble man, a prince among men. Chicago never had a truer man. He will be preaching years hence, and so long as Christians shall sing his beautiful, cheerful hymns. It seems as though God raised him up to write these hymns. God be praised for such a man; God be praised for such a woman."

Among the popular hymns from Mr. Bliss's facile and consecrated pen are the following universal favorites: "Almost Persuaded," "Hold the Fort," "When Jesus Comes," "I am so Glad that Jesus Loves Me," "Dare to be a Daniel," "Only an Arnorbearer," "What shall the Harvest be?" and "The Light of the World is Jesus."

THE VANITIES.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

WHEN a book is placed in your hands the first question you ask is, "Who wrote it?" Not all the political astuteness and classic grace and unparalleled satire of Junius' letters can satisfy you because you do not know who Junius was—whether John Horne Tooke or Bishop Butler, or Philip Francis, or Edmund Burke. Mightier than a book always is the man who wrote the book. Now of this text? King Solomon. It seemed as if the world exhausted itself on that man. It wove its brightest flowers into his garland. It set its richest gems in his coronet. It pressed the rarest wine to his lip. It robbed him in the purest purple and embroidery. It cheered him with the sweetest music in that land of harps. It greeted him with the gladdest laughter that ever leaped from mirth's lip. It sprinkled his cheek with spray from the brightest fountains. Royalty had no dominion, wealth no luxury, gold no glitter, flowers no sweetness, sound no melody, light no radiance, upholstery no gorgeousness, waters no gleam, birds no plumage, prancing coursers no mettle, architecture no grandeur, but it was all his.

Across the thick grass of the lawn, fragrant with tufts of camphire from En-gedi, fell the long shadows of trees brought from eastern forests. Fish-pools fed by artificial channels that brought the stream from hills far away were perpetually ruffled with fins, and golden scales shot from water cave to water cave with endless dive and swirl, attracting the gaze of foreign potentates. Birds that had been brought from foreign aviary glanced and fluttered among the foliage, and called to their mates far beyond the sea. From the royal stables there came up the neighing of twelve thousand horses standing in blankets of Tyrian purple, chewing their bits over troughs of gold waiting for the king's order to be brought out in front of the palace, when the official dignitaries would leap into the saddle for some grand parade, or harnessed to some of the fourteen hundred chariots of the king, the fiery chargers, with flaunting mane and throbbing nostril, would make the earth jar with the tramp of hoofs and the thunder of wheels, while within and without the palace you could not think of a single luxury that could be added or of a single splendor that could be kindled.

Down on the banks of the sea the dry-docks of Ezion-geber rang with the hammers of the shipwrights, who were constructing larger vessels for a still wider commerce, for all lands and climes were to be robbed to make up

SOLOMON'S GLORY.

No rest till his keels shall cut every sea, his axes hew every forest, his archers strike every rare wing, his fishermen whip every stream, his merchants trade in every bazaar, his name be honored by every tribe; and royalty shall have no dominion, wealth no luxury, gold no glitter, song no melody, light no radiance, waters no gleam, birds no plumage, prancing coursers no mettle, upholstery no gorgeousness, architecture no grandeur, but it was all his.

"Well," you say, "if there is any man happy he ought to be." But I hear him coming out through the palace and see his robes actually encrusted with jewels as he stands in the front and looks out upon the vast domain. What does he say? King Solomon, great is your dominion, great is your honor, great is your joy? No. While standing there amid all that splendor the tears start and his heart breaks, and he exclaims: "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." What! Solomon not happy yet? No,

NOT HAPPY.

I. I learn from this subject in the first place that will never give solace to a man's soul. I know there have been very happy men in high positions, such as Wilberforce, as Theodore Freylinghuysen, as Governor Briggs, as Prince Albert. But the joy came not from their elevated position; it came from the Lord God whom they tried to serve. This man Solomon was king thirty-five years; all the pleasure that comes from palatial residence, from the flattery of foreign diplomatists, from universal sycophancy gathered around him. For a long while his throne stood firm and the people were loyal, and yet hear his awful sigh of disheartenment in the words of my text. How many people in all ages have made the same experiment with the same failure!

How often you see people who think: "If I could only get into this or that position—if I could be a Mayor or a Governor, or a Senator, or a President I should be perfectly happy!" And they have gone on climbing from one position to another never finding the solace they anticipated. Ask the men who have gone through the political life of the last forty years, in their old days what they think of the honors of this world, and they will tell you, "Ashes! Ashes!" An old man told me some time ago that he called at the White House just before the expiration of the second term of President Jackson. He sent a message in; the President came not. He sent a second time and a third time. After a while the President came out in great indignation and said: "Gentlemen, people envy me in this White House and they long to get here, but I tell you at the end of the second term I am glad to get out of it, for it is

A PERFECT HELL."

The honors and emoluments of this world bring so many cares with them that they bring also torture and disquietude. Pharaoh sat on one of the highest earthly eminences, yet he is miserable because there are some people in his realm that do not want any longer to make bricks. The head of Edward I. aches under his crown because the people will not pay the taxes, and Llewellyn, Prince of Wales, will not do him homage, and Wallace will be a hero. Frederick William III. of Prussia is miserable because France wants to take the Prussian provinces. The world is not large enough for Louis XIV. and William III.

The ghastliest suffering, the most shrivelling fear, the most rending jealousies, the most gigantic disquietude, has walked amid obsequious courtiers, and been clothed in royal apparel, and sat on judgment seats of power. Honor and truth and justice cannot go so high up in authority as to be beyond the range of human assault. The pure and the good in all ages have been execrated by the mob, who cry out: "Not this man but Barabbas. Now, Barabbas was a robber." By patriotic devotion, by honesty, by Christian principle, I would have you, my hearers, seek for the favor and the confidence of your fellow-men, but do not look upon some high position in society as though that were always sunshine. The mountains of earthly honor are like the mountains of Switzerland, covered with perpetual ice and snow. Having obtained the confidence and the love of your associates be content with such things as you have. You brought nothing into this world and it is very certain you can carry nothing out. Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils. There is an honor that is worth possessing, but it is an honor that comes from God. This day rise up and take it. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God. Who aspires not for that royalty? Come now and be kings and priests unto God and the Lamb forever.

II. Still further I learn from my subject that the soul's longing. The more money a man has the better, if he gets it honestly and uses it lawfully. The whole teaching of the Word of God has a tendency to create those kinds of habits, and that kind of mental acumen which lead on to riches. A man who talks against wealth as though it were a bad thing, is either a knave or a fool, not mean what he says, or ignorant of the glorious uses which money can be put. But the man who buys his soul's happiness on earthly accumulation is at all wise, to put it in the faintest shape.

To say that Solomon was a millionaire gives a very imperfect idea of the property he inherited from David, his father. He had at his command gold to the value of $3,400,000,000, and he had silver to the value of $5,146,885,000. The Queen Sheba made him a nice little present of $3,600,000, and Hiram made him a present of the same amount. If he had lost the value of a whole realm out of pocket it would have hardly been worth his while to stoop down to pick it up; and yet with all that affluence he writes the words of my text: "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." Alas! if that man could not find in all his worldly possessions enough to satisfy his immortal soul, no amount that he could ever gather by the sweat of our brow or by the strength of our arm, will make us happy.

I have been amused to hear people when they start in life say at what point in life they will be contented with worldly possessions. One man says: "I want to get $20,000 and I will be satisfied." Another, "I want to get fifty or a hundred thousand or a million, and then I will be satisfied." Then I will say to my soul: "Now, just look at that block of storehouses. Just look at those government securities. Just look at those bonds and mortgages. Just look what you have. Now, my soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry!" Thou fool! If you are not happy now with the smaller possessions, you will never be with the larger possessions. If you have decent and comely apparel you are not grateful to God, you would be ungrateful if you had a princely wardrobe crowded till the hinges burst. If you are this morning at your table and the fare was poor you complained, you would not be satisfied though you sat down to partridge and pineapples.

If you are not content with an income to support comfortably your household, you would not be contented though your income rolled in on you for a hundred thousand dollars a year. It is not what we get, it is what we are that makes us happy or miserable. If that is not so how do you account for the fact that many of those who fare sumptuously every day are waspish and dissatisfied, and overbearing, and foreboding, and cranky and uncomplaisant; with a countenance on which wrinkles always lowers and a lip which scorn curls; while many a time in the summer evening you see a boring man going home in his shirt-sleeves, with a pickaxe on his arm and a pickaxe over his shoulder, his face bright with smiles and his heart with hope, and the night of his toil bright with flaming auroras? It is an illustration of the fact that it is the outward condition that makes a man happy.

A man came to Rothschild, the great banker, and said: "You must be a thoroughly happy man." He said: "Happy? Me happy? Happy, what just as I am going to dine a man sends me a note saying, 'If you don't send me £500 before tomorrow night, I will blow your brains out.' Is that happy?" Oh, I wish I could by the power of the Lord Almighty, break the infatuation of those men who are neglecting the present sources of satisfaction, hoping that there is to be something in the future for them of a worldly nature that will satisfy their souls. The heart right, all is right. The heart wrong, all is wrong. But I ask you to high riches, to crowns that never fade, to investments that always declare dividends.

III. I go still further and learn from this subject that the soul. You know that Solomon was one of the largest contributors to the literature of his day. He wrote a thousand and five songs, he wrote three thousand proverbs. He wrote about almost everything. The Bible says distinctly he wrote about plants, from the cedar of Lebanon to the asop that groweth out of the walls; and about ds and beasts and fishes. No doubt he put his royal robes and put on hunter's trappings

I went out with his arrows to bring down the est specimens of birds, and then with his fishing paratus he went down to the stream to bring up denizens of the deep, and plunged into the est and found the rarest specimens of flowers;
I then he came back to his study and wrote oks about zoology, the science of animals; about thyology, the science of fishes; about ornithol-y, the science of birds; about botany, the science of plants. Yet, notwithstanding all his nievements he cries out in my text, "Vanity of ities; all is vanity."

Have you ever seen a man trying to make learning science his God? Did you ever know such a ful autobiography as that of John Stuart
//, a man who prided himself on his philosophy
I had wonderful strength of intellect; yet er his death his autobiography went forth to the rld showing that his whole life was a gigantic etchedness. We have seen men go out with neralogist's hammer, and geologist's pry, and anist's knife, and ornithologist's gun, and rm the kingdom of nature in her barred castles cave and grove and forest; and if there is any iven on earth it is that. With your eyes pre-red for all beautiful sights and your ears for all et sounds, and your soul for all great thoughts, ou go forth in the place where God breathes in aroma of flowers and talks in the wind's rus-ing, and sings in the roar of the forest and mountain cataract, then you know why Linnaeus spent life among plants and Cuvier found intelligent verse among beasts and Werner grew exhilarant ong minerals, and Audubon revelled among ds, and Agassiz found untravelled worlds of ught in a fish.

But every man has testified after trying the rning and science of the world for a solace, that s an insufficient portion. The philosopher has en wept in astronomer's observatory and chems laboratory and botanist's herbarium. There times when the soul dives deeper than a fish
I soars higher than the bird, and though it may enraptured with the beauties of the natural rld, it will long after trees of life that never her, and fountains that never dry up, and stars it shall shine after the glories of our earthly ghts have gone out forever.

Oh what discontents, what jealousies, what unntrollable hate has sprung up among those who ended upon their

LITERARY SUCCESS!

How often have writers plunged their pens into e hearts of their rivals, pens sharper than cim-ers, striking deeper than bayonets. Voltaire ted Rousseau, Charles Lamb could not endure deridge, Waller warred against Cowley. The red of Plato and Xenophon is as immortal as ic works. Corneille had an utter contempt for icine. Have you ever been in Westminster Ab-y? In the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey ep Drayton, the poet, and a little way off Goldie, o said the former was not a poet. There sleep yden and a little way off poor Shadwell who rsued him with fiend's fury. There is Pope and little way off is John Dennis, his implacable
emy. They never before came so near together thout quarrelling. Byron had all that genius uld give a man, and that sympathy with nature uld give a man, and that literary applause could e a man, and yet he died of wretchedness.

IV. I come to learn one more lesson from my bject, and that is that there is no comfort in the e of

A VOLUPTUARY.

I dare not draw aside the curtain that hides the esses into which Solomon's dissoluteness inged him. Though he waved a sceptre over ers there arose in his own soul a tyrant that stered him. With a mandate that none dare obey, he laid the whole land under tribute to his quity. Delilah sheared the locks of that Sam-
a. From that princely seraglio there went forth uinous blight on the whole nation's chastity;
t after awhile remorse with feet of fire leaped on his soul, and with body exhausted and loath-some and dropping apart with putrefaction, he staggers out from the hell of his own iniquity to give warning to others.

Oh, how many have ventured out on that wild sea of sensuality, driven by fierce winds of passion, hurled against rocks, swallowed in the whirl of hell's maelstrom; that was the last of them.
No; that was not the last of them. Everlastingly ruined, with their passions unsubdued and burning on the soul fiercer than unquenchable fire, they shall writhe in a torture that shall make the cheek of darkness pale and utter a blasphemy that shall shock devils damned. Oh, how many young men have gone on that path of sin because it seemed blooming with tropical splendor and the sky was bright, and the air was balm, and from the castles that stood on the shore of glittering seas there came ringing up laughter as merry as the waves that dashed on the crags beneath.

By some infernal spell their eye was blinded and their ear was stopped; or they would have heard the clank of chains and the howl of woe, and across their vision would have come spectres of the dead, with shrouds gathered up about faces blistered with pain and eyes starting from their sockets in agony. But they saw it not, they heard it not, until from the slippery places the long, lean, skeleton hands of despair reached up and snatched them down, destroyed without remedy!

Has this sorcerer cast its eye on you? O young man, have you been once again to the places where the pure never go? Have you turned your back upon a mother's prayer and a sister's love, and while I speak does your conscience begin to toll dismally the burial of your purity and honor? Put back now or never! Put back! The shadow that falls upon your soul is from no passing cloud but from a night deep, starless, eternal. God's eye watcheth thy footsteps. A little further on and no tears can wash out thy sin and no prayer will bring a pardon.

PUT BACK NOW

or never! I tear off the garlands which hide this death's head and hold before you the reeking skull of sinful pleasure.

Nations have gone down under this sin. Exhumed cities on broken pillars and on temple walls have preserved in infamous sculpture the memory of scenes before which the antiquarian turns his head and asks if there be a God where so long has slept His vengeance. The world still trembles under the weight of this behemoth of iniquity, and from the myriad graves in which it holds the scarred carcasses of the slain lifts up its hands crying: "How long, O Lord, how long?"

From Christian circles, from the very altars of God, the ranks of ruin are made up. They march on with scorched feet over a pathway of fire, the ground trembling with earthquakes and the air hot with the breath of woe and sulphureous with the fleet lightnings of God's wrath. Scorpions strike out at every step, and the worm, that never dies lifts its awful crest, with horrid folds to crush the debauched. Oh, there is no peace in the life of a voluptuary. Solomon answer! "None! none!"

But, my friends, if there is no complete satisfaction in worldly offices, in worldly wealth, in worldly learning, in sinful indulgence—where is there any? Has God turned us out on a desert to die?
Ah, no; look at this fair one that comes! Immortal garlands on her brow! The song of heaven bursting from her lips! "Her ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." In Christ is peace. In Christ is pardon. In Christ is everlasting joy, and nowhere else.

WHAT THE EGYPTIAN CRISIS MAY LEAD TO.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE gravity of the outbreak of Mahome.an fanaticism in Egypt against Europeans, four hundred of whom were massacred in Alexandria on Sunday, June 11th, consists in the fact that it may lead on to the predestined war between France and certain nations on the one side, against Germany and other nations on the opposite side.
That predestined war is indicated by the prophetic dates to take place more probably in 1882-3-4 than at a later period, and therefore every national disturbance that seems likely to lead to it will be watched by prophetic students with eager attention.

Germany, under Bismarck's leadership, is said to have formed an alliance with the Sultan of Turkey, who is going to reorganize the Turkish army on the Prussian military system under Prussian officers. It is therefore the interest of Germany to consolidate and extend the power of Turkey over Egypt, Tripoli, and North Africa, as much as possible. But the interests of France, in consequence of its desire to seize Tunis and Tripoli, are directly antagonistic to those of Turkey, and consequently of Germany in the North of Africa. Here then a collision may arise between France and Germany before long; and it is a problem of intense importance, Will Britain side with Germany or France in that approaching contest?

Prophecy shows us that, contrary to what we should naturally expect, France will actually conquer Germany and the nations allied with it, and that the Turco-Mahomedan Empire (the prophetic Euphrates of Rev. 16 : 12) instead of being strengthened and upheld by its alliance with Germany, will be "dried up," and will lose Macedonia, Syria, and part of Asia Minor. France will annex all the left bank of the Rhine, and form the confederacy of ten nations prefigured by the ten horns (Daniel 7 : 24).

Britain will emerge out of forthcoming troubles with the disastrous loss of Ireland and India. For the present she has already lost possession of the Suez Canal, which is her highway to India, and it cannot be doubted but that the observation of this fact will tend to encourage the disaffected tribes in India in due time to rise up and cause such a mutiny and rebellion as utterly to shatter Britain's dominion over India. The whole Mahomedan world is now in a state of fanatical agitation, and Mahomedans in India may soon be stimulated to drive Europeans out of India, seeing how easily Mahomedans have driven them out of Egypt.
Britain is destined to undergo the most frightful disasters and calamities in the next few years.

The London Record, under the head of "Anarchy in Egypt," says: "History has been moving fast on the northern shores of Africa. The insignificance to which the country of the Pharaohs has been reduced by the progress of Christian civilization has disappeared as if by magic. Egypt is again upon the lips of every one, and the whole world awaits with anxiety the telegrams from Alexandria.

"More than a twelvemonth ago it was sufficiently obvious that mischief was brewing in Egypt.
It possessed within itself all the elements of danger.
There was a population steeped to the lips in ignorance and poverty. There was a paper army of 18,000 men, recruited exclusively among the 'fellahs,' every man of which was only anxious to strip off his uniform and go back to his little farm.
Of the whole force about one-third are supposed to have existed on paper alone. Their pay was drawn, notwithstanding, by Arabi Pasha, the unscrupulous Minister of War, and spent either for his own purposes or in largesses to the military officers. Of these there were about two thousand, one to every six available privates. It is these men who have mutinied against the Khédive, the sovereign of the country, and who have been prompted to mutiny, and sustained in insubordination by the unscrupulous adventurer Arabi Pasha, who has managed to foist himself upon Egypt as her 'national' champion.

This is the plain unvarnished tale of the results of our 'Egyptian policy.' Our fellow-subjects have been murdered, ill-treated, and maimed with impunity. Our demands have been scornfully refused. Arabi Pasha seems at his ease. And England has again made herself the laughingstock of Europe. The loss of private property, realized in a state of panic, or destroyed by the mob, has been enormous. The injury to Egypt by the exodus of the foreign merchants, and the closing of their establishments, is serious in the extreme. The danger to the Suez Canal and to the safety of those who traverse it is imminent.
That all this must be stopped at all hazards is obvious enough."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Watching for Christ's Return.—Speaking at a meeting in the Circus on June 11, Mr. Scroggie said: "I was told by a friend that a Presbyterian minister winds up his blind every night when he goes to bed. When asked by a friend the reason of this, he replied, 'I wish to get the first glimpse of the glory of my Lord and Master when He comes. We should all be ready and watchful, for He may come at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning.'

A Whole Sunday Class Converted.—A young lady who was brought to a knowledge of the truth, on the occasion of Mr. Moody's previous visit, was afterward laid upon a sick bed, where she underwent weeks and months of patient suffering, and then passed away in peace. The genuineness of her conversion was seen in her anxiety for the salvation of the members of her Sabbath-school class. One day she had them brought to her bedside—most of them oftener than once—and by her entreaties and in answer to her prayers, we have reason to believe that every one in the class was brought to Christ."

An Irishwoman's Conversion.—Mr. Jack said: "An Irishwoman—the mother of a rough family of two big lads and other younger branches, and the wife of a careless husband—told me that she was brought into the light three weeks ago. The family soon came to know the change," I used, she said, "to use the tawse very often indeed, but since I have been converted I have never had the strap in my hand." The boys cannot understand what has come over the mother, and now ask to be taken to 'kirk' with her. She is now ruling her family with love; and it would do you good now to see that woman's beaming, joyful face, as she rests in the Lord."

A Pedestrian Party.—Mr. M'Farlane said that "on the previous Sunday, after the meeting had dispersed from the City Hall, seven persons remained in their seats. It was found that they had come a distance of thirteen miles. They had been working hard on Saturday, but that did not prevent them getting up at 4 o'clock yesterday (Sunday) morning, in order to accomplish this journey. Two of these young men were already earnest Christians, the other five were not, but they had a purpose in view in coming such a distance. They were taken to the Circus and in the evening they were at Mr. Moody's meeting in the Cowcaddens district; the whole party, in fact, returned to their distant home praising God for what He had done for them."

Gospel Work Among Bakers.—A young man speaking about the Gospel work being done among the bakers said: "That on Thursday night, when Mr. Moody conducted a meeting attended by members of the trade in their working clothes, thirteen of them stood up for prayer, which was a good number, considering that the men were so well known to each other. Last night, at the bakers' meeting eight of them gave testimony, and one of them said that for fourteen years he had never entered a church, and for five years he had not had a Bible in his hands. Another man, who had been much given to drunkenness, said that on early morning he had often found himself going over Glasgow Green with nothing on but his trousers and boots. Many others who had been living a life of dissipation were now seeking the Saviour."

Circus Conquests.—At the Noon-day Prayer-meeting, Glasgow, June 14th, Mr. Mabon said: "Yesterday I visited a family that some time ago I almost thought past redemption. I saw the wife at my meeting on Sabbath evening, bare-headed, and I determined to make a call as soon as possible. When I went into her house yesterday she told me that a great change had taken place. I said 'I am very glad to hear of it if it is a change for the better.' 'Oh yes,' she said, 'it is for the better. Our eldest boy left home and was away for four months. He came back and we took him in again, but he became as bad as ever. One night he came home at half-past ten o'clock and I scolded him for being late, for I had asked him to be in by ten. He said, 'Mother, I am saved.' I said, 'Are you sure you are saved.' He said, 'Yes, I trusted Jesus in the Circus to-night.' Then he got down on his knees and prayed earnestly for me and my husband who were in bed at the time. I could not sleep that night for weeping. My daughter also, who is in service, heard of the conversion of her brother and went with him to the Circus, heard the Gospel, and was saved. The two pleaded with their father, who was a drunken man, and took him to the Circus, and he has been saved too." She said 'It's a different world to me now.' I asked, 'But what about yourself—are you saved?' There was a slight hesitation, and then she said, 'Yes, I will trust Jesus too!'"

Prayer on a Stone-heap.—Mr. Jack said: "A little over two years ago, when I changed my residence from Glasgow to the country, I was going to conduct a little meeting, near Busby, on a bright June Sabbath night. Being a little early we sat down on a heap of stones on the side of the road, and I recollect opening my Bible at the passage from which we were going to tell the story of grace; and we lifted up our hearts asking God that He would bring the few Christians of the place together to plead for blessing. He did so, and He has been doing 'exceeding abundantly above all we could ask or think.' I now hold in my hands the names of fifty-eight men and women who have obtained blessing to their souls within the last eighteen months. Busby is a place of about six hundred or seven hundred inhabitants."

A Bad Business Crippled.—Mr. Mabon (Missionary) speaking on the night of June 13th, at a meeting held at the Christian Institute to form the "Mispah" Temperance Band, in connection with the mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in Glasgow, said: "I met a friend recently who told me he had been travelling from Dundee to Larnett, and in the railway carriage he came across a gentleman who complained about the badness of trade. He remarked that in Dundee and Forfar, where he used to get large orders, he could scarcely get an order now. He said 'That man Murphy through his temperance meetings, and that man Moody in Glasgow, are doing such a work among drunkards that there is no business stirring.' My friend said, 'What trade are you,' and the stranger replied, 'I am in the spirit trade.' 'Praise the Lord' exclaimed my friend at hearing of the falling off in his business."

A Happy Man.—"A Lady once said to me, 'You ought to be a happy man if you know you are saved.' 'Certainly,' I replied; 'there is the blessedness of a man whose sins have been forgiven. Jesus came to make us happy. And,' I said, 'you could be happy in knowing you were saved if you could give a moment's attention to the matter.' 'I would give worlds to know that,' she answered. 'Well, you haven't to do anything or give anything.' I said this because she was a very benevolent woman. Not only did she go regularly to the church, but she gave much to the poor and for religious objects. I remarked, 'All your benevolence is not worth a straw as far as the salvation of your soul is concerned.' 'I could never believe that; I could never believe that,' she exclaimed. Her delusion was a very prevalent one. But if salvation were obtainable by good works, Jesus Christ would not have come down from heaven and died for us."

A Minister's Testimony.—At the Prayer-meeting, June 12th, the Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "I felt guilty once and again in the young converts' meetings that, while they came forward to thank God for the good that they had received, I was keeping silence in reference to the great blessing I had myself received, and I felt that before Mr. Moody left us there was something I owed to him, something I owed to myself, as well as a debt I believe I owe to God, which would necessitate me publicly stating the blessing I have received to my own soul during Mr. Moody's visit to Glasgow. When Mr. Moody came, I do not think there could possibly be in this city a minister of Christ more deeply depressed than I was. In bad health and low spirits, I was almost beginning to think my work was done. On my own platform, in my own church, I rose and asked for prayer. Since then nearly five months have passed, and during that time God has me strength, help, and joy in His work. I think I have enjoyed better physical health than I have enjoyed during these months. Certain that I have never had a more enjoyable time during this mission, and never has God so ordered and blessed my endeavors in His service. I am grateful to Almighty God, and I think it is for glory that I should here openly and frankly re-thanks to Him for the answer to that request prayer which I presented on the platform five months ago."

Another of God's Ravens.—Mr. Campbell said: "Some time ago I visited a family who were bordering on starvation. The landlord was pressing them for the rent, and the grocer was hounding them up for the back account. Many other reverse circumstances were pressing them down; they had nothing to eat in the house. I could assist them at the time, but I said to the mother, 'We will get down on our knees and pray over the matter, and see what the Lord will do.' Praying I left the house, expecting to return for some assistance. Soon after I had left, a woman, who was in the habit of calling upon the family, came to the door. The mother told her story, and said, 'We have nothing to eat in the house and have had nothing since yesterday.' The old woman said, 'Now take what I have gotten my apron,' and produced some bread and butter and tea. She said, 'I have been making a call on a friend who was in the habit of giving me something, and though I told him I did not want anything, he would make me take the things.' A poor woman who was herself dependent on charitable relief was able to assist this family, and are fortunately now in much better circumstances. The mother is now trusting in the Lord, who is supplying her according to His riches in glory."

A Cure for Scepticism.—Speaking of the fact that Christians ought to show, Mr. Scroggie said: "A woman who had been for long a nominal Christian was wonderfully quickened by some meetings held by Mr. A. B. Earl. She became deeply concerned about her husband. He was falling into infidel opinions, and his state filled with anxiety. She besought Mr. Earl to go and see him, but warned him to approach him with caution on account of his sceptical views. Mr. Earl, however, found little caution necessary, he found the man really anxious about his soul. Mr. Earl was astonished. 'I thought,' he said, 'you were very sceptical. What, may I say, awakened you?' The man replied that it was a changed state of his wife. For sixteen years religion had afforded her no happiness, and had seemed much happier when she pursued pleasures of the world. It was this that had made him entertain infidel opinions. 'But now,' he said, 'she is wholly different; her religion evidently gives her true happiness, and I myself should like to know something of the secret of her peace and joy.' It is important for the sake of others that Christians should seek what the Psalmist so often calls 'the joy of salvation.'"

Dying in Despair.—At the Meeting on June 8th, the Rev. Mr. Bremner, speaking on the subject of the Ten Virgins, said: "In trying on one occasion to improve the death of a member of our congregation, I preached from this portion of Scripture, and endeavored to describe the character of sleeping, slumbering professors of religion. There was a person present—one of our members—who that afternoon went to see that young man in the grave. He returned and was taken ill. I was called to visit him. I found him in the depths of despair. He said, 'I am one of the sleeping professors you described.' I endeavored to turn his mind to Christ; but he exclaimed, 'There is no hope for me; I am lost, I am lost.' I asked him if I might pray. 'There is no use praying for me,' he said, 'my salvation is impossible; pray for my wife (who was standing weeping beside us); there is no salvation for me.' He died in despair the next Lord's day, improving this providence also, told the story of the man's death, and said the man might be some one present who was in the same position. There was in the church a mother who had come from Perthshire to visit her family lasgow. She too visited the same Necropolis that afternoon, was taken ill on the Monday, and on Tuesday was a corpse. Oh, how many lessons of this kind are constantly afforded us, and how unwilling are men to believe that time is short and life uncertain."

Death of a Soldier's Wife.—Colonel Anderson then remarked: "With regard to this drink question when I was in Burmah, three years ago, my friends used to say, 'You can't live without taking drink'; but I am here to-day hale and hearty, notwithstanding that I kept from it. At one of my total abstinence meetings one of the men said to me, 'They say that though you and the missus are total abstainers, if Dick, Tom, or Harry goes to our house he can get drink.' That rankled in my heart, and when I went home I put all the wine, &c., out of my house, and now we haven't even of a wine-glass or a decanter. In December last I was in Burmah with a noble battery of the Royal Artillery. I had splendid men, and I was often asked, 'How is it that you have so little crime in the regiment?' 'I can tell you,' was my invariable answer. 'It is because we have so little to do with the drink.' Sickness broke out while we were at Rangoon, and one after another of our men were struck down with cholera, but comparatively few of them died. I shall never forget the death of the wife of one of our men, from cholera, whom he had often endeavored to lead to Christ. When he knew that death was upon her, she screamed, 'Too late, too late! I am lost—I am lost!'"

SATANIC WONDERS.

The Miracle of Carmel Repeated—Life Given to the Image of the Beast—V. The Universality of Evil Supernaturalism—Antichrist's Rule in America and Australia—How is the Divine to be Distinguished from the Satanic?—An Efficient Safeguard.

NOR only will the intrepid and confident challenge of Elijah the Tishbite, God's ancient prophet, "The God that answereth by fire, let him be God," be fairly met by the awfully delusive power of the son of perdition; but the contemporary divine supernaturalism, exhibited by God's "two witnesses," concerning whom it is written, "If any man be minded to hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies" (Rev. 11: 5)—will thus at the same time be matched, though not indeed be eclipsed. How solemn is this appalling fact; and how deeply should its consideration impress on our minds the livine warning that Antichrist would by his great signs and wonders—were it possible—"deceive even the elect."

LIFE GIVEN TO THE IMAGE OF THE BEAST.

The second specimen of the "great signs and wonders" to be wrought in attestation of the blasphemous claims of the Antichrist to divine homage is of a still more amazing and almost irresistible character; for of the False Prophet it is said, that he "deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by means of those miracles which he had power to do in the presence of the Beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image of the Beast, which had the wound by the sword, and did live. And he had power to give life unto the image of the Beast, that the image of the Beast should even speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the Beast should be killed" (Rev. 13: 14, 15).

It may perhaps help us to realize all that is involved in this truly "great wonder," and the almost overwhelming impression which it will be calculated to produce on those who shall witness it, if we again refer to a very striking scene in Old Testament history. In the third chapter of the Book of Daniel we have a graphic record of the setting up of a great image by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, "in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon," and the issue of a decree that the inhabitants of his vast empire should, representatively at least, "fall down and worship it," under pain of being "cast the same hour into a burning fiery furnace."

This image, which doubtless bore the human form, was a very splendid and impressive object. It was, including its pedestal (nearly thirteen feet square), one hundred and twenty-five feet in height, and being made of gold, no doubt glittered resplendently in the Eastern sun. But just let us imagine for a moment how enormously the impression it was calculated to make on the beholders would have increased—how absolutely overwhelming it would have become—had this colossal image suddenly become endued with life and issued its awful commands in the sounds of human speech. Yet this is only what in very truth the stupendous miracle of Antichrist is actually to effect. Nay more; Nebuchadnezzar's image was but one, while it seems very probable that Hengstenberg is correct when he says, in reference to that of Antichrist, "only one image is spoken of, but in regard to the sense a multitude of images is meant," and that thus "a sort of ubiquitous presence" will be given to the Beast, greatly facilitating his worship throughout the world.

LIFE FROM NON-LIVING MATTER.

But there is a further and deeper suggestiveness in this "great sign," which it may be well to point out in passing. As the former of these two Satanic wonders—that of calling down fire from heaven—will very powerfully appeal to the credulity of the superstitious—as actually accomplishing what the Greek patriarch at Jerusalem, year by year, feigns by contemptible trickery to produce; so this second one, of giving life to the image of the Beast, will meet the scepticism of science on its own ground; for it is now almost universally admitted by the most eminent scientists, including Pasteur, Tyndall, and Huxley, that, wonderful as are the transformations which science can effect, there is one thing which yet clearly lies beyond human power—viz., to produce life from non-living matter. To do this would be the supreme triumph of that school of science which would fain banish God from His own universe. But all such attempts have been in vain; not all the resources of modern chemistry can produce the lowest and simplest form of animal life, and how much less that highest and most complex of all—the human body. Yet this is what Antichrist will actually accomplish, and thereby he will not only put human science to confusion, but at the same time apparently exercise the prerogative of Him who has said: "I kill and I make alive."

Reader, do you believe that these things shall one day—perhaps at no very distant day—take place? Or do you seek to explain away the solemn statements by accepting some non-literal interpretation? Well, you may do so if you please; but remember that, as Dr. de Burgh has well said, "whatever liberty of exposition you adopt, you are bound to grant the same to the infidel and enemy of truth; and if it serves your purpose on one occasion to say that miracles, even when so specified as these here, are mere delusions and cheats practised on the senses by dexterous impostors, it may serve the purpose of the sceptic to say that such impositions also were the miracles of the Saviour Himself."

THE UNIVERSALITY OF THE AREA OF LATTER-DAY EVIL SUPERNATURALISM.

V.—I pass on to advert, very briefly, to the last of the five general conclusions which seem to be established by the testimony of Scripture on this subject—viz., the area over which the evil supernaturalism of the last days will extend will be world-wide and not confined to any particular class or nation. This, it seems to me, may fairly be inferred from our Lord's own statement that these "great signs and wonders" should, were that possible, "deceive the very elect;" taken in connection with the declarations which we find in the Book of Revelation that "all the world wondered after the Beast;" and that "all that dwell on the earth shall worship him, every one whose name hath not been written in the Book of Life of the Lamb" (Matt. 24: 24; Rev. 13: 3-8.)

No doubt the throne of Antichrist will be in the earthly Jerusalem, and there will be the centre of his authority; for it is in the restored Jewish temple that he is to sit "as God, showing himself that he is God." Moreover, the area of his special dominion, with which he will have peculiarly intimate relations, will be the ten kingdoms of the Roman world, for it is the kings of this world that the demon spirits of Rev. 16 are to "gather to the war of the great day of God Almighty." Still neither his rule nor his persecution will be absolutely restricted to the Roman earth, as is apparent from the statements of Scripture above quoted.

Indeed, it is in the nature of things absurd to suppose that, at the very time when Antichrist is persecuting unto death all who refuse to worship him—e.g., in Britain as one of the ten kingdoms, any inhabitant of this country has simply to cross over into Ireland to escape his power. And if Ireland will not be excluded, why should we suppose that America or Australia will be? No; let no vain hopes be entertained. Wherever the Gospel has been preached as more than "a witness," and over every land in which, generally speaking, the name of Christ is confessed, the awful power of Antichrist will extend; only those nations, it may be, being exempt of which it may with truth be said that they "have neither heard Christ's fame nor seen His glory" (Isa. 66: 19); and in which, therefore, apostasy is impossible.

HOW TO DISTINGUISH THE SATANIC.

Thus, then, will the evil supernaturalism of the last days be Satanic in its origin, wrought by the instrumentality of demons, manifested especially in connection with Antichrist, be at once of a most startling and seductive character, and extend its influence over the whole civilized world. But there is one practically momentous question to which I must endeavor to supply an answer before quitting this strange and solemn subject. If the miracles wrought by Satanic power are, in some cases at least, as real as those which are in truth divine, how are the two to be distinguished? By what test can a miracle of the Devil be detected?

I think the true answer is supplied by the late Dean Mansel, when he says, "It is not the truth of the doctrine but the authority of the teacher that miracles are employed to prove," and the authority therefore being established, the value of the miracle follows from it. Now within the spiritual sphere the Christian is bound to recognize no authority but that of Christ." It follows, therefore, that the miracles of Antichrist being wrought for the express purpose of "doing away with Jesus," will, to the spiritual eye, carry the mark of their condemnation, as it were, stamped on their forehead. "God cannot deny Himself." A miracle wrought to disprove God's existence or the Gospel of Christ cannot be wrought by divine power; and is, therefore, as valueless as a seal would be torn from the document which it was intended to confirm.

AN EFFICIENT SAFEGUARD.

But it has pleased God to supply those who shall be exposed to this special temptation of Satan with a further safeguard. And it is this: God never permits the exercise of an evil supernaturalism without at the same time providing a divine supernaturalism to meet and eclipse it. And so shall it be when Antichrist shall be permitted to show his "great signs and wonders;" for still greater and more significant will be the miracles wrought in attestation of the truth of God.

To take a single instance: The False Prophet, as we have seen, is to have the power of calling down fire from heaven in the sight of men, and the full significance of this sign has been pointed out. But, contemporaneously, of God's Two Witnesses—presumably Enoch and Elijah—it is written: "If any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies" (Rev. 11: 5). Here it may be noted that while in both cases a certain "power over fire" is predicated, in the one case it is only called down from heaven, and does not seem to have any particular result; in the other it proceeds out of the very mouths of the Witnesses themselves, and, moreover, "devours their enemies." Thus it will be seen that even in the most terrible hour of the powers of darkness, the divine promise will still hold good, that "God is faithful, who will not suffer His people to be tempted above that they are able, but will with the temptation also make a way of escape."

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Proposal to Amend the Constitution by making all postmasters, revenue collectors, marshals and United States district attorneys elective by the people of the States in which they are to perform duties, was advocated in the House of Representatives on Thursday, July 6th, by Mr. Bayne, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Bayne claimed for the change that it would decrease the power of the executive and abolish the spoils system. Mr. Bayne, made sweeping charges against the present administration, to which, on the following day Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, made an elaborate reply. Comparing the administration of President Arthur with that of President Garfield, Mr. Butterworth said that during the four months of Garfield's Administration there had been 301 reappointments of officers and 89 removals from office. During the ten months of President Arthur's incumbency, according to the tables displayed by Mr. Butterworth, there had been 874 reappointments and only 49 removals. In Pennsylvania President Arthur had made only five removals, three of which were for good and sufficient cause. In New York there had also been only five removals.

In the Senate an Acrimonious Debate was provoked last week by the proposals for defraying the expenses of President Garfield's illness. The item of $52,500 for the physicians was strongly opposed. Senator Vest led the opposition, and in strong terms expressed his surprise that after the disclosures revealed by the autopsy of the errors that had been made so large a claim should have been made for medical services, especially by Dr. Bliss, whose enormous fee for eighty days' service was the principal object of attack. Mr. Vest also referred to the charges made during the President's illness that while the public bulletins were giving favorable reports, the President's physicians were telegraphing in cipher to Wall Street brokers information exactly the reverse of that which was being published. He thought it due to the country that an investigation into that charge should even yet be made. It was decided to reduce the sum payable to the physicians to $35,000.

The Passing of the Naval Bill in the House on Thursday, July 6th, was one of the most important political events of the past week. On being put to the vote, 119 members voted in its favor and 75 against it. The close of the debate was marked by a most disgraceful scene in which Mr. Robeson and Mr. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, took part. It was only by the intervention of friends that a personal scuffle on the floor of the House was averted. During the debate, the ex-Secretary's administration of the navy had been freely criticized. The appropriation asked for, naturally elicited comment, because it implied that the navy is in a deplorably inefficient condition, notwithstanding enormous sums were voted for it only a few years ago. It was openly asserted that Mr. Robeson had not applied the money to the purpose for which it was appropriated, and that a large part of it had been squandered or stolen. Mr. Robeson in reply charged Mr. Whitthorne, who had been prominent among his assailants, with dishonesty and immorality. Mr. Whitthorne thereupon denounced the charges as false, and the two men had to be separated. The incident was not only degrading to the principals, but an insult to the House. It succeeded, however, in diverting at the critical moment the attention of members from the troublesome inquiry as to the expenditure of previous appropriations for the navy. Mr. Robeson said, "What I have been in character and principle, I am; and what I am, I expect to continue to be." After giving so explicit a warning he should not have been surprised at opposition to the appropriation he asked, nor have been provoked into making charges which whether true or false could do nothing toward clearing his own character.

Drunkenness will not be Accepted as an Excuse for crime, nor will the plea be admitted in extenuation by the law courts. The Court of Appeals has recently rendered a decision upon the question. A new trial was asked by the counsel of a convicted murderer because the judge who presided at his trial had refused to charge the jury that the accused was not responsible if the crime had been committed when he was drunk. The Court of Appeals ruled that not even frenzy or mental alienation caused by drink can exempt a person accused of murder from criminal responsibility. If a man voluntarily gets drunk and commits a crime while in that condition he must answer for the consequences of his acts. This is a most just and wise decision.

An Unusual Scene at Police Headquarters in New York was witnessed a few days ago. District-Attorney McKeon paid a visit to the building to witness the destruction of gambling implements which were seized by the police last April in the gambling house of the 29th Precinct. The law directs that such implements shall be destroyed after the conviction of the persons who owned and used them. Superintendent Walling and Commissioner Nichols received Mr. McKeon and escorted him to the sub-cellar of the building, where the janitor and his assistants had heaped implements for playing faro, roulette, keno, and red and black, worth eight thousand dollars, in front of a blazing furnace. Mr. Walling threw off his coat, seized an axe and demolished one of the tables. Mr. McKeon looked on smilingly until most of the tables had been broken into kindling-wood and the smaller implements had been burned up.

A Terrible Steamboat Disaster Occurred on the Ohio River near Mingo Junction and about fifty miles below Pittsburg on Wednesday, July 5th. It was caused by a collision between the steamers Scioto, and the John Loomis, in which the Scioto was sunk. Conflicting accounts are given of the disaster, but it appears to have arisen from a misunderstanding of signals or a disregard of them. The Scioto with some six hundred people on board, was returning to Wheeling from Moundsville, W. Va., and about 9.30 P.M. sighted the John Loomis near Mingo Junction, coming rapidly down stream. The John Loomis whistled for preference of sides, and the pilot of the Scioto, who wanted the Ohio side, replied, claiming that course. What followed is uncertain, but in a few minutes the John Loomis struck the Scioto, tearing a great hole in her bow and scattering the engine fires about the deck. The Scioto was instantly on fire, but she went down so rapidly that all danger from fire was averted. The John Loomis was comparatively uninjured and ran to the bank to land her passengers and then returned to the scene of the disaster to rescue the drowning passengers of the Scioto. Several skiffs also went to render assistance. The water at that time is stated by an eyewitness to have been black with floating persons crying for help. They had been on the upper decks of the steamer and sprang off as she sank. The persons on the lower decks are supposed to have all been drowned. Parties with grappling irons were engaged each day last week in a search for corpses, and on Saturday thirty-eight had been recovered. Twenty others are known to be missing, and it is feared that when the wrecked boat is raised many more will be found. The report that the Scioto was illegally overcrowded at that large quantities of liquor were sold on board will be investigated at the inquest.

Temperance Work in Illinois Conducted under the auspices of the Citizens' League has made considerable progress. The League has just issued a pamphlet containing the liquor laws of the State, and a brief review of its work since the organization in 1877. During that period 73 saloon-keepers have been prosecuted, 281 held to the Grand Jury, and 264 fined by justices, the total expenses of prosecution being $5782. In the five months of this year 400 saloon-keepers have been arrested, 40 held to the Grand Jury, 294 fine by justices, and the balance remain to be tried. The League claims to have saved the city in police expenses $300,000, and among other things has diverted from saloons at least $1,000,000. The organization is represented as prosperous and successful.

Rev. Dr. Poisal, an Eminent Minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, died on June 25th. He was the oldest minister of the Baltimore Conference. He was 75 years old, and had suffered from illness for a long time. He was a native of Martinsburg, W. Va., and entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church when about 20 years old, attaching himself to the Baltimore Conference. His first ministerial service was on circuit, and subsequently he became junior preacher at Monument and Exeter Streets station, with the Rev. Charles B. Tibbett as his senior. His ministry there was identified with a large number of conversions, and was very successful. He afterward joined the New York Conference, in which he continued eight years, when he returned to Baltimore. At the commencement of the war with the Rev. Alphus Wilson, lately elected bishop by the General Conference at Nashville, and the Rev. Mr. Busey, he established the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in Baltimore.

The Arrivals in New York of Jewish Refugees from Russia during the month of June were 2379, of whom 420 were women and 947 children. Since the commencement of the movement 6822 have been received. The Hebrew Emigrant Aid Society, which has hitherto take care of these emigrants, furnishing them with meals, clothing and shelter temporarily, and supplying them with railroad tickets to places in various States in the West and South where employment was offered, has now announced that its funds are exhausted. In future, aid will be furnished to Jewish emigrants by the society only so far as new contributions will permit. Any arrivals whom the society cannot aid will be left in care of the government commissioners. This collapse is due to the fact that the London Committee, although possessing large funds, has not assisted the American society to any proportionate extent, but has sent over large numbers of families absolutely penniless, and in many cases unfit for the only occupations in which they could be employed.

A Clergyman's Unusually Varied Experience is related in a Maine journal. It is that of Rev. John Spinney, a Baptist minister of Starks, who is now sixty-four years old. It appears from the account given, that originally the old gentleman was a blacksmith by trade, having worked twenty years at that business. When nineteen years old he commenced preaching, frequently walking ten miles to church on a Sunday, preaching two sermons, and returning on foot at night. In his life he has moved thirty-eight times and has erected twenty-three buildings. Among other things he has delivered over eight thousand sermons, attended over two hundred funerals in Starks, married over two hundred couples, baptized over two hundred people, and has brought up a family of ten children.

A Remarkable Case of Spontaneous Combustion occurred at Norwalk, Conn., on June 29th. The thermometer registered 97°, and there was no air stirring. A lady thought she smelled something burning upstairs, so going up into the garret—a small, close, stifling room used for storage—she opened a small window to look around, when instantly a bag of carpet rags hanging up burst into a flame. But for her presence of mind in catching up a blanket and smothering the fire the building would have soon been ablaze. The rags had been hanging there from October last. It is a well-known fact that certain materials when subjected to known atmospheric conditions, will produce flame without the external application of fire. The analogous spiritual fact, however, is not so generally recognized, or we should not so frequently hear a child's soul compared to a sheet of white paper. Parents and teachers cannot too constantly remember that children, however pure and innocent they may appear, have propensities that will burst into a flame of open or secret sin unless they are born again of the Spirit (Job 25 : 4.)

A Valley of Dry Bones is Said to have been found in Arkansas. A Little Rock journal states that a farmer while working on a farm in Faulkner County, Ark., recently, saw a ravine which had been washed by a recent overflow of the Black Fork and in which reposed a large number of human skeletons, lying in natural positions, together with several earthen bowls, shells, arrows, and leaden bullets. The skulls were all encased in vessels made of clay, while one, with handsomely engraved ornaments, denoted that the skull belonged to an unusually important personage. The farm has been under cultivation over forty years, and relics denoting the existence there at one time of a prehistoric race have been frequently found. This strange discovery reminds us of that vision of dry bones which Ezekiel saw (Ezekiel 37), and in which the prophet was taught to see a type of the spiritual condition of his people. It is a type of the spiritual state of many in our day in Christian as well as in heathen lands. The transformation Ezekiel saw worked may be worked again, and that too by the same means, when God shall say, "I will put my Spirit in you and ye shall live."

A Rope-Walker Lost his Life at Omaha, Neb., on July 1st in the course of one of his dangerous performances. It was announced that Henry Foster would walk on a rope stretched from the roof of the Academy of Music in that city to the roof of another building on the opposite side of the street. The performance attracted thousands of people, and was repeated on successive evenings for more than a week. On July 1st another exhibition of the tight rope feat was to be given, and at eight o'clock Foster appeared upon the roof of the Academy, carrying his balancing pole as usual. Stepping on the rope, he walked slowly to about the centre of the street. He was still standing erect and balancing with the pole, when suddenly he was seen to shoot downward, straight as an arrow. The rope had broken, and shrieks of horror were heard here and there in the crowd, and several women became faint and sick, for all knew that the man was doomed. He struck the ground upon his feet with a dull thud, and then fell backward, the balancing pole falling across his breast. He was picked up and medical assistance was summoned, but he died before the doctors arrived. The rope had been in place for two weeks, in wind and rain, and appeared to have rotted through at a place where it was held by an iron hook. It seems incredible that a man performing so dangerous a feat should have neglected to examine the rope before venturing on it, but uninterrupted success had probably rendered him negligent. The path of the worldling through this life is not unlike that exhibition. Continued safety and freedom from trouble produces a sense of security, but the awakening will be terrible (Eccles. 8 : 11).

Serious Warning to Railroad Corporations has been recently given by an expert, who cautions them against the idea that the durability of railroad plant is great. New roads with iron rails and wooden structures, he states, will need renewals for the most part within ten years. Rails endure according to traffic, and for light work will last ten years. Good wooden bridges when new will be dangerous in ten years unless covered, and a wooden bridge nicely covered and painted may appear to be in the best of condition, but really be in the very worst. It may be hoped that this word of caution will lead to a closer and more frequent inspection of these structures. The same warning might advantageously be given to people who are trusting to other bridges by which they expect to reach Heaven. Ornate ritual and gorgeous ceremonies do not prove that the way is sound and strong. The outward show may reasonably arouse suspicion that it is necessary to conceal inward rottenness (2 Cor. 5 : 12).

A Pleasure Party was Carried over a Precipice in California on the night of June 24th. The party was returning from Santa Cruz to Camp Felton. The moon was shining brightly and the party was a gay and joyous one, but its pleasure was marred by a nervous feeling occasioned by the carelessness of the driver. About midnight a point was reached two hundred feet above the railroad track, when the stage suddenly went over the grade and rolled over and over until it struck the track below, a complete wreck. Three out of the company were killed in the descent, and one died an hour after. Two others were seriously wounded, and the rest escaped with bad bruises. It is a pity that the driver, whose carelessness had been observed before the accident, was allowed to continue in charge. On such a road as the one traversed, carelessness on his part should have been followed by his prompt and imperative removal. In the journey of our lives a similar watchfulness is needed. Passions within us and enemies without us may usurp the guidance of our course and drive us to eternal ruin. Happy is he who confides his safety to the hands of an all-wise Saviour (2 Tim. 1 : 12).

A Telegrapher's Curious Blunder Might have caused unpleasantness between two Congregationalist associations recently had not the probability of its being a blunder been apparent. It is stated that the Maine General Association two weeks ago sat at the same time as that of Connecticut, and it was thought it would be brotherly to send a telegram expressing kindly feeling. It was done, and the Connecticut association directed its committee to send to Maine in reply a message concluding with the text (Numbers 6 : 24-25) which reads, "The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee." But when the minister who had sent it went again to the telegraph office to send another message to the Massachusetts association, also in session at that time, the telegraph operator uneasily said: "I hope there wasn't any mistake about that other dispatch which went to Maine." "No, indeed. What makes you think there was?" "Why, the gentlemen there wanted their message repeated so as to be sure that it had been sent accurately, and I looked at the text, and it did seem an odd one." "What text did you send?" "That written in the dispatch given me by you—Numbers 24 : 25." A Bible being hastily examined, these words were found at that place: "And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place; and Balak also went his way." Which might have been taken as a hint that the association would do well to discontinue its deliberations.

THE BLESSED GUEST DETAINED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they drew nigh unto the village, whither they went: and He made as though He would have gone further. But they constrained Him, saying, Abide with us: for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And He went in to tarry with them."—Luke 24 : 28, 29.

WHAT a blessed walk was that from Jerusalem to Emmaus! Were they not highly favored men to have such a companion as the Lord Jesus, to hear Him converse upon such a subject, and to feel their hearts burning within them with so divine a flame? Brethren, these are not the only men who have walked with the Lord Jesus. I trust I look into the eyes of full many who can say, "We too, have communed with the Son of the Highest; the eyes of our faith have seen Him, and our ears have heard His voice." Thank God, our divine Master is of His disciples, and our life-walk is with Him. In one sense "He is not here, for He is risen;" but in another sense He is more peculiarly here because He has risen; and whereas unrisen He could only have been in one place at a time, now that He is risen He is by His Spirit present with thousands of His people at the same moment, and he walks not only from Jerusalem to Emmaus, but to many a village, through many a garden, along many a street. Jesus delights to manifest Himself unto His people; He is not strange unto His own flesh. We are bound to bear witness to the fact that He is not ashamed to call us brethren, and to be found walking with us.

Yea, even to those who are not His people Jesus comes very near at times, and though they know Him not He walks at their side; and this not in silence, for He instructs them by His word and makes their hearts warm by His sacred influence. You have been more than half inclined to cast in your lot with His disciples because their Master has warmed your hearts, if He has not made them burn; and if there has not been the glow of life yet there have been many flickering desires. I pray that Jesus may never leave you, but that your intimacy with Him may be growing, till at last you shall know Him and He shall know you, and there shall be a union formed between you which never shall be broken.

To return to that walk to Emmaus. How short it must have seemed; by far too short for hearts so sad, who at every step found solace. Nor was that walk more sweet than solemn; for it is no mean thing to walk with the risen Son of God. Kings might fling their crowns away to enjoy five minutes of such honor; it was nothing less than sublime. Those brethren must often during the rest of their lives have looked at each other and said, "We walked with Jesus." If you and I had ever actually walked with Jesus, I am half afraid we might have grown proud of it; at any rate, if we were helped not to be proud, yet it would always be a sublime memory. How sublime a thing to have kept pace with incarnate Deity, and marched foot to foot with Him who is God over all, blessed forever! How solemn to those who all unwittingly had enjoyed it! Methinks when they knew Him they must have been overwhelmed with the thought that they had been so near, and they must have feared in the silence of their souls that possibly they had been rashly familiar. They must have looked back upon that high honor with great awe, even as Jacob did after he had communed with God at Bethel, and said, "Surely the Lord was in this place; and I knew it not. How dreadful is this place! this is none other than the house of God, and the very gate of heaven."

Brethren, it is a great thing to come near to Christ; and you who have not yet believed in Him, I should like you to feel in what a solemn position you have sometimes been placed when "He hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you!" and you have felt somewhat of that presence. Jesus does not draw nigh to a man for nothing; He has an influence upon all whom He visits. Your sense of His presence has left upon you a deep responsibility, especially if you have remained chill under the influence of His holy love and have refused to believe in Him. Oh, that you would think of this! Ere our Lord passes on and leaves you to your own devices, I would have you know that the King of heaven has been very nigh to you. Oh that you would cry out to Him, nor cease the cry till He comes and abides with you!

I. This must suffice for an introduction. Oh that the Spirit of God may give the sermon. My subject runs thus: First, observe in the text, COMPANIONS LIKELY TO PART.

The walk had come to an end, for they had reached Emmaus, whither they went, and now the Master made as if He would have gone further, and so the holy talk was likely to end. Jesus is going on, and they may never see Him again. The choicest of all conversations now draws to a close unless the speaker can be induced to stop with the two favored travellers. We are told that our Lord Jesus would have gone further. He did not pretend that He would have gone; but He was actually going. It is the way of Him not to stay anywhere except He is invited and pressed. Certainly He would have gone further; He saith not whither, but He knew right well. Under the circumstances, He and His companions seemed likely to part.

Now, observe the reason of parting. They were not about to separate because of any ill-will on the part of those who had walked with Him. No anger had broken out; nothing that He had said had aroused any animosity—very, very far from it; they felt an intense reverence for the unknown stranger, and sincere gratitude to Him for the charming words which He had addressed to them. He was likely to have gone further; but not because of any rupture between them. Nor would they have divided because of any weariness of Him on their part; He had not prosed away and tired them out so that they would be glad to see the back of Him. The rest of the narrative shows that they were in a very different condition of heart from that. If Jesus had gone further, it would have been entirely because they forgot to invite Him, or failed to urge Him to stay. They could not have felt an utter indifference to Him, but they might have forgotten to press their hospitality upon Him.

Many have short memories when hospitality is concerned. Sometimes we have failed to invite a friend when he needed our kindness, and we have felt sorry for it afterward. They might have supposed that if He went further, so important a person was too great to tarry with them, and perhaps so wise a person had an errand further on which required immediate despatch, and therefore He could not remain with them. Thus they might have let Him go. Had they lost Him it would have been simply through inadvertence.

Communion with the Lord is oftener broken by want of thought than by want of heart; though, alas, when the want of thought has let Him "go further," then it has cooled down into that rock of ice which we have called a want of heart. Therefore, brothers and sisters, let us charge our hearts that we do never forget to entertain the Saviour. Let this be our first thought—that we give Jesus a lodging in our souls. Be this our morning prayer, "Abide with us;" be this our evening petition, "Abide with us;" be this the prayer of all the day long, "Abide with us." May we resolve that under no circumstances will we permit our souls to be at rest unless we rest in Him, or to be happy except He shall be our joy.

The point at which they were at all likely to part company with Christ is worth noting, for it may give us timely warning.

It was, first,

A POINT OF CHANGE.

They had been walking with Him, and the journey was over. They had been out of doors, but now they have come to their house and are about to enter. Always there is a danger to us of missing fellowship with Christ at points of change, and especially at seasons of greatly altered circumstances. I do not wish, brethren, that you and I should be often transplanted; trees do not flourish well when this happens to them. I knew a friend who appeared to be wedded to the Gospel, and was zealous in promoting it when he was persecuted very severely by his father. His father died, and he inherited the old man's property; and from that hour he was not seen in his former place, nor did he manifest any love to the Lord. This is sad. I would hardly dare to pray for some men that they might have a change from persecution to prosperity; plants that flourish amid ice and snow are burned up when placed beneath a tropical sun.

On the other hand, I have known many who once were in comfortable circumstances, and when prosperous they appeared to walk with God; as far as we could judge they were patterns of godliness; but they fell upon hard times, and they grew poorer and poorer, till they tasted the bitterness of want, and now they say they do not like to be seen by those who knew them, and, therefore, they stay away from the house of God. They have lost the comforts of religion when they most need them, lost worldly substance, and, alas, lost fellowship with Christ as well. This is equally sad, for whether Jesus leaves us at the golden gate, or at the broken-down door of poverty, His departure is equally a calamity.

I suppose there is upon a railway a measure of peril at the switches where the train is turned upon another line, and it is certainly so on the main line to glory. At all times it is well to watch, but especially when we are entering upon new duties, new trials, new temptations. Lord, let not the novelty of our position fascinate us even for a moment; but evermore do Thou abide with us.

It was a point, too, where something had been accomplished. They had finished their journey and reached their homes. Oh, we are such poor things that we can hardly complete anything without being self-satisfied. As little a thing as a finished walk will exalt little minds; but if it is some greater work, the peril is increased. When Christ said, "It is finished," He opened a river of comfort; but when we exclaim, "I have finished it," we too often set our minds on fire with pride. Certain men have undertaken a work for Jesus and they have done it by the Holy Spirit's blessing, and now they feel so pleased with themselves and so satisfied that they are likely to spoil all, and give their Lord occasion for grief. The lowly Jesus does not seek self-exalting companions.

Then, dear friends, they were now about to rest for a time. They had reached home, and they looked for repose after the excitements of the week. They had been detained at Jerusalem by grand yet terrible events, and one of them was glad that day to lodge in his own house; as for the other, he was glad to get out of the city and retire with his friend for a little till good news should come from the apostles. They both hoped for a little peace. Just then the Master made as though He would have gone further; and when you and I are promising ourselves repose, such as we have known little of upon earth, it is well at such times to specially ask the Master to abide with us. When we are in the battle we are sure to beg Him to abide with us, because He covers our head, and we cannot live without Him, and when we are proceeding in a weary walk we are likely to pray to Him to remain with us; but when we sit down upon the settle of ease, sleep too often creeps over us. Having put off our travelling sandals, and stretched ourselves at ease, ah, then there is the possibility, the sad possibility, of the Master's going further while we take our rest.

HE IS ALWAYS GOING FURTHER;

and when we resolve to go no further, but to consider ourselves to have attained, then our Lord will soon be gone. We must not take the motto of the famous statesman who has been so often laughed at for his finality; we must not say, "Rest and be thankful," or we shall soon come to grief. If we fall into that vein it is well to remember that just at such a point Jesus and the disciple are apt to break fellowship. I mention this that we may be wise in the hour of trial.

Now, had they parted company, the act would have been most blameworthy on their part. To have lost the society of such a friend, how foolish! Here was one who had instructed them with tenderness and skill—one who spake as never man spake; would they let Him go? Here was one who evidently could explain their mysterious sorrows, and take the sting out of their griefs; and would they let Him pass on? They had been fools indeed if they had done so. It would have shown that they did not appreciate His teaching, nor feel grateful for His opening to them the Scriptures. It would have been gross folly.

And yet there is another thought. It was toward evening, and night was lowering, and therefore they said, "Abide with us: for the day is far spent." It would have been very cruel to have allowed Him to journey on in the dark and the dews. Would we thus treat any friend of ours? Could we allow a beloved one to abide abroad all night? "Be ye not forgetful to entertain strangers" is a Gospel command; but be ye specially eager to entertain your Lord. Shall your Lord ever say to any of you who are called Christians, "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in?" Oh, no, let us invite Him, beg Him, entreat Him, constrain Him to abide with us for His own dear sake, and let us give Him in our warm hearts the best entertainment that we can. Sure we never received such a guest before, and another such we shall never see again.

II. Now I change the scene, and notice next the Guest

NEEDING TO BE PRESSED.

The guest is Jesus, and He is about to go further, and He will go further unless they invite Him, ay, unless, according to the twenty-ninth verse, they constrain Him. It is a very strong word that, "they constrained Him;" it is akin to the one which Jesus used when He said, "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence." You never see anything in Jesus approaching to roughness or want of delicacy; He exhibits the manners of the noblest man that ever lived. He does not force His acquaintance upon any, He goes where He is constrained. Besides, what pleasure could it have been to Him or to them for Him to have lodged in their house if He had not been wanted? Without a welcome, few of us would care to accept a lodging. Jesus therefore naturally, because the other thing was scarcely feasible, waited till He was asked, and even pressed, and had they not constrained Him He would have gone further.

Remark that this is a characteristic of the Son of God at all times. I have not time this morning, otherwise I could show you that all through the Old Testament as well as the New, when the Lord reveals Himself in any visible form He has to be pressed ere He will abide with any. The Lord came to Abraham, and Abraham said, "My Lord, if now I have found favor in Thy sight, pass not away, I pray Thee, from Thy servant: let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree: and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts; after that ye shall pass on: for therefore are ye come to your servant" (Gen. 18:3, 4, 5, and 19:2, 3). Abraham constrains these wondrous guests, or otherwise they will pass on.

We know that our Lord Himself had a shy habit; He often withdrew Himself, and the multitude sought after Him; He walked upon the sea, and they in the vessel saw Him and He would have gone by them, but they cried out to Him. The Syro-Phœnician woman, who sought for the healing of her daughter, found Him at first very cold to her, and only by the greatest faith did she win her desire. He needed earnest pressure ere He yielded to her suit. The blind men cried unto Him for sight, but He passed on, till louder and louder yet went up their piteous cries, and they held Him, for Jesus stood still. The nobleman when he came about his son pleaded with tears till he cried,

"Lord, come down ere my child die." It has been often so with our gracious Lord; He would not come until He saw that the desire for Him was intense. He gives us two parables—one tells us of the man in bed who must be roused with many a knock and many a call ere he would rise to give bread to his friend who sought it; and the other parable is that of the unjust judge who must be wearied by the woman's importunate entreaties before he will vindicate her cause. From all this you see it is the Master's habit to hold back till He is pressed and constrained.

If we must give a reason for this I would remind you of the jealousy of His character. He is jealous of our love; He says, "Give me thine heart," and so He pauses awhile that He may see that we love His person and prize His benefits. Of old the Father said, "The Lord thy Lord is a jealous God;" and Jesus, the incarnation of the divine love, has told us that "love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave," and hence it is that He will not give His company to those who have no heart for it. Ye shall not have His smiles if the smiles of the world will do as well. If intercourse with worldlings will please you as much as intercourse with Him, you shall have none of His company. It is only when you languish for him, and cry for Him that He will abide with you.

III. I have said that here was a guest who needed pressing; there will be no necessity to enlarge upon the remark that here was

A GUEST WORTH PRESSING.

He was indeed worth pressing when we consider what He had done for them. He had given them comfort and instruction, and He was worth detaining if only for that. Had they known Him they would have felt still more that they could not let Him go. This is what has happened to some of us when we have carelessly let slip our Lord; we have been like widows who have newly lost their husbands, sore in heart and desolate. "Should the children of the bridegroom fast?" Not while the bridegroom is with them; but if he be taken from them, then shall they fast. Better to have been outside in the open air, or to have gone further with the unknown traveller, than to have been comfortably housed, and to have treated Him ill. He was a guest worth constraining to remain when we think of the vacuum there would have been if He had gone further.

Besides, we know what they did not then know, that this unknown One would make Himself known to them, as He has done to us. Now knowing Him, as they knew Him afterward in the breaking of the bread, we ought to feel, we must feel, we do feel, that we cannot, will not let Him go, but will detain Him; for He is Christ our Lord.

I spoke at the beginning to some here who have never known our Lord, and yet He has been very close to them frequently, in hearing sermons, and the like. Dear friends, I earnestly beseech you to receive Christ as a stranger, and you shall soon know Him as a friend. You only know of my Lord, that He makes you have the heartburn every now and then, and when we talk about Him you go home very uncomfortable. How I wish that you knew Him better! Oh, that you would entertain Him, for then you would know His excellence! Bid Him come into your heart, and He will be infinitely more to you than He is now. You have no idea what He is; He seems a well-spoken friend, but He will prove to be a brother; He promises now to instruct you, but He will love you, enrich you, and glorify you.

IV. I close by telling you of an argument with which to hold Him. Here it is in the text, "They constrained Him, saying, Abide with us, for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." My first way of using this text does not commend itself to my judgment, but yet it is necessary. All the commentators and preachers I have ever met with suppose that these disciples meant by this argument that it was dreary for themselves to be alone, and therefore for their own comfort and protection they begged the stranger to remain. I do not believe it for a moment; still, that would have been a good argument with the tender-hearted Saviour, and if you and I cannot attain to anything else, let us use that plea. It is toward EVENING WITH MANY OF YOU.

You are in affliction, and the shadows thicken; your light has departed, and you are afraid; sorrows come on like the darkness of night; you know not what approaches; you are heavy of heart. Ah, then that is a blessed prayer—

"Fast falls the eventide!

The darkness thickens: Lord with me abide."

You can bear any trouble with Christ. No adversities shall hurt you, no afflictions shall grieve your spirit if He be with you. Pray, therefore, this prayer, and no longer fear as you enter into the cloud.

Or it may be that some of you are falling into depression of spirit through the loss of the light of God's countenance; you are not as joyful a Christian as you used to be; the high felicities of your spirit have burned down, and all is dim. Now is the time to say, "Lord, abide with me. If I have no joy, still let me have Thyself." It is a blessed thing when a believer does not set his affection so much upon the joy of the Lord as upon the Lord of His joy; when he says not only, "Lord, I will rejoice in Thee, while Thou dost smile," but cries with Job, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." It was a beautiful expression of David, who often asked the Lord to shine upon him, when he said, "In the shadow of Thy wings will I rejoice." As much as to say—if I have no light from God's face, I will be glad to be hidden beneath His wing. Abide with me, then, even if my reason almost fails me, and my darkened soul dreads a yet more tremendous night. Abide with me, O Lord, even should my sorrow seal my eyes in death.

"Abide with me" is a blessed prayer for those believers who are getting aged. With them it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. Now should they cry, "Abide with me." Then will you sweetly go to your chamber and fall into your last, most blessed sleep, and obtain the fulfilment of your prayer that you may be forever with the Lord.

I have used the text in this way because everybody has used it so, but I believe that these disciples meant it in quite another sense. They used the argument to detain Christ because it was evening; for His sake, because the night was coming on, and they could not think of His being out in it. They knew how heavy the Eastern dews are, and so they pressed Him with this: "Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." Let us each one use that argument with our Lord even now: Lord, the world has no entertainment for Thee; unbelieving hearts give Thee no shelter; the self-righteous repel Thee from their doors; the worldly see no beauty in thee; carnal hearts refuse Thee; every house is locked against Thee, therefore come in and abide with me. Here is lodging for Thee; come in, Thou blessed one, and stay with me. If Thou lackest shelter in king's palaces, abide with me; if there is no room for Thee in the inn, yet come in hither and find Thyself at home, for I shall count myself greatly honored by receiving Thee. Therefore, dear Master, abide with me.

Another form of the plea is this. The ages are growing old and dark. What a plea that is for the church to put up now, for the coming of her Lord. O Lord, it is toward evening, it is nearly nineteen hundred years ago since Thou didst ascend, and still the world lieth in the wicked one; Lord, come to Thy church, come and abide with her, for as the world grows old, good Master, a chill night comes on, and the love of many waxes cold, and there be some that turn aside who once ran well. Dire evils walk abroad in the dark, and blasphemy and rebuke are rife. Good Master, come unto Thy church, and dwell in her, and find there Thy home.

And the night of all nights is coming on, even the end of the world. We know not when, but we know we are getting nearer to it every day. Earth's day is far spent; her day of mercy comes toward its eventide, and the night draws on, therefore, Master, come and abide with us, that we may win the world for Thee. Come, come that we may convert the heathen to Thy cross, and that Thou mayest have them for Thine inheritance,

In the Romish Church there is a chant which they use from Easter to the day of Ascension, and though I care nothing for liturgies or anything of the sort, yet it is certainly a suggestive canticle. The first line of the chant is,

"Abide with us: Hallelujah."

And the next is,

"For it is toward evening, and the day is far spent: Hallelujah."

With that I close. May we use that argument well, until our Lord shall in very deed abide with us.

Ancestry, Conversion, and Marriage—First Experiences of the Battle-Field—Qualifies Herself to Become a Foreign Missionary—Her Mission and School Work at Philippopolis.

MRS. ANNA V. MUMFORD, whose work as an American missionary in Bulgaria is well known, and whose portrait appears on page 444, is the daughter of an English gentleman, who was a descendant of the Earl of Dartmouth. He lost his fortune by the bankruptcy of others, and emigrated to the United States. Anna was born near Rochester, N. Y. When she was seven years of age her mother died; and her father being in indigent circumstances she was adopted by a Christian gentleman and lady, named Crampton, who gave her a good education. Her conversion occurred at the age of thirteen. Although of a very retiring disposition, she gave early promise of usefulness, and spent her time in teaching until her marriage with Colonel Mumford, in 1858.

Three years subsequent to this, the war broke out, and Colonel Mumford was severely wounded at Bull Run, and taken to the hospital at Alexandria, Va. Here his devoted wife took her first lessons in caring for the sick and wounded, in her loving care of him during many wearisome nights of pain and weakness. As he became better, she ministered to the wants of the suffering and wounded around her, until at length she was regarded in the hospital as a minister of mercy and blessing.

In the year 1866, Colonel Mumford was killed by a sharpshooter at Petersburg, Virginia. He was taken to Pennsylvania to be interred; and just as the remains of Colonel Mumford reached home, his only son, two years of age, expired in the arms of his mother. Bereft of husband and child at one stroke, the suffering which followed is difficult to describe. The mother's desire was that she, too, might pass away, and thus escape her great sorrow; but this the Lord did not permit. She at length felt that God was calling her to work in His vineyard, and the all-absorbing inquiry occupied her heart, What can I do for the kingdom and glory of Christ?

In order to complete her preparation for any work to which she might be called, she entered Oberlin College, where she graduated in 1871. While there she received a great baptism of the Holy Spirit. Her light shone before the pupils and the community and she was recommended to the American Board of Foreign Missions as a missionary. She was accepted, and sent to Bulgaria, where she labored with great success for five years. As an instance of the work then accomplished, it may be stated that in one revival in her school at Samakov, every one of her pupils was brought to the Saviour.

In the summer of 1876, she returned to America to recuperate her overtaxed energies. While there she learned with much pain that it was the intention of the Board to send her to the South Sea Islands. But the suffering women of Bulgaria (for in that country women are regarded as an inferior class of beings) were ever uppermost in her mind. She longed to return to her former field of labor, having with great pains acquired the language, and gained the confidence of the people, and she was in constant reception of letters from former pupils and others entreating her to return. After earnest prayer for divine guidance, she finally concluded to go back to Bulgaria, and that she might be the more free to teach, and live out fully her ideal of the Christian life, she decided to go out as the apostles did, "without purse or scrip," trusting alone in the living God and His precious promises, "that her bread should be given, and her water should be sure."

It was at this time that the war broke out between Russia and Turkey. When Mrs. Mumford reached London, on her way to Bulgaria, her friends earnestly urged her not to hazard her life in a country disorganized by the demon of war. She invariably felt, however, that though the prospect was dark, and the future no one could tell, yet she was impressed that God called her to hasten on, and that if the war should rage she would be all the more needed to minister to the sick and dying, and bind up broken and sorrowing hearts.

She reached Philippopolis (a city of about fifty thousand inhabitants, where, at that time, there was no other missionary) in June, 1877. Soon afterward the Russian cavalry crossed the Balkan Mountains, and marched southward as far as Eskazara. Here they were met and driven back by the Turks under the command of Sulieman Pasha, who exasperated by the sympathy that the people of Eskazara had shown for the Russians, commanded that the male inhabitants should be put to death and the city burned. Most of the women and children fled to Philippopolis for protection, and it was among these suffering refugees that Mrs. Mumford labored, ministering to all their bodily wants, and telling them the "old, old story of Jesus and His love." In the midst of the most exciting and heartrending scenes, this heroic woman remained at the post of duty, and won all hearts, high and low alike, by her self-sacrificing spirit, and her noble efforts to alleviate the suffering and sorrows of those who crowded around her.

At the close of the war, when the refugees had returned to their homes to try to begin life anew, Mrs. Mumford asked the Lord for other work. Speaking of this period she says: "Immediately we received application for some Bulgarian girls to enter our family to learn to read. We asked the Lord to show His will by sending the money to feed them; and the next post brought us the news that the money was on the way. In this manner we began a boarding-school to educate missionary workers, who promise when they enter, to use all their powers when they shall finish their course, to make known the riches of Christ in 'the regions beyond, and to those who sit in darkness.' The work thus commenced continues to progress. A lady from America (Miss Eunice Knapp) has since joined Mrs. Mumford to assist her in her onerous labors. Her pupils are largely the daughters of those who have lost everything in the war, and are consequently unable to remunerate her. If the history of these girls was written it would be more thrilling than any romance. The fathers of some of them were killed, and the children were left orphans and penniless.

There would be a larger number of paying scholars but for the Greek Bishop, who prohibits his church from patronizing the school unless his priests are admitted as catechists, which Mrs. Mumford refuses to do; therefore, she depends upon God, through His people in America and England, for means to carry forward the work.

In addition to the school, and the labors in connection with it, every effort is used to extend the Gospel; and a dispensary has also been established which gives out medicine and advice to many poor people in the city and villages round about. Thus the work has gone on by faith and prayer, aid being asked from none but God; and Mrs. Mumford testifies to the praise of His grace, "We have lacked nothing," God having hitherto supplied her constantly increasing need.

THE LATE REV. DR. HANNA.

THE Rev. William Hanna, D.D., whose portrait appears on this page, was the son-in-law and biographer of Dr. Chalmers, one of the heroes of the Disruption in the Scottish Church in 1843, and for many years the colleague of Dr. Guthrie. He has recently passed away, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. Dr. Hanna withdrew from the pastorate of Free St. John's, Edinburgh, as far back as 1868, since which time he has devoted himself to literary pursuits, residing for the most part either in the Isle of Wight or on the Continent of Europe. It was when returning a short time ago from Ventnor to Edinburgh, and while making a brief stay in London, that Dr. Hanna was seized with paralysis. From this shock he never rallied, and calmly breathed his last on Wednesday, May 31st.

Dr. Hanna was a son of Professor Hanna, of Belfast, Ireland, in which city he first saw the light in the year 1808. After passing through Glasgow University, young Hanna studied divinity under Dr. Chalmers, who is said to have been quick to recognize the powers of his pupil. In 1835, having been licensed to preach the Gospel, he was presented by the Crown to the living of East Kilbride, Lanarkshire; and two years later he removed to Skirling. About this time Dr. Hanna married Agnes, eldest daughter of Dr. Chalmers. Being thus brought into close relationship with the founder of the Free Church, it was only natural that Dr. Hanna should have quitted the Established Church with so many of his brethren at the Disruption about eight years later. Nearly the whole of the congregation at Skirling followed his example and cast in their lot with the Free Church, and to that congregation he continued to minister during the succeeding six years. He was instrumental in turning many from sin to righteousness, the blessing of God resting richly upon his labors.

At the death of Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Hanna removed to Edinburgh to prepare the life of his illustrious father-in-law, which work was in due time published in four volumes, and met with a well-deserved popularity. Dr. Hanna subsequently became colleague to Dr. Guthrie in the pastorate of Free St. John's, a post he occupied for a period of fifteen years.

In addition to his "Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers," Dr. Hanna published several works, which were widely circulated, including, "Martyrs of the Scottish Reformation," "Wycliffe and the Huguenots," "The Earlier Years of our Lord," "The Ministry in Galilee," "The Close of the Ministry," "The Passion Week," "The Last Day of Our Lord's Passion," and "The Resurrection of the Dead." Some of these volumes are characterized by great beauty, and have passed through several large editions.

Dr. Hanna's body was conveyed from London to Edinburgh, where the interment took place at the Grange Cemetery, in the presence of a considerable company, including members of both Assemblies.

A BRAVE HEROINE.

MISS KATE SHELLEY, whose portrait appears on this page, is the heroine of a wonderful exploit described some months ago in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She is fifteen years of age. Her presence of mind and her splendid daring saved an express train from an appalling catastrophe on July 13th, 1881. The incident as related by the Ogden, Iowa Reporter, is as follows: Miss Shelley lives near the railroad track with her widowed mother. An accident occurred on the line on the night of July 13th, and she knew that if the express train, which would soon be due, were not warned, every one in it would be killed. Kate took a lantern, and, amid the hurricane of the wind, and incessant glare of the lightning, and peal upon peal of deafening thunder, left her home and started for the railway line. Her light soon went out, but she felt her way through the woods, resolving to walk to Moingona, a mile off, where there was a telegraph station. But between the point where she was and Moingona was the Des Moines River, and to cross this she must pass over the railroad bridge, fifty feet above the rushing waters. She must cross this bridge, 400 feet long, with nothing but the ties and rails, the wind blowing a gale, and the foaming, seething, muddy waters beneath.

Not one man in a hundred but would have shrunk from such a task. But this brave girl gathered about her her flowing skirts, and on hands and knees crawled over the long, weary bridge. Tie after tie was passed. It was time for the express train to come dashing over the bridge, and to hurl her down to death amid the dark and turbid waters of the roaring, rushing river. The blood from her lacerated knees stained her dress, but she did not falter for a moment. At length she reached the other side, and the remaining half mile she ran as quickly as she was able to the telegraph office. Breathless, and in broken accents, she told her tale of anticipated death and destruction, and fainted in the arms of the bystanders. The telegraph wires were set at work and the express train was stopped in time.

What an example of zeal to save life is here given to those who labor to save it spiritually! All the best and highest qualities of the soul are needed for such an enterprise, and opportunity is frequently furnished for the manifestation of the noblest heroism. But who that is impressed with the value of a human soul, its exposure to eternal ruin, and the price which Christ has paid for its redemption, can hesitate for one moment to imperil even his own life, that the jeopardized may find salvation? The name of Kate Shelley will ever stand associated with deeds of daring and self-sacrificing courage, but they who win souls for Christ "shall shine as the stars in the firmament forever."

OSCAR'S PERIL.

"WELL, Oscar, I am sorry to see you are still reading that pernicious volume. I assure you, it is worse than a waste of time, for the mental and moral injury which you are contracting may prove to be irreparable, both in time and eternity."

The speaker was Raymond Osborne, of Osbornville. He was a man of strong convictions, and as he spoke there was a cadence in his voice which evidently sprang from deep emotion, and for a moment secured the surprised attention of Oscar Osborne, his nephew and heir.

"Pernicious! injury irreparable! time and eternity!" Oscar stammered out. "These are strong terms, uncle; and, pardon me, but there is nothing in this book to afford you justification for their use. Why, dear me, what harm can it do any one to read up these questions, and keep himself acquainted with the latest utterances of science and philosophy, which many Christians believe are the handmaids of religion?"

"Ah, my boy, it's the old talk about 'no harm being done,' the same sense of security, the same pride of intellectual vigor, and withal the same false and specious logic with which I was familiar nearly thirty years ago," replied Raymond Osborne sadly. "God grant that your ingenuousness may not lead you astray. Believe me, the perusal of sentiments subversive of the simplicity of the Gospel of Christ may be followed by bitter results, which in after years you would give all you hold dear to undo."

Oscar Osborne had just returned from Germany, where, for nearly five years, he had studied mathematics, and mental and moral philosophy, and, unhappily, had become impressed with the arrogant pretensions of nineteenth-century neologian-ism, and had imbibed from the teachings of rationalistic instructors a distaste for the Word of God, and a feeling that the needs of the age had transcended its teachings and doctrines.

The knowledge that Oscar had fallen under the influence of these teachers had caused his uncle consternation and sorrow, and there were recalled to his mind dark passages in his own history, when he was not only "without God," but even had the temerity to deny His existence. But God had mercifully driven the infidelity out of him as with a whirlwind; and though, in his recklessness Mr. Osborne maintained a prolonged fight against God, his scepticism was at length superseded by a childlike faith, and his defiant attitude toward the Almighty was exchanged for a humble dependence upon His forgiving love.

Presently, with an air of condescension, the young man rose from the trunk of a fallen tree upon which he had been sitting, closed his book, and linking his arm in that of his uncle, said, "Proceed, sir, let us argue the question; I am quite ready to hear your sermon to the end. You are a little prejudiced by the bigotry of a narrow circle." Indifferent to the sneer, Mr. Osborne quietly said, "I should be very sorry to appear bigoted in your eyes, Oscar, nor do I expect you to be weighted with a wisdom which comes only with experience and after the lapse of years. May God in mercy spare you the payment of the terrible price which has been exacted from me for the wisdom which I am anxious you should possess at a small cost!"

Pursuing the relation of the various stages through which he had passed, from the darkness and unrest of godlessness, to the serenity and safety which spring from simple trust in Christ's atoning blood, Mr. Osborne won the attention of his nephew.

Oscar recognized in the picture his uncle drew of his early days a parallel to his own present condition, and saw with surprise that the theories he prized as novelties in the world of thought, were really old, the mere modernized cast-off garments of the past, and that his uncle had once held and had been forced by the hard logic of facts to discard the very doctrines he was now learning.

When they parted for the night, some hours afterward, Oscar retired to his room with a solemn feeling pervading him of which he had never been conscious before; and instead of seeking to banish his reflections in sleep, he faced his position and environments, and gravely considered the narrative of his uncle's life, until there escaped from his lips, half-involuntarily, but yet from the very core of his being, the cry, "Lord, help me; Lord, save me!"

That night decided his destiny. Though it was several weeks before he could truly say he had the rest of faith, yet the day did dawn which brought heavenly glory into his soul, and gave him to see that Christ was his Saviour. He has since tried to help forward the Kingdom of Christ, and especially devotes himself to the reclamation of young men who are in danger of being spoiled and corrupted through the deceitful and unsatisfying philosophies of the age, and points them to Him who is both "the power and the wisdom of God," as their Redeemer and Friend.

If young men realized that scientific scepticism is only a revival of an old and exploded emanation of intellectual arrogance, they would be far less likely to fall under the spell of its influence.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

An Emigration Scheme.

AN empty room, swept clean of everything which made it a living habitation. The sunshine fell in pencils of colored light upon the bare walls and uncarpeted floor. It bore no trace of any occupant; yet to him it seemed but yesterday that he had been in here, listening to the low tones of Felicitas's sweet voice, and gazing with silent pride on her beautiful face. There had been unmeasured passion and ambition in his love for her, which had fatally changed his whole life. But he knew now that he had failed in winning her love, and in making her happy; and the secret dissatisfaction she had felt in her ill considered marriage had been fatal both to her and to him. The restless eagerness it had developed in him to gain a position that could content her, had been a seed of worldliness which had borne deadly fruit.

He opened the casement, and looked out on the familiar landscape, on which her eyes had so often rested; eyes that were closed forever. The past, so keenly present to him at this moment, was in reality altogether dead and buried. She had ceased to be his wife years ago, when she had accepted the sacrifice he proposed to her of his very existence. That old life was blotted out; and he had no right to mourn openly for the dead who was being laid in the grave of her fathers at this hour. His children were counting themselves orphans, and it was not in his power to comfort them.

He knelt down at the open window, and rested his bowed head on the window-sill. The empty room behind him was but a symbol of his own empty lot; swept clean of all its affections and aspirations. Two-thirds of his term of years were already spent, and he found himself bereft and dispossessed of all that makes life worth having; all except the power of service. Even at this late hour a voice within him called to him, "Go, work to-day in my vineyard." It was not too late to serve God, who had forgiven him, and man, whom he had wronged. There was time to make some atonement; to work out some redemption for his fellow-men.

To Roland Sefton had arisen a vision of a public and honorable career, cheered on by the applause of men, and crowned with popularity and renown for all that he might achieve. But Jean Merle must toil in silence and difficulty, amid rebuffs and discouragements, and do humble service, which would remain unrecognized and unthanked. Yet there was work to do, if it were no more than cheering the last days of an old man, or teaching a class of the most ignorant of his townfolk in a night-school.

He rose from his knees after a while, and left the room, closing the door as softly as he had been used to do when afraid of any noise vexing Felicity. It seemed to him like the closing up of the vault where she was buried. She was gone from him forever; and there was nothing left but to forget the past, if that were possible.

As he went lingeringly down the staircase, which would henceforth be trodden seldom if ever by him, he heard the ringing of the house-bell, which announced the return of Mr. Clifford, and of Felix and Hilda, who were coming to stay the night in their old home, before returning to London on the morrow. He hastened down to open the door, and help them to alight from their carriage. It was the first time he had been thus brought into close contact with them; but this must happen often in the future, and he must learn to meet them as strangers, and to be looked upon by them as little more than a hired servant.

But the sight of Hilda's sad young face, and the expression of deep grief that Felix wore, tried him sorely. What would he not have given to be able to take this girl into his arms, and soothe her, and to comfort his son with comfort none but a father can give? He stood outside the sphere of their sorrows, looking on them with the eyes of a stranger; and the pain of seeing them so near, yet so far away from him, was unutterable. The time might come when Jean Merle could see them, and talk with them calmly, as a friend, ready to serve them to the utmost of his power. But so long as they were mourning bitterly for their mother, and could not conceal the sharpness of their grief, the sight of them was a torture to him.

Several months passed away, bringing no visitor to Riversborough except Phebe, who came down two or three times to see Mr. Clifford, whose favorite she was. But Phebe never spoke of the past to Jean Merle. Since they had determined what to do, it seemed wisest to her not to look back so as to embitter the present. Jean Merle was gradually gaining a footing in the town as Mr. Clifford's representative, and was in many ways filling a post very few could fill.

Now and then some of the elder townsmen, who had been contemporary with Roland Sefton, remarked upon the resemblance between Jean Merle and their old comrade; but this was satisfactorily accounted for by his relationship to Madame Sefton; for Roland, they said, had always had a good deal of the foreigner about him, much more than this quiet, melancholy, self-effacing man, who never pushed himself forward, or courted attention, yet was always ready with a good, sound, shrewd opinion, if he was asked for it. It had been a lucky thing for old Clifford that such a man had been found to take care of him and his affairs in his extreme old age.

Felix had gone back to his curacy under Canon Pascal, in the parish where he had spent his boyhood, and where he was safe against any attack upon his father's memory. But, in spite of being able to see Alice every day, and of enjoying Canon Pascal's constant companionship, he was ill at ease; and Phebe was dissatisfied. This was exactly the life Felicity had dreaded for him; an easy, half-occupied life in a small parish, where there was little active employment for either mind or body. The thought of it troubled and haunted Phebe.

Felix, with his magnificent physical strength and active energy, and the strong bent to heroic effort and Christian devotion given to him in his earliest years was thrown away in this tranquil English village, where there was clearly no scope for heroism. How was it that Canon Pascal could not see it? His curacy was a post to be occupied by some feeble man than Felix; a man whose powers were only equal to the quiet work of carrying on the labors begun by his rector. Besides, Felix would have recovered sooner from the shock of his mother's sudden death, if his time and faculties had been more fully occupied. She must give words to her discontent, and urge Canon Pascal to banish him from a spot where he was leading too idle a life.

Canon Pascal had been in residence at Westminster for some weeks, and was about to return to his rectory, when Phebe went down to the Abbey one day, bent upon putting her decision into action. The bitterness of the early spring had come again, and strong easterly gales were steadily blowing day after day, bringing disease and death to those who were feeble and ailing; yet not more surely than the winter fogs had done. As Phebe passed through the Abbey on her way to his house in the cloisters, she saw Canon Pascal standing still, with his head thrown back, and his eyes uplifted to the noble arches supporting the roof. He did not notice her until her clear, pleasant voice addressed him.

"Ah! Phebe!" he exclaimed, a swift smile transforming his grave, marked face; "my dear, I was just asking myself how I could bear to bid farewell to all this."

He glanced round him with an expression of unutterable love and pride, and of deep regret; and as he paced down the long aisle he lingered as if every step he took was full of pain.

"Bid farewell to it!" repeated Phebe; "but why?"

"For a series of whys," he answered. "First and foremost, because the doctors tell me, and I believe it, that my dear wife's days are numbered if she stays another year in this climate. All our days are numbered by God, I know; but man can number them also if he pleases, and make the sum of them longer or shorter by his obedience or disobedience. Secondly, Phebe, our sons have gone on before us as pioneers, and they send us piteous accounts of the spiritual needs of the colonists and the native populations out yonder. I preach often on the evils of over-population, and its danger to our country; and I prescribe emigration to most of the young people I come across. Why should not I, even I, take up the standard and cry 'Follow me!'"

"We should leave England with sad hearts, it is true; but for her good, and for the good of unborn generations who shall create a second England under other skies. And last, but not altogether least, the colonial bishopric is vacant, and has been offered to me. If I accept it I shall save the life most precious to me, and find another home in the midst of my children and grandchildren."

"And Felix?" cried Phebe.

"What could be better for Felix than to come with us?" he asked; "there he will meet with the work he was born for; the work he is fretting his soul for. He will be at last a gallant soldier of the Cross, with no dread of his father's sin rising up against him. And we could never part with Alice; her mother and I."

"Oh, yes!" she answered, with tears standing in her eyes; "Felix must go with you."

"And Hilda too," he went on; "for what would become of Hilda alone here, with her only brother settled at the antipodes? We shall need for this Phebe Marlowe's influence with old Mr. Clifford, who might prevent his ward from quitting England. I am counting also on Phebe herself as my pearl of deaconesses; with no vow to bind her, if the happier and fuller life of marriage opened before her. Still, to secure these benefits, I must give up all this."

He paused for a minute or two looking back up the narrow side aisle; and then, as if he could not tear himself away, he retraced his steps slowly and lingeringly; and Phebe caught the glistening of tears in his eyes.

"Never to see it again!" he murmured; "or if I see it, not to belong to it! To have no more right here than any other stranger! It feels like a home to me, dear Phebe. I have had solemn glimpses of God here, as if it were indeed the gate of heaven. To the last hour of my life, wherever I go, my soul will cleave to these walls. But I shall give it up."

"Yes," she said, sighing; "but there is no bitterness of repentance to you in giving it up."

"How sadly you spoke that!" he went on; "as if a woman like you could know the bitterness of repentance. You have only looked at it through other men's eyes. Yes, we shall go. Felix, and Hilda, and you, are free to leave Mr. Clifford now he is so admirably cared for by this Jean Merle. I like all that I hear of him, though I never saw him; surely it was a blessing from God that Madame Sefton's poor kinsman was brought to the old man. Could we not leave him safely in Merle's charge?"

"Quite safely," she answered.

"I have a scheme for a new settlement in my head," he continued; "a settlement of our own, and we will invite emigrants to it. I can reckon on a few who will joyfully follow us; and it will not seem a strange land if we carry those whom we love with us. This hour even I have made up my mind to accept the bishopric. Go on, dear Phebe, and tell my wife. I must stay here alone a little longer."

But Phebe did not hasten with these tidings through the cloisters. She walked to and fro pondering over them, and finding in them a solution of many difficulties. For Felix it would be well; and Hilda, too, what could be better or happier for her than to go with those who looked upon her as a daughter? There was little to keep them in England; she could not refuse to let them go.

But herself? The strong strain of faithfulness in Phebe's nature knitted her as closely with the past as with the present; and with some touch of a pathetic clinging to the past, which the present cannot possess, she could not separate herself from it. The little home where she was born, with the wide moors encircling it, was as dear to her as the Abbey was to Canon Pascal. If she cut herself altogether adrift from it, and all the subtly woven web of memories belonging to it, she fancied she might pine away of home sickness in a distant land. There was Mr. Clifford, too, who depended so utterly upon her promise to be near him when he was dying; and Jean Merle, whose terrible secret she shared, and would be the only one to share with him, when Mr. Clifford was gone. How was it possible to separate herself from these two?

Yet it was even more difficult than Phebe anticipated to resist the urgent entreaties of Felix and Hilda. Her devotion to them in the past had made them feel secure of its continuance; and to quit England, leaving her behind, seemed impossible. But Mr. Clifford's reiterated supplications that she would not forsake him in his old age, drew her as powerfully the other way. Scarcely a day passed without a few lines reaching her, written by his own feeble and shaking hand, beseeching and demanding of her a solemn promise to stay in England as long as he lived.

Jean Merle said nothing, even when she went down to visit them, urged by Canon Pascal to set before Mr. Clifford the strong reasons there were for her to accompany the party of emigrants; but Phebe knew that Jean Merle's life, with its unshared memories and secrets, would be still more dreary if she went away. After she had seen these two she wavered no more.

It was a larger party of emigrants than any one had foreseen; for it was no sooner known that Canon Pascal was leaving England as a colonial bishop, than many men and women came forward anxious to go out and found new homes under his auspices. He was a well-known advocate of emigration; and it was rightly deemed a singular advantage to have him as a leader, as well as their spiritual chief. Canon Pascal threw himself into the movement with ardor; and the five months elapsing before he set sail were filled with incessant claims upon his time and thought; while all about him were drawn into the strong current of his work.

Phebe was occupied from early morning till late at night; and a few hours of deep sleep, which gave her no time for thinking of her own future, was all the rest she could command. Even Felix, who had scarcely shaken off the depression caused by his mother's sudden death, found a fresh fountain-head of energy and gladness, in sharing Canon Pascal's new career, and in the immediate prospect of marrying Alice.

BLIND BARTIMEUS.

S.S. Lesson for July 23, Mark 10: 46-52. Golden Texts, Ps. 119: 18; Isa. 35: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Light of the World—His Approaching Suffering—Readiness to Help—Blind and a Beggar—Those who Hinder—Incident of a London Child—Christ's Response—The Garment Cast Aside—The Blind Man's Implicit Confidence—In the Will and Power of the Saviour—The Miracle Worked.

"I AM the Light of the world," said our blessed Master (John 8: 12; 9: 5), and again, "I am come a Light into the world, that whosoever believeth in Me should not abide in darkness" (John 12: 46). Blessed be God, His power is the same to disperse spiritual and physical blindness. When He quoted the prophecy of His own anointing by the Spirit of the Lord for His ministry (Isa. 61: 1, 2), He added, "He hath anointed Me to preach . . . recovering of sight to the blind" (Luke 4: 18), and His commission to Saul of Tarsus, when He sent him to the people and to the Gentiles was, "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light" (Acts 26: 18).

Why should lost souls remain in darkness when God is present among us, God who "is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (1 John 1: 5)? Why should there be any darkness in the experience of any of God's children, when Jesus is come a Light into the world that they who believe on Him

"SHOULD NOT ABIDE IN DARKNESS?"

Why should they who are physically blind remain so, when He who was anointed to preach and to work "recovering of sight to the blind" is with us "always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28: 20). The Lord our God bless this little paper to bring those who are in darkness in contact with the Life, "The Light of men" (John 1: 4).

Our beloved Lord was on the way to Jerusalem, "knowing all things that should come upon Him;" His disciples were with Him and "a great number of people." Had He considered Himself, it would have been natural that at this time, immediately before His sufferings, He should desire to be alone, in preparation for that which was to come. But Jesus in His humanity was as a true trusting child; He knew that His Father could not but give strength at the time for all which He might call Him to endure, and He continued to be as much at the disposal of those around Him as though Gethsemane and the cross were years distant.

As they left Jericho, Blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the highway side begging. He had no higher vocation in life than to crave the often grudged alms of those who might commiserate him. It was a deplorable condition, but O how many poor blind ones in our day have to experience the most mortifying humiliation from those who look upon them as useless, and as a burden upon them! Truly the Lord has raised up those who have founded institutions where the poor blind can be taught a way of reading His blessed Word, and of gaining their own living. This is a step in the right direction, and many blind, we may believe, have had the eyes of their understanding opened to see Jesus and to know the pardon of their sins through His blood.

But Bartimeus was evidently aware of His healing power. "And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." This is all which Jesus waits for; an appeal which puts the whole case for soul or body in His hands, an abandonment of all to Him. "Many charged him that he should hold his peace." To this day we know it is the case that when a sinner begins to confess that he throws himself upon the mercy of God, his old companions will do all they can to hinder him. When a blind person, or one with diseased eyes, afflicted with inflammation, cataract, or paralysis of the optic nerve, comes boldly forward to trust his case avowedly into the hands of Jesus, the majority of those who know him think he is fanatical or excited, tell him he is acting in self-will, and so throw every hindrance in the way of his faith. O reader, if you have blind friends or those with diseased eyes, would you keep them from Jesus if He were among us now as in the days of His flesh? Would you think it wrong or fanatical for your blind relation to ask you to lead Him to Jesus, who came to open the eyes of the blind? Tell him, then, that Jesus is not changed, that He is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever;" for God's sake do not hinder him. In the early part of 1882 of eleven, in London, had been for five years unable to use her eyes. Her parents had taken her during this time to hospitals and eye institutions, but the poor eyes remained almost sightless. At last they asked the prayers of believing Christians. One day soon after this she said to her parents, "I must not continue this eye lotion, we ought to obey God rather than men." It was discontinued, and the next morning she ran to her mother with a paper she had picked up, and said, "See, mother, I can read quite well, I can see anything;" and so it was, the Lord had recovered her sight, and the next week, at Dr. Boardman's meeting, she told in a simple, child-like way, in answer to questions put to her, that which the Lord had done for her.

"Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called." One cry of distress, one direct appeal to Him was a stronger claim than that of the multitude around Him. Reader, are you in darkness, not knowing what step to take, whether it be about your own spiritual experience, your family, your business, your reputation, or whether it be physical blindness? God has "laid help on One that is mighty," and you cannot make a real appeal to God, placing the matter in His hands, without making Him immediately responsible. "Jesus stood still," and commanded him to be called, gave His attention and took the matter in hand. You, dear reader, may feel nothing, but if you have trusted Him, be sure that according to your faith it shall be unto you. "They call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise, He calleth thee."

Reader, if you are making any real appeal to God for soul or body, or both; if you are really abandoning all other way of help; if you are willing that the Lord shall have His whole will done in you, then, in the name of my Lord, I say these words to you, "Be of good comfort, rise, He calleth thee." This is as much as to say the thing is done, for it is never making an experiment to trust Jesus. Bartimeus understood this. Once knowing that his case was undertaken, nothing could hinder him; guided by the sound of Jesus' voice he sprang forward, casting away his garment, and came to Jesus. Had he been uncertain about his cure he would have considered that whatever he did, he must take care of that garment; for how could he, a blind man, find it again if it were lost, and even were it restored him it would be torn by the feet of the crowd. But such considerations were far from him;

HE COUNTED ON HIS RESTORATION, and with eyes to see he could soon do work enough to buy another. Now, my reader, in putting your case into the hands of God, are you keeping in reserve something to do, something to fall back upon, in case Jesus fails you? If so, you are hindering Him. He cannot do the work because of your unbelief (Matt. 13: 58). Until you are fully persuaded that what you ask Him is completely in accordance with His will there will be no faith in your petition, and until there is faith, you will be making provision for the rejection of your prayer instead of its acceptance, and God, who knoweth all hearts, will see that it is so.

Now, are you coming to the Lord for deliverance from the power and the taint of sin? and do you fully believe that He undertakes to do this work for and in you? Then allow no such suggestion as that you may again entertain those thoughts and desires from which you believe He delivers you, for this is counting upon His failing you. If such suggestions arise, turn them over instantly to Him, and He will deal with them, for you cannot. If friends, prejudices, customs, plans, or any other entanglements stand in the way, cast them aside, as Bartimeus did his garment, let nothing come between you and Jesus.

When the blind man was come to Jesus, and he knew that no man stood between them, no distance separated them, that He and the mighty Healer were then close to, perhaps touching one another, Jesus said unto him, "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" O mighty possibilities which lie before a man who can believe fully in his God! Jesus places Himself at his disposal! Can anything be impossible to Him? Lord educate our faith! The blind man's request was quickly made, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." He did not say, "If it be Thy will" for that would have been unbelief in the words of Jesus, "What wilt thou?" How often we mistake about this, and hide our miserable, culpable unbelief, under the pretext of not knowing the will of God, and then we are guilty of casting the consequences of unanswered prayers on God, instead of taking the blame upon ourselves. Especially have we been taught unbelief with regard to sanctification and healing, and most of us have too well learned the lesson. God's word says, "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and may your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is He that calleth you,

WHO WILL ALSO DO IT?"

(1 Thess. 5: 23, 24. Rev. Ver.). Will also do what? Will sanctify us wholly, i.e., make us completely holy, fully sanctified, kept from sinning, made and kept clean, "whiter than snow" as regards the soul, and "entire" as regards spirit, soul, and body. This is the will of God for each one of us, and to ask Him to make us holy, or to heal our bodies if it be His will, is to doubt whether He means what He says. Let us rather say, "Lord sanctify me wholly, and let my spirit, soul, and body be preserved entire because it is Thy will."

"And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight." And went his way? No, he had no other way but one, and that was the way Jesus would go; "he followed Jesus in the way." It was the instinct of love and gratitude, it was the only possible course for him, to follow Jesus in the way. And if you, my reader, claim and accept spiritual or physical healing or both at the hands of Jesus, you will experience a compelling power which claims you for the service of Jesus. You will be fitted for it as never before, for you will have songs of victory, and conquest, and glory to sing; you will "tell of all His wondrous works." The Lord our God bring you into close contact with Himself, that you may experience for yourself the mighty exhaustless fulness of His great salvation. Our golden text for England and America beautifully unite the spiritual and bodily healing of our Lord. "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law." "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped." Lord fulfil them both in us. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Reliable Intelligence of the Proceedings of the Conference of European Powers in session at Constantinople is not published. Indications, however, of the course pursued by the diplomats are not wanting. The latest rumor is that Turkey has been invited under certain conditions to intervene in Egypt with the view of suppressing Arabi Pacha and restoring order. The London Times publishes a despatch from its correspondent stating that a formal invitation of the Powers to the Sultan to intervene in Egypt was delivered on Monday, and a reply asked for by Wednesday. If the Porte refuses or seems afraid to accept, 25,000 men, with 15,000 in reserve, will be concentrated by the intervening Powers. The army will land at Aboukir, and will be divided into two parts. One will march on Alexandria and be supported by the fleet, which will open fire as soon as the army is landed. The other portion will cross the dry lake of Aboukir to Kafr Devar and seize the railway at Damanhour, Arabi Pacha's only means of retreat, and will thus force him to either fight or yield. The Sultan, in conversation, complained of the want of friendship shown him by England in the unjust, suspicious, and erroneous interpretations placed on all his actions. Prince Bismarck is said to be the adviser on whom the Sultan relies, believing that Germany having no interests at stake in Egypt gives disinterested advice.

The Bombardment of Alexandria by the British ships in the harbor has been hourly expected during the past week. Admiral Seymour, who commands the fleet, complained to the Governor of Alexandria regarding the placing of two large guns in a position threatening the fleets, and the explanations offered were deemed unsatisfactory. Admiral Seymour subsequently intimated that if the works were not stopped he would promptly take measures to stop them. A formal ultimatum was afterward forwarded stating that if the erection of the fortifications was not immediately discontinued the British ships would open fire forthwith. Toulba Pacha, commander of the garrison, replying to the ultimatum, assured Admiral Seymour that no such hostile act as he apprehends had been or will be undertaken. He concluded with an appeal to Admiral Seymour's well known humanity. The answer of Arabi Pacha did not satisfy Admiral Seymour, who sent out a call on all the English warships. The Consul of the United States, with the other consuls, held a conference to discuss the best means of inducing Arabi Pacha to send a more conciliatory reply to the British Admiral. All the Americans in Alexandria except General Stone and the consul have sought safety afloat. Arabi Bey has expressed the hope that America would force England to act fairly by the national party. It is believed that should the squadron bombard the forts a prolonged resistance would be made. If this should prove unavailing the troops would retire, leaving the European quarter of the town to be sacked by the populace.

The Safety of the Suez Canal, which now forms so prominent a subject of debate in European cabinets, is of serious concern to England above all other Powers. A glance at the map will show that the canal which now connects the Mediterranean Sea with the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean is of inestimable advantage to England in her intercourse with her possessions in India. If that canal were closed, her ships would have to sail, as they did previous to the construction of the canal, southward off the west coast of Africa, crossing the equator to the Cape of Good Hope; thence sailing northward off the east coast of Africa to India. The canal was opened in 1869, and its advantages were quickly recognized. Every year since that date the number of vessels passing through it has increased, as also has the quantity of freight. The following are the statistics of the respective years: In 1870, 490 ships, of an aggregate tonnage of 486,000 tons; in 1879, 1470 ships, tonnage 3,236,000 tons; in 1880, 2026 ships, tonnage 4,344,000 tons; in 1881, 2727 ships, tonnage 5,794,000 tons. Last year the increase of traffic over the previous year was 34 per cent. The profits of the enterprise have been enormous. Last year the receipts amounted to a sum which, after paying all expenses and adding five per cent. to the reserve fund, paid fourteen per cent to the shareholders. Of these ships 78 or 79 per cent. are under the English flag.

Another Cowardly Murder has Been Committed in Ireland. A man named Kenny, a dockyard laborer, suspected by the Land League, apparently without cause, of having given information to the police, was shot in Dublin on July 4th. He had been advised not to venture out after sunset, but on Tuesday night he went out for a short walk, and his dead body was found in less than an hour after he left his home. His overcoat was singed, which showed that the shots had been fired in close proximity to him. There were four bullet wounds—one in the centre of the back, two on the back of the head and another on the left side. There were also seven stab wounds, as if from a knife, in the region of the heart. The wounds being on the back indicate that it was a murder of the Land League type. Placards offering $100,000 reward for the discovery of the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish were posted in Ireland last week but without result.

An Attempt to Frustrate the Design of the Arrears Bill, which Mr. Gladstone has introduced to relieve the Irish tenants, has been made by a Conservative member of Parliament. He proposes to instruct the courts when estimating the assets of an embarrassed tenant to include the value of his tenant right, which it would be easy by an organized scheme to raise to a fictitious sum, thus excluding him from the benefits of the new law. The effect of the amendment is described by an American correspondent as being "to compel the court to sell out the tenant and actually reduce him to beggary before permitting him to obtain the advantages of the Arrears Bill." Should the government be unwise enough to accept this principle the Arrears Bill will prove a greater failure than the Land Bill, and will probably become an additional source of disorder instead of a healing measure.

The Expulsion of Sixteen Irish Members of Parliament on July 1st, was a consequence of their persistent opposition to the Repression Bill. During the whole of the previous night relays of members had maintained the conflict over the bill. The House sat for nineteen hours, during which division followed division on the obstructive tactics which prevailed during former sessions. The chairman in the absence of the Speaker then reported sixteen members, among whom were Messrs. Parnell, Mc Carthy, O'Donnell, and Biggar, as guilty of obstruction and the House voted to suspend them. Four of the sixteen had been absent during the sitting, but they were expelled with the others. Mr. O'Donnell, who was one of the innocent members, lost his temper when he heard his name included in the list and he addressed an insulting remark to the chairman. He was punished by suspension for two weeks. The Irish members then held a meeting at which the following resolution was passed:

"We hereby resolve to take no further part in the proceedings of the Committee upon the Coercion Bill, and we cast upon the Government the sole responsibility for the bill, which has been urged through the House by a course of violence and subterfuge, and which when passed into a law will be devoid of moral force and will not be a constitutional act of Parliament."

The Sudden Death of General Skobelev occurred in Moscow on July 7th. It will be remembered that this Russian general only a few months ago agitated all Europe by certain speeches delivered in Paris, advocating a Slav war and assuring the Slav students that if an outbreak should occur Russia would protect and support them. General Skobelev was only thirty-seven years old when he died, yet his life had been a very eventful one. He served in the Khivan Campaign on the staff of General Kaufmann, in which he displayed brilliant skill and reckless daring. On one occasion with a troop of 150 Cossacks he attacked and routed a wing of the enemy in which there were 7000 men. He took a prominent part in the war against Turkey and was promoted to a generalship. In the Turkish as in the Khivan Campaign he was remarkable for his reckless daring, and in more than one battle he led charges which were regarded as a "forlorn hope." Early in 1880 General Skobelev was placed in command of an expedition against the hostile Tekke Turcomans in Central Asia, in which campaign he won fresh laurels. When he was sent to take Geok Tepe and subdue the Tekkes many shook their heads and predicted that his impetuosity would be his ruin. So far from that being the case he displayed caution and sagacity with which he had not been credited, and on January 24th, 1881, the Russian colors floated over the city. He was on a visit to Moscow when he died. He walked about the city all day making calls, and on the way back to his hotel he fell down dead. The cause assigned for his sudden seizure is heart disease, but rumors of foul play are in circulation and will be investigated.

The Bill for the Repression of Crime in Ire-land passed the British House of Commons on July 7th, and was sent to the House of Lords, where it immediately passed its first reading. Its final debate in the Commons was signalized by a most unexpected occurrence. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues suffered a humiliating defeat. They had promised the Irish members to introduce an important amendment to the bill, limiting the right of search to the daytime, and it was accordingly moved by Mr. Trevelyan, the Secretary for Ireland. It was, however, notorious that many of Mr. Gladstone's supporters were opposed to any more concessions being made to the Irish party. Several Irish members who would have voted for the amendment refused to do so, owing to their having been suspended by a vote of the House, and they had announced their intention of taking no further part in the debate on the bill. When the division was taken it was found that the ministers were in a minority, and for a time it seemed probable that Mr. Gladstone would resign. Representations were made to him that the party would suffer by a general election, which would probably follow his resignation, and he consented to continue in office.

A Consultation with Mr. Moody has Been held in London to arrange as to the future plans of the evangelists. There were present representatives from many towns in the kingdom, as well as from London. Mr. Moody said that he had in hand sufficient invitations to keep him hard at work in Great Britain for the remainder of his life, and he was urged to return to Chicago at once. He proposed, however, moving about Scotland for a short time, and then visiting Paris for a fortnight. After that he hoped to preach in a number of towns in the south and southwest of England. Liverpool might probably be reached next spring, and London last of all, where a long stay was necessary. It was ultimately decided that all future arrangements should be left in the hands of the London Committee.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Orphanages Held a celebration on June 21st in honor of the distinguished minister's birthday. It was in 1866 that the announcement was made that a lady, the widow of a clergyman, had given Mr. Spurgeon $100,000 for the purpose of founding a boys' orphanage. In this gift Mr. Spurgeon recognized a distinct call to undertake the work, notwithstanding the many labors in which he was then engaged, and the cares and anxieties growing out of them. He was seconded by his people and others. House after house sprang up, the orphans living in true family and homelike way in little groups. The Girls' Orphanage dates from the meeting held at the Tabernacle May 19th, 1879, for the purpose of presenting $30,000 to Mr. Spurgeon in commemoration of the completion of the twenty-fifth year of his pastorate. The lady who founded the Boys' Orphanage had given to him a day or two before $250 as the "first brick" of a Girls' Orphanage; and a portion of the testimonial was also set aside for the same purpose by Mr. Spurgeon. The undertaking thus happily inaugurated has been as successfully carried out as was the project for erecting a Boys' Orphanage. The cost of erecting the girls' houses has been about $55,000, the whole of which sum has been subscribed. In all, up to last March, 758 children have been received into the institution.

THE picture on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is taken from a photograph of a group of some of the survivors of the Jeannette expedition. It was done at Yakutsk, a city in Siberia, to which after unparalleled hardships they made their way from the Lena delta, where they landed after the wreck of their vessel. Seven other survivors are known to have been saved, five of whom were in the same boat with the six whose portraits form the group, and two others—Noros and Ninderman—who were in the Captain's boat. The other twelve of the captain's party are known to be dead. Eight men who were in the boat commanded by Lieutenant Chipp, whose portrait appears on page 460, have not been heard of since September 12th, 1881, when the three boats were separated in a gale off the coast of Siberia. There is only too good reason to fear that the boat must have foundered and all on board have perished.

It was on July 8th, 1879, that the Jeannette set sail from San Francisco on her voyage of discovery in the Arctic Ocean. She had been purchased and fitted out by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the proprietor of the New York Herald, and by special act of Congress she was registered as an American vessel. Her crew of thirty-three were selected from volunteers, and the courage and endurance they displayed proved that the selection was carefully made.

Lieutenant Danenhower, Dr. Newcomb, the naturalist of the expedition, Jack Cole, a seaman whose protracted sufferings during the long retreat affected his reason, and Long Sing, the Chinese steward, arrived in New York on May 28th last. The other two portraits in the group on our frontispiece are of Henry Wilson and H. W. Leach, who remained behind with Engineer Melville to assist in the search for De Long and his men, and are now on their way home in company with the other seven survivors.

The courage and fortitude displayed by these brave explorers amid dangers and discouragements which might well have produced despair, deserve all honor. The record of their struggles adds another chapter to the history of Arctic exploration, and their names will live in history with those of Franklin and his compeers.

The following narrative of the voyage is compiled from the exhaustive account supplied by Lieutenant J. W. Danenhower and published in the New York Herald. The Lieutenant was not an eye-witness of all the events about which he speaks. Struck about a year after the vessel left San Francisco with an affection of the left eye, by which the right one was sympathetically affected, he was confined to his darkened berth for a period of six months, during which time he underwent thirteen operations, and until the time of the disaster he was declared by the doctor as incapacitated for duty, and was thereby deprived of any active share in the labors in the Arctic. But while confined to his berth his companions relieved the tedium of his existence by telling him all that was going on in the little world above and around him, and when he was able to go on deck and on the ice he was an accurate observer of all that went on around him, and his marvellous memory enables him without notes to tell with exactitude every date, name, or event memorable in the history of the voyage.

"We arrived at Ounalaska," says the Lieutenant, "on the 3d of August, after a long passage caused by head winds and the vessel being laden below her proper bearings. The Jeannette was perfectly seaworthy, having been thoroughly put in order at Mare Island before starting. After coaling ship at Ounalaska we proceeded to St. Michael's, Alaska, to meet our supply schooner, the Fanny A. Hyde. There we filled up with stores, got fur clothing, purchased forty dogs and engaged two American Indians—Aneguin and Alexie—as hunters and dog drivers, thus completing our complement of thirty-three.

IN THE ICE.

"On August 31st, 1879, we stood to the northwest, shaping our course to the southeast cape of Wrangel Land, and then we felt that our Arctic cruise had actually commenced. On September 6th we met with the young ice, and through this forced our way by ramming. This shook the ship very badly, but did not do her any damage; indeed, the ship stood the concussions handsomely. But in the evening we could proceed no further. We banked fires, secured the vessel with ice anchors and remained. That night was exceedingly cold. The ship was frozen in. At this time the ice was in pieces, ranging from ten square yards to several acres in area, with small watercourses like veins running between them, but now quite frozen over. It remained quiet for a number of days, and we found ourselves in the middle of a large accumulation of floes about four miles across. Our position was not an enviable one. At any moment the vessel was liable to be crushed like an eggshell among this enormous mass of ice, the general thickness of which was from five to six feet, though some was over twenty where the floe pieces had overrun and cemented together and turned topsy-turvy.

A BREAK IN THE ICE.

"About the 6th of November the ice began to break round the ship and a regular stream of broken masses gradually encroached upon us. From aloft the floe that had appeared so uniform a few weeks before was now tumbled about, and in a state of greater confusion than an old Turkish graveyard. Tracks began to radiate from the ship, and the noise and vibration of distant ramming were terrific, making even the dogs whine. November 23d was a calm starlight night. I was on deck when a crack was heard and we found that the floe had split and that the ice on the port side of the ship had drifted off, leaving the ship lying in a half cradle on her starboard bilge. The water looked smooth and beautiful, and there was no noise save that of four dogs which had drifted off with the port ice."

The ship was then in a critical condition. When wedged in the ice she had not been upright, but had leaned over to the starboard side, resting on the ice. She still rested there, but on the opposite side the ice had drifted away leaving that side washed by the waves. A few mornings later, however, drift ice came down upon the Jeannette on the starboard side and pushed the vessel off her cradle into the water. She drifted all day, but about seven in the evening she met more young ice and was frozen solid again. It must be remembered, in order to adequately realize the situation, that the events described occurred in the long Arctic night, which continued from November 10th to January 25th, during the whole of which time the sun never rose above the horizon.

The chief source of danger at that time consisted in the pressure of the ice, which threatened at any moment to crush the ship like an eggshell. That this was no fancied danger is evident from the facts cited by Lieutenant Danenhower showing the immense pressure exerted by the ice on the ship. He says: "The ship would groan from stem to stern; the cabin doors were often jammed so that we could not get out in case of emergency, and the heavy truss was imbedded three-quarters of an inch into the ceiling. The deck planking would start from the beams, showing the unpainted wood for more than half an inch. This, together with the sharp cracking of the ship's fastenings, like the report of a discharge of rifles, would wake us at night. Each man kept his knapsack by him ready for an instant move, and preparations were made for leaving the ship with sleds and boats if necessary."

was made on January 19th, 1880, which proved that the apprehensions entertained of the effects of the ice pressure were not without basis. The crew were aware that there were tremendous pressures, even the ice being affected by it, for the floes actually backed up into mounds under the strain. The heaviest strain came in the stem of the ship, in longitudinal direction. There was also a heaviest lateral strain, especially under the starboard masts. About nine o'clock one morning a man went down into the fire room on duty and found the foreplates covered with water; he immediately reported the fact and all pumps were started. The temperature was below —42 degrees Fahrenheit (the freezing point of mercury). Mr. Melville had great difficulty in getting up steam and starting the donkey pumps, but succeeded admirably the men working with their feet and legs in the water and everything frozen and freezing solid. It was found that the vessel leaked badly in the bows, and it was thus evident that when the ice broke up there was a strong probability of the ship foundering, all her seams having been forced open by the iron grip of the ice.

Meanwhile the drift continued, but it was found that it was not in a uniform direction as mariners Arctic explorers supposed. The drift was very uncertain, and in June of 1880 it was found that the vessel imbedded in its ice floe had actually drifted back over the course it had taken in May. The weary monotony of these months of inactivity in the ice was broken occasionally by

A BEAR HUNT.

About fifteen animals were obtained the first year. Mr. Dunbar, the ice pilot, was the champion bear slayer and was always ready for a keen jump when game was reported. During the first winter a tremendous bear approached the ship about midnight, drove the dogs in and attempted to board the ship. The alarm was given. Mr. Dunbar was on deck instantly, with rifle in hand and shot the bear through the heart at ten paces. It was probably the biggest and most ferocious bear secured on the cruise, and he had been attracted by the quarters of his comrade that were triced up in the fore rigging.

On one occasion Captain De Long was alone in the dingy and was interviewed by a bear, who suddenly approached out of the mist and stood watching him in the most dignified manner. The captain retreated in good order. During the summer it was very difficult to get bears, because they could take to the water so readily and thus cut off their pursuers. During the misty times they were very bold, and on one occasion a she bear with two cubs approached the ship to within 400 yards of the starboard quarter. Fortunately the dogs were on the port side and to windward, so they did not scent the bear. The greatest quietness prevailed and a squad of about ten riflemen was immediately organized on the poop. Lieutenant Danenhower says, "I was watching the bears through a cabin air port and it was a very fine sight to see the mother and her two cubs approach the ship in a wondering and cautious manner. I could see better under the mist than the people on the poop."

"Then succeeded a volley. The bears reeled and made several turns, and I thought that we had bagged all of them, but was astonished to see them get up and walk off in the most lively manner. Of course, all the dogs took the alarm and pursued them to the first crack, which the bears calmly swam across and thus escaped."

This dreary existence continued through the summer of 1880, the Jeannette still imbedded in and drifting with the ice floe. At the beginning of September Lieutenant Danenhower thus describes the situation when the ship was being got into condition for in the ice: "The ship was firmly imbedded in ice of about eight feet in thickness; but there were immense masses shoved under her keel, and the bows were lifted so that the keel was inclined about one degree, the ship at the same time heeling to starboard two degrees, and so firmly held in this gigantic vice that when the blacksmith struck his anvil in the fireroom one could see the shrouds and stays vibrate, and they were not very taut. The morale of the ship's company was excellent, yet we looked anxiously toward the long night of the second winter, which proved to be the most fearful part of our experience."

"The ship was banked up with snow, the warehouse was put up for the use of, the men, and the awning spread so that the spardeck was completely housed over. Economy and reinforcement were the order of the day in fuel, provisions and clothing."

The Captain expressed his determination not to abandon the ship as long as the provisions lasted, and the impression prevailed among the ship's company that if the Jeannette continued to float on the ice through the winter and the following summer, in the fall of 1881 the Captain would commence his southward journey with the sleds. The next night set in and during the next three months a routine of the previous winter was repeated. Regular exercise, constant meteorological observations, hunting every day, and such expedients as could be devised for diverting the company and relieving the strain of the monotonous life. The sufferings of that second dreary night the Lieutenant passes over briefly, but it is evident they were tense, for on the approach of spring Dr. Ambler, the ship's medical officer, reported "the physical condition of the crew rapidly deteriorating."

LAND AHOY.

On May 16th the cheering cry of "land ahoy" was heard and intense excitement followed, for it had been many months since land had been seen, and it was nearly two years since any of the brave little band had set foot upon it. The island was named Jeannette Island. No such land being laid down in any chart on board the Captain believed they were justified in regarding it as a discovery. It was small and rocky. The southern end appeared high and the land sloped down to a low point to the northward when the island was first seen, but subsequently mountains behind the low point were observed and from this fact the island was adjudged to be more extensive than at first supposed. Sketches were made whenever the land was in sight, but it would have been foolish to have attempted a journey to it, for the drift of the ship was too rapid and the state of the ice so changeable.

The third day after the discovery of the island, the land beyond and to the westward was noticed, but nothing could be made out respecting it.

On May 25th, however, it proved to be another and a larger island and it was resolved to explore it. On June 1st the exploring party set out. Assistant-engineer Melville was in command, and with him were Mr. Dunbar and four seamen. They took with them a boat secured on a sled drawn by fifteen dogs and provisions for seven days. The party arrived on the island, which they named Henrietta Island, hoisted the Stars and Stripes and took possession in the name of the United States. On June 6th they returned to the ship. Lieutenant Danenhower says, "We were all very glad when Melville got back, for the ice had commenced to swing around the corner of Henrietta Island very rapidly. The ship continued drifting to the northwest rapidly until June 10th. During this time the ice in which she was imbedded began to crack and the area of the piece was increasing rapidly. We knew that the important moment was coming when the Jeannette would be liberated from this cyclopean vice and that her future would be more hazardous than while in the monster's grip, for it was impossible to shape a course, and she would be momentarily liable to be crushed by the impact of the antagonistic ice floes, which sent immense masses of ice into the ship, and among which the Jeannette would be like a glass toy ship in a railroad collision."

"About eleven P.M., June 10th, I was awakened by the ship's motion. It sounded as if she were sliding down hill or off the launching ways. I was frightened for an instant, but immediately recovered and jumped out of bed for my clothes. The ship had slid off her bed after the ice on the port side had opened with a loud crack. There she floated calmly on the surface of the beautiful blue water. She could not proceed, being hemmed in on all sides by almost limitless masses of ice in close contact and having only a small pool in which she could bathe her sides. The starboard half of her cradle remained, so she was hauled into it and secured with ice anchors on the bow and quarter to await her chance to escape. The rudder had been previously shipped and the screw propeller had been found to be undamaged, so every preparation was made to move at a moment's notice.

THE WRECK.

"I will now describe the supreme and final moments in the life of the Jeannette. I went on deck at one o'clock in the afternoon and saw the hunters start out. I still lingered on the quarter deck, for the ice on the port side; some twenty-five yards distant, had commenced to move toward us, and I was fascinated by the dangers of the situation. The Captain was on deck and immediately hoisted the hunters' recall, which was a big black cylinder, at the main truck. They began to come in one by one. At the time of their arrival the ice was in contact with the port side of the ship, and she was heeling to starboard with her port bilges heavily pressed. The pressure on the ship was terrible, and we knew that she must either lift and be thrown up bodily upon the ice or be crushed."

"Thus the ship lay for two hours and a half, the pressure of the ice relaxing at times and the ship almost righting. Then again she would be hove over and we felt sure there was no longer any hope for her, for she would not lift. Her fate was practically decided the moment we found she would not lift, and a large amount of provisions and clothing was then placed on the ice in readiness for the catastrophe. The ship in this condition was like a broken basket, and only kept from sinking by the pressure of the ice, which at any moment might relax and let her go to the bottom."

"When the order was given to abandon the ship her hold was full of water. We had a large quantity of provisions on the ice about a hundred yards from the ship. We also had three boats—namely, the first cutter, second cutter, and the whaleboat. As soon as Dr. Ambler had looked out for Chipp he relieved me at my post and I went to work with No. 3 sled party, which I had been detailed previously to command. The order was given to camp and get coffee, so we pitched our tent abreast of the whaleboat, and I set about fitting out for the retreat. After about two hours' work the order was given to 'turn in' and was obeyed promptly."

"About four o'clock I was awakened by Seaman Kuehne calling his relief, Fireman Bartlett, who was in our tent. Kuehne called to Bartlett that the ship was sinking and the latter jumped to the tent door and saw the spars of the Jeannette after the hull was below the surface. We heard the crash, but those were the only two men who saw the vessel disappear. It was said that the ice first closed upon her, then relaxing allowed the wreck to sink; the yards caught across the ice and broke off, but being held by the lifts and braces were carried down—depth, thirty-eight fathoms, as I remember. The next morning the Captain and others visited the spot and found only one cabin chair and a few pieces of wood—all that remained of our old and good friend the Jeannette, which for twenty-one months had endured the embrace of the Arctic monster. The Jeannette sank about four o'clock of the morning of Monday, June 13th."

The situation of the brave men encamped on the huge piece of ice was critical in the extreme. They were hundreds of miles from the nearest land, and they were about to commence a long and toilsome march across the ice dragging with them all their stores. This was no slight burden, for in addition to food and clothing there were three large boats to be taken with them, ready for the time when they should reach open water or for the time when the floe on which they were should break asunder or be crushed by other ice. They did not lose courage, but immediately commenced the labor of packing all the stores and boats on sleds with heavy runners tipped with whalebone, and on June 17th, the anniversary of Bunker Hill, the retreat commenced.

We have not space to describe here the horrors of that dreary journey which then commenced. Only twenty-two of the thirty-three men were fit for duty, and these had to drag across the rough and uneven ice floe the eight sleds, aggregating in weight 15,400 pounds. It was necessary that all hands should take one sled at a time the distance of the daily march, then return for another, and so on; thus going over the distance fifteen times at least for the first march. They made a mile a day. But even that slow progress was only apparent, for at the end of seven days they found that the ice-floe on which they were travelling was drifting northward, so that they were really about twenty-seven miles farther from land than they were when they commenced their march. This toilsome journey continued until on July 12th another new island was sighted, to which the name of Bennett Island was given. Here a short but much needed rest was taken."

On August 6th the boats were launched, and though the danger was not diminished, the work was much lighter than that of dragging the sleds over the ice. The ships company was distributed as follows: FIRST CUTTER—THE CAPTAIN'S BOAT.—Captain De Long, Dr. Ambler, Mr. Collins, Ninderman, Erickson, Gurtz, Noros, Dressler, Iverson, Kaach, Boyd, Lee, Ah Sam, Alexei. SECOND CUTTER.—Lieutenant Chipp, Dunbar, Sweetman, Staar, Warren, Kuehne, Johnson, Sharwell. WHALEBOAT.—Engineer Melville, Lieutenant Danenhower, Coles, Newcomb, Leach, Mansen, Wilson, Bartlett, Lauterbach, Steward, Anequin.

THE LAST MEAL.

The boats kept together until September 9th when Semmoffsky Island was reached, and there the entire company landed and dined together off a deer killed soon after landing. This was a most welcome meal, for provisions had been running short for several days and every one had been placed on small allowance. That was the last meal eaten together. On Monday, September 12th, the voyage was resumed. About five P.M. that day a gale was blowing, with heavy seas, and it was only by excellent seamanship and constant watchfulness that the whaleboat survived the night. When the sun rose the next morning she was alone on the water. The Captain's boat it was afterwards found had drifted southwest, while the second cutter has not been heard of since, and it is feared she must have foundered in the storm.

After four days more of solitary sailing the whaleboat grounded in two feet of water with a low-lying coast in the distance. An effort was made to effect a landing, but it was unsuccessful, and it was not until evening and at another point to the southwest that a landing was made. Here, to the intense joy of the party, a hut was found; and after sixty-eight days in the boat, and ninety-four days from the day the Jeannette went down, the men slept under cover around a good fire. The next day the voyage was continued among what appeared to the men a cluster of islands, but at length they came to the conclusion that they were sailing up one of the mouths of the Lena. On Monday, September 19th, a party of natives was met, who showed some kindness toward the travellers. Food was given them and they were taken to a village and lodged in an empty house, where their limbs, frozen during the long exposure in the boat, were dressed. There they made the acquaintance of two Russian exiles, who proved very useful friends and who told the Jeannette men some news of the great world from which they had been two years absent. There they first heard of the assassination of the Czar.

One of the exiles undertook to carry news of the party to the commandant at Bulun, and on his way back he met Noros and Ninderman, two sailors belonging to the Captain's boat. They had been sent forward by the Captain to obtain assistance for the others, who were in a deplorable condition, sick, exhausted, and without food. They had landed at a point to the west of that at which Danenhower's party landed, and had not met any natives. On hearing this news from the exile on October 29th Melville immediately started to meet Noros and Ninderman and to carry food to the Captain and his party, leaving Danenhower to carry forward the rest of the party to Bulun. Melville found the two men, but the effort to reach the Captain and the rest of the party was not successful. It was not until March, 1882, that Melville discovered the Captain's party, all dead.

If I should ask some one, "Where is Brooklyn to-day?" he would say: "At Shelter Island." "Where is New York to-day?" "At Long Branch." "Where Philadelphia?" "Cape May." "Where is Boston?" "At Martha's Vineyard." "Where is Virginia?" "At the Sulphur Springs." "Where the great multitude from all parts of the land?" "At Saratoga," the modern Bethesda, where the angel of health is ever stirring the waters. But, my friends, the largest multitude are detained by business or circumstances. Among them all newspaper men, the hardest worked and the least compensated; city railroad employees, and ferry masters, and the police, and tens of thousands of clerks and merchants waiting for their turn of business, and households with an invalid who cannot be moved, and other multitudes by the stringency of the times hindered from further expenditure, and the great multitude of well-to-do people who stay at home because they like home better than any other place, refusing to go away simply because it is the fashion to go.

When the express wagon with its mountain of trunks directed to the Catskills or Niagara goes through the streets, we stand at our window envious and impatient, and wonder why we cannot go as well as others. Fools that we are! as though one could not be as happy at home as anywhere else. Our grandfathers and grandmothers had as good a time as we have long before the first spring was bored at Saratoga or the first deer shot in the Adirondacks. They made their wedding tour to the next farmhouse, or, living in the city, they celebrated the event by a walk on the New York "battery."

Now, the genuine American is not happy until he is going somewhere, and the passion is so great that there are Christian people with their families, detained in the city, who come not to the house of God, trying to give people the idea that they are out of town; leaving the door-plate unscoured for the same reason, and for two months keeping the front shutters closed while they sit in the back part of the house, the thermometer at ninety. My friends, if it is best for us to go let us go and be happy. If it is best for us to stay at home let us stay, and be happy. There is a great deal of good common sense in Paul's advice to the Hebrews, "Be content with such things as ye have."

I. The first reason that I mention as leading to this spirit advised in the text is the consideration that the poorest of us have all that is indispensable in life. We make a great ado about our hardships but how little we talk of

OUR BLESSINGS.

Health of body, which is given in largest quantity to those who have never been petted and fondled and spoiled by fortune, we take as a matter of course. Rather have this luxury and have it alone, than, without it, look out of a palace window upon parks of deer stalking between fountains and statuary.

These people sleep sounder on a straw mattress than fashionable invalids on a couch of ivory and eagle's down. The dinner of herbs tastes better to the appetite sharpened on a woodman's axe or a reaper's scythe, than wealthy indigestion experiences seated at a table covered with partridge and venison and pineapple. The grandest luxury God ever gave a man is health. He who trades that off for all the palaces of the earth is infinitely cheated. We look back at the glory of the last Napoleon, but who would have taken his Versailles and his Tuileries if with them we had been obliged to take his gout?

"Oh," says some one, "it isn't the grosser pleasures I covet, but it is the gratification of an artistic and intellectual taste." Why, my brother, you have the original from which these pictures are copied. What is a sunset on a wall compared with a sunset hung in loops of fire on the heavens? What is a cascade, silent on a canvas, compared with a cascade that makes the mountain tremble, its spray ascending like the departed spirit of the water slain on the rocks? Oh, there is a great deal of about a fondness for pictures on the part of those who never appreciate the original from which the pictures are taken. As though a parent should have no regard for his child, but go into ecstasies at the photograph. Bless the Lord, O man, O woman, that though you may be shut out from the works of a Church, a Bierstadt, a Rubens and a Raphael, you still have free access to a gallery grander than the Louvre or the Luxemburg or the Vatican—the royal gallery of the noonday heavens, the King's gallery of the midnight sky.

II. Another consideration leading us to a spirit of contentment is the fact that our happiness is not dependent upon outward circumstances. You see people under all circumstances. In a family where the last loaf is on the table and the last stick of wood on the fire, you sometimes find a cheerful confidence in God, while in a very fine place you will see and hear discord sounding her war-whoop and hospitality freezing to death in a cheerless parlor.

I stopped one day on Broadway at the head of Wall Street, at the foot of Trinity Church, to see who seemed to be the happiest people passing. I judged from their looks that the happiest people were not those who went down into Wall Street, for they had on their brow the anxiety of the dollar they expected to make; nor the people who came out of Wall Street, for they had on their brow the anxiety of the dollar they had lost; nor the people who swept by in splendid equipage, for they met a carriage that was finer than theirs. The happiest person in all that crowd, judging from the countenance, was the woman who sat at the apple stand knitting. I believe real happiness oftener looks out of the window of an humble home, than through the opera glass of the gilded box of a theatre.

I find Nero growling on a throne. I find Paul singing in a dungeon. I find King Ahab going to bed at noon through melancholy, while near by is Naboth contented in the possession of a vineyard. Haman, Prime Minister of Persia, frets himself almost to death because a poor Jew will not tip his hat, and Ahithophel, one of the great lawyers of Bible times, through fear of dying, hangs himself. The wealthiest man forty years ago in New York when congratulated over his large estate replied, "Ah, you don't know how much trouble I have in taking care of it."

Byron declared in his last hours that he had never seen more than twelve happy days in all his life. I do not believe he had seen twelve minutes of thorough satisfaction. Napoleon I. said, "I turn with disgust from the cowardice and selfishness of man. I hold life a horror; death is repose. What I have suffered the last twenty days is beyond human comprehension."

While, on the other hand, to show how one may be happy amid the most disadvantageous circumstances, just after the Ocean Monarch had been wrecked in the English Channel a steamer was cruising along in the darkness, when the captain heard a song, a sweet song, coming over the water, and he bore down towards that voice and found it was a Christian woman on a plank of the wrecked steamer, singing to the time of St. Martin's:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll
While the tempest still is high."

The heart right toward God and man we are happy. The heart wrong toward God and man we are unhappy.

A TEMPORARY ARRANGEMENT.

III. Another reason why we should come to this spirit inculcated in the text is the fact that the differences of earthly condition are transitory. The houses you build, the land you culture, the places in which you barter are soon to go to other hands. However hard you may have it now, if you are a Christian the scene will soon end. Pain, trial, persecution never knock at the door of the grave. A coffin made out of planks is just as good a resting place as one made out of silver-mounted mahogany or rosewood.

Go down among the resting-places of the dead and you will find that though people there have great difference of worldly circumstances, none of them are all alike unconscious. The hand that greeted the senator and the president and the king is as still as the hand that hardened on a mechanic's hammer or the manufacturer's wheel. It does not make any difference now whether there was a plain stone above them from which the traveller pulls aside the weeds to read the name, or a tall shaft springing into the heavens as though to tell their virtues to the skies. In that silent land there are no titles for great men and there are no rumblings of chariot wheels and there is never heard there the foot of the dance. The

which is thrown on the fields in the East for the enrichment of the soil, is the dust raked out from the sepulchres of kings and lords and mighty men. Oh the chagrin of those mighty men if they had ever known that in after ages of the world their would have been called Egyptian guano!

IV. Another reason why we should cultivate a spirit of cheerfulness is the fact that for His creatures. You know what is best for your child. He thinks you are not as liberal with him as you ought to be. He criticises your discipline, but you look over the whole field, and you, loving that child, do what in your deliberate judgment is best for him. Now God is the best of fathers. Sometimes His children think that He is hard on them and that He is not as liberal with them as might be. But children do not know as much as a father.

I can tell you why you are not largely affluent and why you have not been grandly successful. It is because you cannot stand the temptation. If your path had been smooth, you would have depended upon your own surefootedness; but God roughened that path so you would have to take hold of His hand. If the weather had been mild you would have loitered along the water-courses, but at the first howl of the storm you quicker your pace heavenward and wrapped around you the warm robe of a Saviour's righteousness.

"What have I done," says the wheat-sheaf to the farmer, "what have I done that you beat me so hard with your flail?" The farmer makes no answer, but the rake takes off the straw, and the mill blows the chaff to the wind, and the gold grain falls down at the foot of the windmill. Awhile the straw looking down from the mow up at the golden grain banked up on either side the flail understands why the farmer beat the wheat-sheaf with the flail.

Who are these before the throne? The answer came: "These are they who out of great tribulation had their robes washed and made white with the blood of the Lamb." Would to God that we could understand that our trials are the very best thing for us. If we had an appreciation of the truth then we should know why it was that John the Baptist, the martyr, in the very midst of the flames reached down and picked up one of the faggots that was consuming him and said: "Blessed be God for the time when I was born to this preference." They who suffer with Him on earth shall be glorified with Him in heaven. Be content with such things as you have.

V. Another consideration leading us to the spirit of the text is the assurance that Somehow. Will He who holds the water in the hollow of His hand allow His children to die of thirst? Will He who owns the cattle on a thousand hills and all the earth's luxuriance of grain and fruit, allow His children to starve? Go out tomorrow morning at five o'clock into the woods and hear the birds chant. They have had no breakfast. They know not where they will dine. They have no idea where they will sup. But hear the birds chant at five o'clock in the morning. Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not either do they reap nor gather into barns, yet our heavenly Father feedeth them. Are you not much better than they?"

THE LORD WILL PROVIDE

Seven thousand people in Christ's time went into the desert. They were the most improvident people I ever heard of. They deserved to starve. They might have taken food enough to last them until they got back. Nothing did they take. A man, who had more wit than all of them put together, asked his mother that morning for some loaves of bread and some fishes. They were put into his satchel. He went out into the desert. From this provision the 7000 were fed, and the more they ate the larger the loaves grew, until the provision that the boy brought in one satchel was multiplied so he could not have carried the fragments home in six satchels. "Oh," you say, "times have changed and the day of miracles has gone." I reply that what God did then by miracle He does now in some other way and by natural laws.

"I have been young," said David, "but now am old; yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread." It is high time that you people who are fretting about worldly circumstances and who are fearing you are coming to want, understood that the oath of the Eternal God is involved in the fact that you are to have enough to eat and to wear.

VI. Again I remark that the religion of Jesus Christ is the grandest influence to make a man contented.

INDEMNITY AGAINST ALL

financial and spiritual harm. It calms the spirit, dwindles the earth into insignificance and swallows up the soul with the thought of heaven. O ye who have been going about from place to place expecting to find in change of circumstances something to give solace to the spirit, I commend you to the warm-hearted, earnest, practical, common-sense religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. "There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked," and as long as you continue in your sin you will be miserable. Come to Christ. Make Him your portion and start for heaven and you will be a happy man—you will be a happy woman.

Yet, my friends, notwithstanding all these inducements to a spirit of contentment, I have to tell you that the human race is divided into two classes—those who scold and those who get scolded. The carpenter wants to be anything but a carpenter, and the mason anything but a mason, and the banker anything but a banker, and the lawyer anything but a lawyer, and the minister anything but a minister, and everybody would be happy if he were only somebody else. Parents have the worst children that ever were, and everybody has the greatest misfortune and everything is upside down or going to be. Ah, my friends, you never make any advance through such a spirit as that.

you may fret yourself down. Amid all this grating of tones I strike this string of the Gospel harp: "Godliness with contentment is great gain. We brought nothing into the world, and it is very certain we can carry nothing out; having food and raiment let us therewith be content."

Let us all remember, if we are Christians, that we are going after awhile, whatever be our circumstances now, to have

A GLORIOUS VACATION.

As in summer we put off our garments and go down into the cool sea to bathe, so we will put off these garments of flesh and step into the cool Jordan. We will look around for some place to lay down our weariness, and the trees will say: "Come and rest under our shadow!" and the earth will say "Come and sleep in my bosom;" and the winds will say, "Hush, while I sing thee a cradle hymn;" and while six strong men carry us out to our last resting-place and ashes come to ashes and dust to dust, we will see two scarred feet standing amid the broken soil and a lacerated brow bending over the open grave, while a voice tender with all affection and mighty with all omnipotence will declare: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Comfort one another with these words.

MR. MULLER'S PREACHING TOUR IN THE EAST.

Arrival at Joppa—Jerusalem and Judea—Present Population of Jerusalem—Bethany and Bethlehem—Beyrout, Smyrna, Constantinople, Athens, Rome, and Florence.

AT the Midway Conference in London on Thursday, June 22d, Mr. George Müller, of the Orphanages, Bristol, told the story of a "Preaching Tour in the East." He said: While I was at Basle, preaching to 2500 or 3000 persons night after night, a beloved brother in Christ, Mr. Saracen Bishop, told me how important and beneficial it would be if I would visit the missionary stations in Palestine, Syria, and the East generally, and after much prayer and consideration I agreed to do so. We sailed from Marseilles to Alexandria, in Egypt, and there I at once found an open door for labor, the American missionaries, the Scotch pastor, the German minister, and the faithful deaconesses from Kaiserwerth, all rallying round me.

The same was the case at Cairo, and after staying there some little time we went to Port Said, whence we sailed to Jaffa (the ancient Joppa), on board a Russian vessel, and in the company of about 100 or 150 Russian pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem, to each of whom we were able to give, for a nominal price, copies of the Word of God. It was remarkable that the Greek priests—though holding errors as grievous as the Church of Rome—so far from putting any hindrance in the way of buying the Word of God, rather encouraged these Greek Christians to do so.

ARRIVAL AT JOPPA.

After remaining twenty-four hours in quarantine we were allowed to land. Though the town, as seen from the vessel, looked a beautiful place, we found it to be about as filthy, wretched, and miserable a one as you could imagine. Here there was a German colony residing; the members are called the Templars. They went out there many years ago under the leading of a gentleman of the name of Hoffman—not to build a new temple at Jerusalem, but as they said to form a spiritual temple as God's people. At first all went on well, because this Mr. Hoffman was, during the years 1848, 1849, and thereabouts, a most devoted servant of Christ; but since then this poor man has departed greatly from the truth; he denies the divinity of our adorable Lord; he denies the necessity of His atonement; he discards the Lord's Supper and Baptism, and holds other fearful errors.

One of my objects at Jaffa was to lead such of this colony as had wandered from the truth, back again; but after I had preached one evening, I received a letter stating that the meeting-place could no more be allowed me. However, not only was this not a hindrance to my work, but it was the very reverse, for another hall was opened to me, and not only did those persons come who ordinarily attended the meetings of Mr. Hoffman, but a number of Christians who had separated from him because of the errors he taught. I had also opportunities of preaching in connection with the American and English missions; and in case neither English nor German was understood by my hearers, some of my addresses were translated into Arabic by competent translators.

JERUSALEM AND JUDEA.

After being in Jaffa twelve days, during which time I preached eighteen times, we went to Jerusalem by the only made road there is in Palestine, and that the worst of all I have seen in the sixteen countries I have labored in. During the first twelve of the forty miles of route the land was comparatively well cultivated, that is to say, well for Palestine, but after this we came in sight of what in Scripture are known as the mountains of Judæa, and where the country is so rocky and barren that one could wonder what it had ever been described, and truthfully described, as "the land flowing with milk and honey." You could not help saying to yourself: The curse of God not only rests upon the descendants of Abraham, but it rests also on the land itself. The streets of Jerusalem are narrow, dirty, and wretched, and, indeed, the city is in the utmost contrast to what it was when David, in the 48th Psalm, spoke of it as "the joy of the whole earth." But the spiritual state of Jerusalem is far worse. We lived opposite a small market which was used seven days in the week—Sunday as well as other days—and where the poor women who sold vegetables were so famished that they ate the outside leaves of their produce to stay the pangs of hunger. In Jerusalem, beggars meet you in all directions, and if you relieve one you are immediately besieged.

PRESENT POPULATION OF JERUSALEM.

There are, at the present time, between 7000 and 8000 Jews in Jerusalem; and in the whole of Palestine there are not so many as in the city of London alone. That will give you an idea that at present Palestine is not overrun with Israelites; and on the first of December one of the missionaries connected with the Scotch Missionary Society told me, that just a few days before an order was received by the Pasha from the Sultan that no land on a large scale should be sold to the Jews for the purpose of forming a colony, and he gave as a reason "lest it should involve the Ottoman Empire in difficulties with the European Great Powers."

Therefore there is no present prospect of Palestine once more becoming the possession of God's people; but it must be borne in mind that God can overrule all things, and in His good time He will so order it that the Holy Land will be again peopled by the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The number of converted Israelites in Jerusalem is extremely small; though I do not mention this and other disagreeable facts to induce you to slacken your efforts, but rather to induce you to more frequent waiting on God in prayer.

BETHANY AND BETHLEHEM.

While in Jerusalem I had two meetings at the hospital for lepers, of which a German brother has for fourteen years had the oversight. From Jerusalem we visited Bethany and Bethlehem, and while at the latter place we entered the church which is said to be built over the place where our adorable Lord was lying in a manger. Well, this place is appropriated by the Roman Catholics, by the Greek Church, and also by the Armenians; and continually quarrels have been carried on among these three different bodies of professing Christians. There we found a Turkish soldier, with his rifle and bayonet, in order to keep the peace if the priests should quarrel among themselves at any time. What a fearful degradation to Christianity! What can the Mahomedans think of such a "religion" as this? Returning to Jaffa, I suffered extremely from cold—so cold and windy, indeed, was it, that in the absence of a stove or fireplace, I was obliged to sit in my coat, with a greatcoat and an Inverness cape over that, a travelling-cap, and padded gloves on, and hot jars at my feet, in order to keep circulation in me.

HOMEWARD.

From Jaffa we went to Beyrout, thence to Smyrna. There, happening to look out of the window one Sunday, I saw a hundred kites flying, and learnt that it is the practice of the people to fly kites during Lent, discontinuing such practice on Good Friday. After visiting Constantinople we went to Athens, which is a city that bids fair to become as splendid as it was in its palmy days—and thence to Rome and Florence, on our way back to England. Of the missionaries and other Christian laborers whom we met when on our travels, I may say that they all seemed earnest, God-fearing men, diligently and devotedly laboring, amid many difficulties, to spread the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and most truly deserving of your sympathies and prayers.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Cabby and the Blue Ribbon.—Rev. Dr. Wallace, speaking at the all-day meeting in Glasgow, June 20th, said: "I got a cabman the other day who saw the blue ribbon in my coat, and he took it himself. He had been fined 10s. 6d. the week before, and he said, 'If I had had a blue ribbon a week ago, instead of getting drunk and driving furiously, it would have saved me a fine, and I should have been a better man to-day?'"

A Poor Woman's Love for Christ.—The Rev. W. McDougall said: "I spoke to a woman in the Circus the other day who showed a warm affection for the Saviour. Her words were very expressive, and her face showed that she was not exaggerating what was in her heart. She said, 'If every bone of my body were a tongue, and every one of those tongues could speak a million times, they could not tell all the love I feel to Christ for what He has done for my soul.'"

The Artist and his Picture.—Mr. Sloan said: "I have read of a painter who was making a great painting of the Last Supper, and he wished that it might hand his name down to posterity. After it was finished he sent for a friend who was an admirable judge, and said, 'I want you to tell me what strikes you most in that picture?' His friend looked at it long and looked at it carefully. Then he said, 'That which takes my eye most is the cup in the Saviour's hand; whereupon the painter took up his brush and dashed out the cup, saying, 'I am determined that nothing in that picture shall obscure the attractiveness of my Master—that He shall be the one central figure that draws the eye and heart in my picture.' So it should be in our preaching and in all our work—Christ should be all conspicuous and self should be abased."

A Whole Family Saved.—Mr. Richard Hill said: "A lady came to some meetings we had some time ago, and a minister's sister was leading her to her Saviour. Her trouble was that if she took Christ for her Saviour she would have to go home and tell her mother, her brothers, and sisters that she was a Christian. The lady dealing with her did not begin to pare down the way of salvation, but told her that in the midst of her fashionable home she would have to take up her cross, as that was what the Master said. 'Take Christ first, and then go to Him for whatever you want. He will give you strength to confess Him.' The young lady acted on this advice and a month later the whole family had abandoned the gayeties of society and found salvation and joy in the Saviour."

The Missionary's Medicine.—At the All-Day Meeting, Glasgow, June 20th, the Rev. Rajah Gopal (Madras), said: "When people are awakened and converted in our country, their friends often ask them, 'Has the missionary given you any medicine?' How is it you speak to us in a way that you never spoke to us before?" I remember a young man, a Brahmin by birth, whose soul was awakened within him, and when he came to the missionaries and accepted Christ his mother, father, relatives, and friends fell at his feet and besought him to return home. But he said, 'Christ, Christ—it is for Christ I must give up father and mother, and follow Him.' When he was taken before Christian judges who sat and adjudicated on his case, and when the question was put to him whether he would go back with his relatives, he said, 'No, I will follow Jesus Christ, and go and live with the missionaries who worship the Lord Jesus Christ.'"

"Heave Awa' Chaps, I'm no Dead yet!"—Dr. Wallace related the following: "I was a minister in Edinburgh, when a dreadful catastrophe happened—an old house in High Street, situated not far from John Knox's pulpit, fell, burying in its ruin twenty-three or twenty-five families. This happened on Sunday morning, and I remember Dr. Guthrie closing his place of worship. Many of us went to the place to encourage the workmen who were removing the ruins and bringing out the dead. The Roman Catholic priest was there, Dr. Guthrie was there, and other ministers, all engaged in the same work—that of cheering on the men doing a work of humanity. After twenty-three or twenty-four bodies had been got out a voice was heard—the treble voice of a little child—'Heave awa' chaps, I'm no dead yet.' Some stones had so fallen as to protect the poor little fellow, who after a time was recovered unhurt. Willie Inchelwood, I think, was his name, and in the new tenement that has been put up in the place of the old one, and above the door, is a stone representing Willie's head in a scroll, bearing the words, 'Heave awa' chaps, I'm no dead yet.' There are many sinners who are lying amid the ruins of sin. 'They are no dead yet. Who will 'heave' them out, and lead them to Christ, that they may be saved from eternal death, and find life eternal?'"

"Going to the Devil."—At a Recent Meeting in Glasgow, Mr. Sawyer, of New York, said: "I remember a drunkard who was known as 'Dig-gins.' One day he was staggering along the street—the sidewalk was not wide enough for him—when one of our Gospel temperance workers saw him, and going across the street, tapped him on the shoulder, and said, 'Where are you going?' He said, 'To the devil, just as fast as I can'—which was the truth. The lady, half by force and half by persuasion, got him to the Gospel Temperance Meeting at one of the theatres; and there after listening to some of the testimonies, his heart was touched, and he was savingly converted to God. That was five years ago. He is now doing well, and has been received into a Baptist Church, the pastor of which says he would rather part with a dozen members than this man, who was once known as 'the drunken shoemaker of the Ninth Ward of New York.'"

Getting Rid of Bad Company.—Dr. Bonar in an address delivered to young converts in the Christian Institute, on "Communion with God," said: "I have a case vividly before me just now of two godly men who, before their conversion, were very well known in this district. Their house was frequented by persons of all kinds, not only in the way of business but for company's sake. When they were brought to the Lord the question was, how are we to get quit of all this company—this carnal, worldly company. The Lord guided them wisely. They did not say one unkind word, but they just showed their acquaintance how happy they were in their new-found salvation. What was the effect? In a fortnight their house was as quiet as they could wish. Their worldly friends did not care for their society. Now, if you are troubled with worldly people who will insist that you go out to dinner, and so on, go out and shine, and then they won't ask you back again. Your very presence will condemn them, and they will feel you are right."

A Sceptic in a Fix.—Mr. J. M. Scroggie said: "I remember about seven years ago, I was conducting special meetings at Stockton-on-Tees, in England. There was at that time a very blessed work, and some of the sceptics of the town were converted. The leading sceptic in the place was greatly roused at this, and was full of blasphemy and wickedness. He determined to come to the meeting in order to pick up something that he might ridicule. He got into the centre of the Corn Exchange, wedged in the midst of about 2000 people. The Lord took hold of him, and as he told me afterwards, 'For ten minutes I was in an agony. I looked round and wanted to get out, but I was so hemmed in that I found this was impossible. I thought if I could get to the public-house and have a drink, I should get rid of my agony. But in ten minutes time I was resting on Jesus.' I went home and burned my entire infidel library; and now," added he, 'I know in my own experience the power of God unto salvation.' That man is now a living witness to the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Good Night's Sleep Secured.—Mr. R. Simpson spoke as the result of a long experience of the power of the grace of Christ to deliver and keep standing the most helpless inebriates, and said: "A lady came into a meeting, about 150 miles from this, who had been a confirmed drunkard for many years. She had three beautiful little daughters, and her husband, who was a Christian man, was having his heart crushed through his wife's incurable intemperance. She came into the Gospel meeting about 6 o'clock at night a hopeless drunkard, and before half-past 8 o'clock she had been delivered from the thralldom of sin, and never looked upon a countenance beaming more brightly with the love of Christ. In trying to tell the Lord Jesus how much she owed Him, words could not express the feelings of her heart. She said to me, 'What a night this will be to me! I shall be able to lay my head upon my pillow with perfect peace, and that I have not been able to for long past, expecting as I went to rest that night wake in darkness forever and ever.'"

"COMING EVENTS AND THE COMING KINGDOM."

By Rev. Richard Chester.

A New Work on Prophecy—Its Divergence on an Important Question—Different Resurrections Who are the Occupants of the Sea of Glass? Dr. Seiss' Views—Mr. Goodhart's Views Irreconcilable—Is the Lord Near at Hand?—The Case of the Thessalonians—No Event Necessarily Intervening—Return of a Son from India—A False Assurance.

MY attention has been recently directed to a very attractive book with the above attractive title, written, moreover, by one whose praise is in all the churches—the Rev. J. Goodhart—and containing much most valuable and instructive information concerning the all-important subjects upon which it treats.

All this, however, and the consequent probability that the book is familiar to many of those who are interested in the study of prophecy, seem to me to render it only the more needful to direct attention to one most important point in which it differs very materially from the views which have been from time to time put forward by other writers.

The learned author of "Coming Events and the Coming Kingdom" holds and advocates what we fully believe to be the truth concerning the yet future revelation of a personal Antichrist, and also concerning the rapture of the raised and living saints, before the last judgments of "the day of the Lord" are poured out upon the earth. He holds, however, that this latter event cannot possibly take place—in other words, that the stage of the Saviour's Second Advent, which is predicted in 1 Thess. 4: 13-18, cannot possibly occur until after the future personal Antichrist shall have been revealed and until the portion of the Church of this dispensation then existing upon the earth shall have undergone a fearful persecution, in which many of them shall suffer martyrdom at his hands—which persecution, moreover, is to last three years and a half—and until the close of which period the Advent must therefore be deferred. To guard against all possible misrepresentation, I shall quote his words, in which he gives a summary of his views upon this subject.

SUMMARY OF VIEWS OF THE REV. J. GOODHART.

"It appears in short—to anticipate very briefly what will be noticed more at large hereafter—that the Antichrist will be revealed. He will slay the witnesses—two persons, as we believe—he will persecute the saints for three years and a half, and then the resurrection of all the saints that have died up to that time, and the changing of all the saints who shall be living at that time, shall take place, and both of these classes shall be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air; upon whose removal the commissioned angels will proceed to pour out their vials upon the Beast, that is the Antichrist, and all connected with him, after which the Lord shall come to the battle of Armageddon with His saints" (pp. 96-97).

This conclusion the author has thus arrived at: He regards those who are spoken of (Rev. 20: 4-6) as having been "beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and who have not worshipped the Beast, nor his image, nor received his mark," etc., as identical with the saints who are represented as to be raised from the dead at the Lord's coming (1 Thess. 4: 16), and the resurrection of Rev. 20: 4-6, as thus identical with that of 1 Thess. 4: 16. He also regards the vision Rev. 15: 2-4 of those standing upon the sea of glass, and who have gotten the victory over the Beast," etc., as representing the same body of risen, changed, and glorified saints, just subsequent to their rapture and prior to the pouring out of the vials of wrath upon the earth.

THE DIFFERENT RESURRECTIONS.

Now that the resurrection spoken of Rev. 20 and called "the First Resurrection" cannot possibly be identical with that of 1 Thess. 4:16, has, I think, been already proved. I would, therefore, only observe here that, while the resurrection spoken of in 1 Thess. 4:16, is simply that of the "dead in Christ" the resurrection of Rev. 20:4-6, is therein limited, as expressly as language can limit it, to the dead who shall have been beheaded during the reign of the last Antichrist for refusing to worship him, or to receive his mark, and for testifying to Christ and adhering to His word, during that period of all but universal apostasy.

These characteristics, however, could not possibly belong to more than the very small fragmentary portion of the great body of the dead in Christ (the vast majority of whom must have died very long indeed before that Antichrist has been revealed) who shall live, and die by being beheaded, during the three years and a half of the exercise of his persecuting power. Besides, this resurrection most manifestly is to follow after the Advent of the Lord with His saints in judgment to the earth (Chap. 19:11-21), and after the binding and shutting up of Satan, and is to coincide with the commencement of the thousand years' reign of the Lord and His saints over the earth. While, according to Mr. Goodhart's own views, the resurrection of 1 Thess. 4 is to take place some three years and a half prior to these events. The resurrection of Rev. 20:4-6, is therefore evidently called the first resurrection in connection with a second resurrection spoken of in the same chapter (verse 12), which is to take place at the close of the thousand years, and is totally distinct from and subsequent to, that of 1 Thess. 4:16.

THE OCCUPANTS OF THE SEA OF GLASS.

I submit, further, that the occupants of the sea of glass, Rev. 15:2-4, are not to be regarded as representing the risen changed, and raptured saints of 1 Thess. 4. In the fourth chapter of Revelation we find a body of redeemed, glorified men, represented to St. John in vision as crowned and enthroned with the Lord in the heavens, and who "have been redeemed out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people"—who have been moreover, "made kings and priests unto God," and who are to "reign on the earth." Who are these unless they be the risen and changed and raptured saints? That they do represent the redeemed glorified Church is almost universally admitted.

The deniers of the futurity of the Book of Revelation, however, regard them as either representing the members of that Church in their separate disembodied condition prior to resurrection—a view, I submit, altogether irreconcilable with their being enthroned and crowned—or else they look upon them as by anticipation representing that Church as being in heaven, at a time at which its living members are still actually upon earth, and its dead members as yet unrisen.

But this view is, I submit, equally irreconcilable with the fact that these elders are throughout the book continually represented as

and as taking part in the varied and very important action there going on during the opening of the seals, the sounding of the trumpets, and the outpouring of the vials. For, to my mind, unanswerable proof that these elders do represent the raptured saints of 1 Thess. 4:16-17, subsequent to their rapture, I would refer the reader to the admi-

nable lectures on the Apocalypse, by Rev. Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia. If they do represent such, however, it must be another altogether different, and subsequently gathered, body, which is represented by those standing upon the sea of glass; and that such is the case, and also who these last are designed to represent, we may learn, as it seems to me, from their position being "before the throne,"—not "in the midst of it," and "round about it," as is that of the living creatures and the elders of chap. 4:4-6, and from a comparison therewith of Rev. 7:9-17, where the position "before the throne" (verses 9-15) of the great multitude who have come out of the great tribulation is exactly similar.

Neither body is enthroned—both standing before the throne. Both, as I fully believe, represent that wonderful "harvest of the earth" (Rev. 14:15), after it shall have been reaped and gathered into the garner of which the previously translated Church of this dispensation shall have been but the first-fruits—a glorious harvest of saved souls, ripened only and made ready under the three and a half years' fiery tribulation of the time of the Antichrist, and whose position in the kingdom and the glory, although unspeakably blessed, shall be altogether inferior to that of the "Church of the first-born," which is to "sit with Christ upon His throne."

What would seem to me to set the seal of truth upon these views, in their divergence from those of "Coming Events and the Coming Kingdom," and to render them of paramount importance, is, that they accord most perfectly—while those of Mr. Goodhart are altogether irreconcilable—with the position of unceasing watchfulness for, and unremitting expectancy of, His coming as an event that may take place at any moment, which are so strongly insisted upon by our blessed Lord Himself in so many passages of His Holy Word, especially in Luke 12:35-40.

MISSION WORK IN NEW YORK CITY. The "Glad Tidings" Tent.

THE Gospel Tent "Glad Tidings," now located on Second Avenue and Twentieth Street, was dedicated to evangelical missionary work in the City of Taunton, Mass., June, 1879, under the direction of Evangelist S. Hartwell Pratt and the Gospel Singers Mr. and Mrs. Clark Willson, whose portraits appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 13th. For a long time these Christian workers had felt that the summer seasons were being wasted even by many who professed to be interested in the welfare of the unsaved masses. Calls for evangelistic service commenced to come in about the middle of November and ceased about the first or middle of April. No churches were opened for special services during the intervening months. The question would continually come up, Cannot the summer be utilized for the salvation of men?

After much earnest prayer for Divine guidance, in a very wonderful manner the way was open ed for obtaining a tent. A noble Christian layman ordered one built in the most substantial manner, and an equally benevolent friend furnished it with easy folding chairs. Much opposition was encountered and many criticisms from conservative friends in New England had to be borne. The people, however, hailed the tent with great joy, coming to it in large numbers and receiving the Word with an eagerness that was truly refreshing.

For two seasons the tent work was carried on in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and as a rule all the evangelical churches in the city or town where it was located heartily co-operated with the evangelists. The result was that in place of a few depleted and half discouraged prayer-meeting services in church vestries the people flocked by hundreds to the tent, even during the month of August, and scarcely a night passed without witnessing from ten to twenty earnest seekers for salvation bowing with Christian friends in prayer.

In one city during a part of July and August two hundred persons professed conversion, the greater part uniting with the evangelical churches which co-operated in the work. Last summer the Baptist City Mission of New York, having heard of the work wrought by the tent in other places, held a conference through their committee with the evangelists, which resulted in securing their services with the tent for the season. The tent was opened Sunday, June 19th, with a large congregation present. The first week souls began to inquire the way of life, and some marked cases of conversion were witnessed. A missionary was employed who followed up the inquirers and instructed them more perfectly in the way. The interest increased from week to week until the tent closed by reason of the cold weather. Services were held in it for sixteen weeks, and the following, from the printed report of the committee, will give the results as far as they could be tabulated:

"One hundred and two services were held. Fifty-two thousand have attended the services, and if we include those standing around on the sidewalk, 100,000 at least have heard the Gospel message. Four hundred and twenty have asked prayers for themselves. Sixty-five who have been visited have given unmistakable evidence of conversion. One hundred and over are known to be seeking Christ. At the after-meetings, held at the close of the regular services, from 150 to 400 have remained for testimony and inquiry. There has been no undue excitement at any of these services, the utmost quiet, order, and decorum being observed. A spirit of reverence has characterized the assembly. The place was solemn, for the Spirit was present. The work has been deep, earnest, and thoughtful. It has seemed as if those who have been converted have had their judgments aroused and have carefully weighed what was their duty, and then, with determination yielded their wills to God and are now striving to live godly, righteous, and sober lives."

The work the present summer opened on even a higher plain of power than when it was left last season. The first evening eleven persons asked to be prayed for, and now after six weeks of labor some 250 different persons have presented themselves as inquirers. Many who are gathered at these services hear the Gospel for the first time for years. One lady, a mother of a family, has been converted, who had not entered a church for twenty four years. Scores of young men away from their homes who had forgotten home, altar, and church, are here gathered in, and made the subjects of God's grace. The work is assuming new proportions of power every week, and the attendance is on the increase. Meetings are held every night. Mr. E. F. Miller, Gospel singer from Mr. Moody's church, Chicago, is assisting in the glorious work.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Wrangle Between the Senate and the House on the River and Harbor Bill appears imminent. The Senate devoted the greater part of last week to the discussion of this bill, and made no less than one hundred and fifty amendments to it. The Senate raised the aggregate amount appropriated to twenty million dollars. When returned to the House the vote to non-concur passed almost without discussion, and the Committee on Commerce will instruct the conferees. The committee expects to be able to take off $2,000,000 from the bill, $1,000,000 of which will be cut out of the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi. It will also make an effort to strike out the provisions of the bill making appropriations for surveys for the Hennepin Canal and the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, to which a large number of Congressmen are opposed.

The Closing of the Stations of the National Board of Health has been ordered by the Board all along the line of emigrant travel between the Atlantic seaboard and the West and the Northwest; also along the South Atlantic and Gulf Coasts, and in the Mississippi Valley. This action is rendered necessary by the failure of sufficient appropriation to cover the expense of keeping up that service. It will involve suspension of inland inspection of foreign immigrants for the discovery and prevention of transmission of small-pox, at ten stations distributed on the trunk lines of railway in the North, and of the inspection of infected vessels arriving at our ports from yellow fever points abroad. It is singularly unfortunate that this display of economy should have been made at this period of the year when yellow fever may be imported.

Senator Bayard's Speech on the Revenue bill delivered in the Senate on July 14th, received the close attention of Republicans as well as Democrats. Mr. Bayard is an admitted authority on the subject, and his speech was carefully prepared and was believed to be an expression of the general view of the Democratic party on the question. He thought it a cause of congratulation that the subject of a reduction of taxation was to be considered. He dwelt upon the importance of the subject and referred to the labor strikes, which he believed were the indirect results of our tariff system. He spoke of the power to levy taxes as the greatest of the powers of the Government, but expressed the conviction that it had no constitutional right to exercise this power for the benefit of classes or individuals. He read from the speeches of Republican leaders made when the present tariff system was in process of formation, to show that it was then designed to be temporary and was a device for raising the money necessary to carry on the war. He analyzed the bill feature by feature, declaring that as it came from the House it was misnamed a bill for the reduction of the revenue. The relief it afforded would be relief to the wealthy and the powerful only.

A Uniform Standard of Time for the Whole world is the object sought to be established by a bill which has passed the House. It authorizes the President to convene an international congress for the adoption of a common meridian to regulate time throughout the world. The plan proposed by Professor Benjamin Pierce is to establish time meridians at regular intervals of fifteen degrees of longitude, exactly one hour apart, each belt being 900 miles wide, in each of which the local time would be the same. There would be four standard meridians within the United States, but it is proposed that railroads and telegraphs, to secure accuracy and uniformity, should adopt one, probably that of the Mississippi valley, for the whole country. To simplify matters, it is also suggested to abandon the present division of the day into two sections of twelve hours each, and to count continuously to 24 o'clock. There are at present about eighty different and arbitrary time standards used by the railroads in the country, and about 100 so-called standards in the various cities. The proposed change would be of material advantage to scientific men as well as to travellers.

The Shame of the Political Assessments grows and deepens as the facts are disclosed. In a recent issue of the New York Herald a letter, signed by Mr. Jay Hubbell, is published which was sent to a boy twelve years old employed in the Navy Yard at a dollar a day, out of which he contributes to the support of his widowed mother and his two fatherless sisters. Mr. Hubbell and his friends "invite" the poor lad to contribute six dollars and twenty cents to the campaign fund. Another letter calling for seven dollars was sent to an old man over eighty years of age employed as a sweeper at a dollar and a quarter a day. The "invitation" is in itself an outrage, but when, rightly or wrongly, the poor employé sees in it the glitter of the axe, it becomes a cruelty against which the protest is general and indignant.

The Tariff Commission has Commenced its labors by issuing an invitation for correspondence from all associations, corporations, and individuals interested in the subjects of its inquiries desiring to furnish information or testimony for its consideration in the discharge of its duties. The Commission also announces that "persons desiring to be heard will be given notice of the time and place at which the Commission will hear the testimony which they may offer." The Commission has decided to make Long Branch its headquarters for the present, because of the proximity of that place to New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The members decided on that place because they believed it would be impossible to induce witnesses and experts to travel to Washington during the hot weather.

Some of the Star Route Charges on which the Grand Jury failed to indict are to be submitted to arbitration at the request of the accused parties. The New York Times, which has taken a prominent part in the investigation, states that it has been arranged to submit certain questions to three arbitrators. Among these questions is whether the Salisburys, since July 1st, 1878, when the contract term began, had received any money by means of mail contracts on four routes named to which they had not been entitled, with the understanding that if they had so received money, it was to be repaid. The three arbitrators were authorized to act by a majority, and to act on any evidence satisfactory to a majority, and it was agreed that, pending the decision of the arbitrators, no other proceedings were to be taken. After this arrangement had been made with the Salisburys a similar agreement was made, under similar circumstances, with the Parkers as to the Vinita and Las Vegas route, on which the annual pay was raised by Brady from $6330 to $150,000, but the agreement did not include any of the other Parker routes. It is reported that the government expect to secure the repayment of about $150,000 by this arbitration, while it could not be recovered in any other way except by long litigation. A bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Hill, of Colorado, providing punishment for Postmasters who make false certificates of the arrivals and departures of mails, has been reported from the Senate Post Office Committee. As amended by the committee the punishment is to be removal from office and a fine of from $100 to $1000. It is alleged that the contractors who had been paid large sums for expedition were able to avoid doing the additional work required by the assistance of the postmasters who forwarded incorrect statements concerning the time of their arrivals and departures.

Interesting Facts Continue to Come from the Census Bureau, which has not yet completed its labors. The latest bulletins issued relate to the enumeration of native and foreign-born residents of the States and Territories, and indicate the direction of immigration. The number of foreign-born in Virginia is less than 1 per cent of the population, and in West Virginia less than 3 per cent. In Wisconsin it is more than 30 per cent, in Wyoming 28 per cent, and in Washington Territory 21 per cent. One-fifth of the foreign born in Washington Territory are natives of China. The great bulk of the native immigration into Texas has been from the Southern States; and of the foreign-born residents of the State—these being about 7 per cent of the whole population—two-thirds came from Mexico and Germany. The foreign born of Vermont are about 12 per cent of the whole, and three-fifths of these were born in Canada. About two-fifths of the native born in Wisconsin who were not born in that State were born in New York.

The Exposure of Dr. Slade, a Noted Spiritualist, at Belleville, Ont., on July 7th, may possibly open the eyes of the dupes to the frauds practised by these swindlers. Dr. Slade being caught in the act of deception, admitted, in the presence of a dozen gentlemen, including the chief of police, that he was a fraud and that his "manifestations" were mere trickery. His slate-writing had provoked much wonder among the people in attendance upon his daily seances, and a plan was formed for detecting him. Upon being charged with cheating and threatened with arrest the medium fell upon his knees, "trembling like an aspen," and begged to be let off. The chief of police finally relented sufficiently to give him three minutes in which to get to the railroad station, and by the first train he went East. Some doubts are expressed as to whether he is the same man whose exposure in London some years ago led to a prosecution.

The Immoral Business Alluded to in a Recent issue of this journal has at length received a check which it may be hoped will operate as a warning to other members of the villainous sisterhood. A German dame was examined in the Mayor's office on July 13th, on the charge of using her license as the keeper of an intelligence office for conducting an immoral business. A girl who claimed to have knowledge of the woman's doings and to have resisted that female's entreaties to enter a house of ill-fame, made an affidavit which formed the basis of the charge. In this document the names of three men are mentioned to whom the woman sent applicants for positions as domestics, and by whom they were persuaded to lead immoral lives. She also deposed that a Coney Island den was furnished with its inmates by this female dragon. The woman denied the charge, and produced six girls to support her statements. On their testimony, however, she was convicted, for they all swore that the places which she had found for them were houses of ill-fame. The Mayor ordered the woman's license to be revoked, and the testimony which had been taken in the case to be sent to the district attorney.

A Handsome Medal has been Presented by the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board to A. Van Dusen, who so bravely risked his life to ascertain the fate of the men imprisoned in one of the drifts by the flooding of the lower level of the Alta Mine in June last. The medal bears an inscription describing the deed of daring for which it was given, and concluding with the words: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15: 13). It is well that such instances of noble self-sacrifice should be honored, but it is remarkable that men who are quick to recognize and honor them often hear without emotion of the death Christ died to save them, and so far as they are concerned allow His sacrifice to have been made in vain (Isa. 53: 3, 4).

Worthless Booty was Carried off by Burglars in New York last week. Four boys broke into the business place of a dealer in paper and paper rags, in Ann Street, on July 12th. They effected an entrance through a window and began business by breaking open the proprietor's desk. There they found two pocketbooks in which were collections of old State bank bills, which the paper dealer had during his many years' experience in the business fished out of different lots of old paper rags. Supposing the bills to be good currency, the young thieves helped themselves liberally. They must have been much mortified when they discovered the worthlessness of their prize which, when they found it, doubtless seemed to them very valuable. The same discovery awaits many men who have risked their souls for gain. Only, unhappily for them, the discovery of the real value of their prize is not realized until it is too late (Matt. 16: 26).

Fogs of Unusual Density, and Gigantic Icebergs are reported by the Transatlantic steamers which arrived last week. The captain of the Arizona, of the Guion line, says that during several days an extremely dense fog settled down on the ocean. The engines of the Arizona had to be slowed up in order to decrease the danger of collision with an iceberg or with some other vessel. The ship Spicer, from Liverpool, had seventeen days of very heavy fogs. A large number of icebergs, many of which were 100 feet high, were passed. The position of a captain sailing under such circumstances is a very anxious one. There are times in the Christian's voyage of life when he is similarly situated, unable to see his way and conscious of the proximity of danger. At such times he becomes tranquil when he realizes that his Heavenly Father is guiding him and will keep him from evil. The anxious worldling can have no conception of that peace or he would leave all else to seek it for himself (Psa. 107: 28-30).

The Discovery of an English Earl in a Carpenter's shop at Connellsville, Pa., is reported by the Philadelphia Times. Two years ago a tramp arrived at Connellsville and applied for assistance to the Rev. W. F. Stoner, rector of the Episcopal church. Representing himself as an Englishman in utter destitution, the rector aided him, not only supplying his needs, but in procuring employment as a coal heaver in the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Subsequently he was promoted to grease wiper in the round-house, and thence to work in the carpenter shop. By his good behavior he won upon the esteem of the community. He kept up a correspondence with his wife in England, who has just informed him by letter that by the death of an uncle he succeeds to the title of Earl of Ellesmere, with an income of $250,000 a year. When he received notice of his accession to title and fortune he told the story of his life. He said he was born in Liverpool, England, in 1837, and was educated at Eton. Then reverses came; being unwilling to do manual labor in his own country he emigrated to America, landing in New York. After repeated misfortunes there he went to Philadelphia, where he was robbed of what remained of his effects. After an unsuccessful effort to recover his stolen property, in which all his resources were dissipated, he became a tramp, and finally reached Connellsville, where he happily obtained the assistance of the rector. His unexpected good fortune caused no little sensation in the shop where he worked, his comrades having no idea that they were working with the heir to an earldom. The time is coming when there will be surprises far greater than that; when the poor in this world, rich in faith, are revealed in glory as the sons of God (Matt. 19: 30).

A Crushed and Burned Saloon in Arkansas has involved the death of more than thirty persons. A telegram from Little Rock states that on July 12th a heavy wind and rain storm, accompanied by lightning, visited the adjacent town of Texarkana. During the storm a large three-story brick edifice, almost completed, was struck by lightning and fell in a mass on the top of a frame building known as the Paragon Saloon, burying everything beneath the ruins. The lamp in the saloon set fire to the ruins underneath, burning slowly upward. At midnight the fire was still burning inside the ruins. Thirty corpses, charred and almost unrecognizable, were taken out of the burned building, and it is feared that fifteen persons who are missing were also there when the disaster occurred and have perished. The sufferings of the victims, who were not crushed but slowly burned to death, must have been terrible. A catastrophe of that kind might happen to other structures where people meet in large numbers; but in cases like this of a saloon, or in the destruction of theatres, there is the additional cause for sorrow that death comes upon men engaged in an occupation with which the solemnity of sudden death is in ill accord. Christians ought never to enter such places for a moment (Luke 21: 34).

The Snake's Power of Charming its Prey was witnessed in exercise by a gentleman strolling through a plantation near Petersburg, Va. a few days ago. He was walking leisurely along the path when his attention was directed to the movements of a brown thrush which was circling about a small plum bush. This circling was kept up for a while, and then the thrush seemed gradually to weaken and at length stood perfectly still—immovable, with its wings partly open, and with its head bent forward. He drew nearer to the bush, when he heard an ominous hiss, and, looking down under the plum, he saw a large black snake coiled up and about to spring upon the bird. He frightened the snake away, and picked up the bird, which made no effort to escape, and seemed powerless. In a few minutes, however, the bird revived and shortly afterward flew off. It was a remarkable case of infatuation that attracted the bird toward its deadly enemy when it might have easily risen beyond its reach, and the gentleman who rescued it from its charmer did a kindly act. Sunday-school teachers and other Christian workers are engaged in a similar occupation. The charm they seek to break is more potent than the snake's, and the prey they would rescue more precious than anything on earth (Prov. 7: 23).

Locked up in a Burning Room was the Fate of two children in New York recently. A woman named Ellis, living in Twenty-seventh Street, having to go out to work, left her two children, one aged three years and the other six months, in the rooms. The babe was lying asleep in his crib and the other child was playing about the floor, and Mrs. Ellis locked them in. She had been gone but a short time when the other tenants were alarmed by smoke filling the house, and they discovered that the apartments occupied by the Ellis family were all ablaze. The cries of the children could be heard within the burning rooms. An alarm was given, and the engine company was summoned. They burst into the apartments and with great difficulty rescued the imperilled children. The infant was severely burned about the lower limbs, and the older child was almost suffocated, but revived quickly after being brought out into the open air. The woman's poverty doubtless led to her locking up the children, she having no means to pay for their being cared for, but it is an expedient she is scarcely likely to adopt again. To have her children shut in with the fire, with no way of escape, was a condition which must have made the mother's heart bleed. As we realize that terrible scene we cannot forget that it is by such a picture that the Bible indicates what will be the punishment of the impenitent (Rev. 21: 8).

THE FIRST RECORDED WORDS OF JESUS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when they saw Him, they were amazed: and His mother said unto Him, Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? behold, Thy Father and I have sought Thee sorrowing. And He said unto them, How is that it ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"—Luke ii. 48, 49.

A Solitary Utterance of Childhood—Reported by Mary—Where Hard Sayings should be Treasured—I. The Holy Child's Perception—Of His High Relationship—Of the Constraints of the Relationship—Of the Forgetfulness of Mary and Joseph—Of His Personal Work—II. The Holy Child's Home—His Father's Dwelling-Place—Where His Father's Work Went On—Where His Father's Name was Taught—III. The Holy Child's Occupation—Learning and Enquiring—Engrossed in It—IV. Special Lesson to Seekers—Where to Look for Jesus—Where is the Father's House—What is the Father's Business?

THESE words are very interesting because they are the first recorded utterances of our divine Lord. No doubt He said much that was very admirable while yet a child, but the Holy Ghost has not seen fit to record anything except these two questions, as if to teach us that childhood should be retiring and modest—a stage of preparation rather than of observation. We hear little of a holy child, for modesty is a precious part of its character. We ought therefore to give all the more earnest heed to these words, because they stand at the very forefront of our Lord's teaching, and are in some respects the announcement of His whole life. Spoken as they were at twelve years of age, we may regard them as the last words of His childhood and the first words of His youth.

I suppose that these words must have come into Luke's Gospel

THROUGH MARY HERSELF.

How otherwise could the evangelist have known that "they understood not the saying which He spake unto them," or that Mary "kept all these sayings in her heart?" Mary evidently here narrates the words of the holy child, words which she had pondered again and again. She treasured up for us the gems which dropped from Jesus's lips. She tells us that this saying, simple though it seems to be, was not fully understood either by herself or by His reputed father, Joseph; and yet, mark you, we are told expressly that Mary "kept all these sayings in her heart." When you cannot put a truth into your understandings, yet lay it up in your affections.

Do you wonder that there should be much in Scripture which you cannot comprehend, when even the first word of Christ when He is yet a boy is not understood? nay, not understood by those who had nursed Him, who had lived with Him the whole twelve years, and consequently knew His mode of speech and the peculiarities of His youthful language. If even Mary and Joseph did not understand, who am I, that I should forever be saying, "I must understand this or I will not receive it?" Nay, if we understand it not, yet will we keep all these sayings in our hearts; for we have this advantage, that the Holy Spirit is now given, by whose teaching we understand things which were hidden from the wisest saints of old.

A LITTLE BIBLE.

We might call these questions of Jesus the prophecy of His character, and the programme of His life. In this our text He set before His mother all that He came into the world to do; revealing His high and lofty nature, and disclosing His glorious errand. This verse is one of those which Luther would call His little Bibles, with the whole Gospel compressed into it. What if I compare it to the attar of roses, whereof a single drop might suffice to perfume nations and ages. It would not be possible to overrate these "beautiful words! wonderful words! wonderful words of life!"

I shall handle the text thus: First, here is the holy child's perception; secondly, the holy child's home; thirdly, the holy child's occupation; and fourthly, the holy child's lesson to any of us who may be seeking Him.

I. Here we see

THE HOLY CHILD'S PERCEPTION.

Notice, first, that He evidently perceived most clearly His high relationship. Mary said, "Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing." The child Jesus had been wont to call Joseph His father, no doubt, and Joseph was His father in the common belief of those round about Him. We read in reference to our Lord, even at thirty years of age, these words: "Being as was supposed the son of Joseph." The holy child does not deny it, but He looks over the head of Joseph, and He brings before His mother's mind another Father. "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"

He does not explain this saying, but it is evident enough that He remembered then the wonderful relationship which existed between His humanity and the great God; for He was not conceived after the ordinary manner, but He had come into the world in such a fashion that it was said to Mary, "That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." In a still higher sense and as a divine being He claimed filial relationship with the Most High; but here no doubt He speaks as a man, and as a man He calls God "My Father," after a higher fashion than we can do, because of His mysterious birth.

Brethren, this holy child's perception should be an instruction to us. Do you and I often enough and clearly enough perceive that God is our Father too? Do we not often act upon the hypothesis that we are not related to Him, or that we are orphans, and that our Father in heaven is dead? Do you not catch yourselves sometimes departing from under the influence of the spirit of adoption and getting into the spirit of independence, and so of waywardness and sin? This will never do. Let us learn from this blessed one that as He early perceived His high and eminent relationship to the Father, so ought we to do, even though we may be nothing more than children in grace.

This holy child next perceived the constraints of this relationship. He says, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" Write that in capital letters. It is the first appearing of an imperious "must" which swayed the Saviour all along. We find it written of Him that "He must needs go through Samaria," and He Himself said, "I must preach the kingdom of God;" and again to Zaccheus, "I must abide in thy house," and again, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me." "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders." "The Son of man must be lifted up." "It behoved Christ to suffer." As a son He must learn obedience by the things which He suffered. This First-born among many brethren must feel all the drawings of His sonship—the sacred instincts of the holy nature, therefore He must be about His Father's business.

Now I put this to you again, for I want to be practical all along: Do you and I feel this divine "must" as we ought? Is necessity laid upon us, yea, woe laid upon us unless we serve our divine Father? Do we ever feel a hungering and a thirsting after Him, so that we must draw nigh to Him, and must come to His house, and approach His feet, and must speak with Him, and must hear His voice, and must behold Him face to face? We are not truly subdued to the son-spirit unless it be so; but when our sonship shall have become our master idea, then shall this divine necessity be felt by us also, impelling us to seek our Father's face. As the sparks fly upward to the central fire, so must we draw nigh unto God, our Father and our all.

This holy child also perceived the forgetfulness of Mary and Joseph, and He wondered. He sees that His mother and Joseph do not perceive His lofty birth and the necessities arising out of it, and He wonders. "How is it," says He, in a childlike way, "How is it that ye sought Me? Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" He is astonished that they do not recognize His sonship, that they do not perceive that God is His Father. Does not Mary remember the angel's word at the Annunciation? Of course she did; but she was a woman, and as a woman she had nursed this child, and she had brought Him up, and therefore she began to forget the mystery which surrounded Him, in the sweet familiarities with which she had been indulged, and so she has to be reminded of it by her child's wonder that she should have forgotten that He was the Son of the Highest.

The spiritual man is not understood, he is a wonder unto many. Marvel not, my brethren, if carnal men do not understand you. Yea, even your own brethren in Christ—those who do love your Father—have sometimes been astonished at you when you have only been acting simply out of your own renewed heart. Many Christians get so stilted that they are not like children at home; they act more like strangers or hired servants in the Father's house, who have bread enough and to spare, but yet never can talk as the children do. Few let their hearts flow out with that holy fearlessness, that sweet familiarity which becomes a child of God. Why, if you and I went about the world under the full possession of this idea, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God," I have no doubt we should act in such a way that the mass even of professors would be amazed at us, and we should be still more amazed at their amazement and astonished at their astonishment.

The child Jesus began also to perceive that He Himself personally had a work to do, and so He said, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" He had been twelve years silent, but now began to fall upon Him! and He felt a little of the burden of His life-work. He perceives that He has not come here merely to work in a carpenter's shop, or to be a peasant child at Nazareth. He has come here to vindicate the honor of God, to redeem His people, to save them from their sins, and to lead an army of blood-washed ones up to the throne of the great Father above, and, therefore, He declares that He has a higher occupation than Mary and Joseph can understand. Yet he must go back to the home at Nazareth, and for eighteen years he must do His Father's business by, as far as we read, doing nothing in the way of public ministry. He must do His Father's business by hearing the Father, in secret, so that when He comes out He may say to His disciples, "All things which I have heard of My Father I have made known unto you."

Beloved, I come back to the practical point again. Have you with your sonship obtained a vivid perception of your call and your work? You have not redemption set before you to accomplish, but you have to make known that redemption far and wide. As God has given to Christ power over all flesh that He may give eternal life to as many as the Father has given Him, so has Jesus given you power over such and such flesh, and there are some in this world who never will receive eternal life except through you. It is time that you and I, who perhaps have reached thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty years, should now bestir ourselves and say, "Wist ye not that I must be up and doing in my Father's business?"

II. We shall now think of

THE HOLY CHILD'S HOME.

Here I am obliged to amend our version, and I am certain that the correction is itself correct. I am all the more strengthened in this opinion because the Revised Version indorses the emendation. This is how they read it: "Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's house?" That may not be verbally exact, but it is the true sense. It should run thus: "Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's?" There is no word for "house." But in almost all languages "house" is understood. You know how we commonly say to one another, "I am going down to my father's," or "I shall spend the evening at my brother's." Everybody knows that we mean "house," and that is just how the Greek here runs. "Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's." It means "house."

That is plainly a complete answer, and therein strikes you as more natural than a reference to business. If Jesus had only said, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" it would not have been any guide to them as to where He would be, because all His life long He was about His Father's business, but He was not always in the temple. He was about His Father's business when He sat by the well and talked to the woman of Samaria; and about His Father's business when He trod the waves of the sea of Galilee. He might be anywhere and yet be about His Father's business; but the natural answer to the question was, "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's house?" Let us read the passage thus, and see the child's home.

Where should Jesus be but in His Father's dwelling-place? He looked upon the Temple as being for the time the residence of God, where He manifested Himself in an unusual degree, and so this holy child looked upon those walls and courts with delight as His Father's house. It seemed most natural to Him that when He reached the place He should stay there. He had never really been at home before. Nazareth was the place where He was brought up, but Jerusalem's Temple was on earth His true home. I picture to my mind how that blessed child loved the place where His Father was worshipped. When the solemn prayers were uttered, and He heard them, there were none so devout as He as He heard the people worshipping His Father in heaven. It is touching to think of Him

IN HIS FATHER'S PALACE.

It was His Father's house in a special sense because in the temple did everything speak of God's glory, and everything there was meant for God's worship. It was His Father's house, too, in the sense that there His Father's work went on. If it had not been for the sin which had turned aside the Rabbis and the priests from the faithful following of God, the Temple was the place out of which God's power went forth. "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined." There, too, His Father's truth was proclaimed, and His ordinances were celebrated. The Temple was the centre of the great Husbandman's farm; it was the homestead from which all the workers went forth to till the fields of Christ's own Father.

It was there especially to Him that His Father's name was taught. He speedily made His way away from the place of sacrifice to that of teaching: "sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire;" but away He went to the doctors. This thoughtful, spiritual child wanted to know about everything sacred, and so he took His place among the learners, and the teachers were astonished when this new "child of the law" put to them questions which showed that He must have thought vastly more than any other person in the temple. When these inquiries were answered they were but the predecessors of a whole army of other questions, for He wanted to know more.

Should not this compulsion, blessed and sweet and irresistible, continually be upon us? I must be where God is. If I am not with His people because I am detained by sickness, yet I must be in My Father's house. There are many mansions in that great house on earth as well as in heaven, and we can be with God in the streets, and in His house when working in the field. But we must be in our Father's house; we cannot bear to be away from God. Loss of communion is loss of peace, loss of delight. Oh, crave fellowship with God; be covetous of it; love everything that keeps you to it, hate everything that leads you from it.

III. Consider, thirdly,

THE HOLY CHILD'S OCCUPATION.

Although I demur to its being the correct reading, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"—yet we know that this holy child would not be in His Father's house as an idler. He would be sure to be in the Father's house in the sense of being one of the workers in it. Our Father's house is a business house, and therefore we must be in our Father's business when we are at our Father's. That is the word. Though the translation which mentions business may be a questionable one, yet it is abundantly lawful to say that this holy child's occupation was to be about His Father's matters. What, then, did He do?

First, He spent His time in learning and inquiring. "How I pant to be doing good," says some young man. You are right, but you must not be impatient. Go you among the teachers, and learn a bit. You cannot teach yet, for you do not know; go and learn before you think of teaching. Hot spirits think that they are not serving God when they are learning; but in this they err. Beloved, Mary at Jesus' feet was commended rather than Martha, cumbered with much service.

"But," says one, "we ought not to be always hearing sermons." No, I do not know that any of you are. "We ought to get to work at once," cries another. Certainly you ought, after you have first learned what the work is; but if everybody that is converted begins to teach we shall soon have a mess of heresies, and many raw and undigested dogmas taught which will rather do damage than good. Run, messenger, run! The King's business requireth haste. Nay, rather stop a little. Have you any tidings to tell? First learn your message, and then run as fast as you please. There must be time for learning the message. If our blessed Lord waited thirty years, He is an example to eager persons who can scarce wait thirty minutes. See how fast light things will travel! How eager are those to speak who know nothing! How swift to speak what they do not know, and to testify what they have never seen. This cometh not of wisdom, but is

THE UNTIMELY FRUIT OF FOLLY.

I have heard it said that Dissenters do not go to their chapels for worship, but for hearing sermons. It is not true; but if it were, I beg to say that hearing sermons may be one of the divinest forms of worship out of heaven; for in hearing the Gospel as it should be heard every sacred passion is brought into play, and every power of our renewed manhood is made to bow before the Majesty on high. Faith by embracing the promise, love by rejoicing in it, hope by expecting its fulfilment—all worship when the theme is some gracious word of the Most High.

This holy child is about His Father's business, for He is engrossed in it. His whole heart is in the hearing and asking questions. There is a force, to my mind, in the Greek, which is lost in the translation, which drags in the word 'about.' There is nothing parallel to it in the Greek, which is, "Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's?" The way to worship God is to get heartily into it. "Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee; in whose heart are Thy ways." Our Lord, when He went into the temple, became engrossed with its worship and teaching, and that was His answer to Mary. He did as good as say, "Wist ye not that I was absorbed in My Father's? I did not know you were gone; I forgot all about you. Wist ye not that My soul was in My Father's? I was so taken up with what I was learning from the doctors and what I was seeing in the temple that I could not but remain. Did you not know that? Did you not also become absorbed?" He seemed to think they might have been as interested as He; and they would have been if they had borne the same relation to God as He did.

Besides, the holy child declares that He was under a necessity to be in it. "Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's?" He could not help Himself. Christ could never be a half-hearted pupil or a lukewarm worshipper. It was not possible for Him to be that. He must get absorbed in it; drawn right into the blessed whirlpool; He must be lost in it, and give His whole thought and attention to it; and He tells His mother so. "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" Other things did not interest the holy child, but this thing absorbed Him.

You know the story of Alexander, that when the Persian ambassadors came to his father's court, little Alexander asked them many questions, but they were not at all such as boys generally think of. He did not ask them to describe to him the throne of ivory, nor the hanging gardens of Babylon, nor anything as to the gorgeous apparel of the king; but he asked what weapons the Persians used in battle, in what form they marched, and how far it was to their country; for the boy Alexander felt the man Alexander within him, and he had presentiments that he was the man who would conquer Persia and show them another way of fighting that would make them turn their backs before him. It is a singular parallel to the case of the child Jesus, who is taken up with nothing but what is His Father's; because it was for Him to do His Father's work, and to live for His Father's glory, and to execute His Father's purpose even to the last.

IV. Let us, lastly, learn this holy child's SPECIAL LESSON to those of us who are seekers. Do I address any children of God who have lost sight of Christ? It does happen at times that we miss the Holy Child, and it happens oftenest when we are happy in company, and so are taken off from Him. Mary and Joseph were, no doubt, delighted with the festival, and so they forgot Jesus. You and I, when in God's house, may forget the Lord of the house. Did you never lose Him at His own table? Did you never lose Him while engaged in His work? Have you never missed Him even while you were busy with holy things? When you do, perhaps you will say to Him, "Lord, I have sought Thee long; I have been among Thy kinsfolk." His answer is, "Wherefore have you sought Me? He is not lost to those who long for Him."

Mark, dearly beloved ones, if you and I want to find our Lord

WE KNOW WHERE HE IS.

Do we not? He is at His Father's. Let us go unto His Father's; let us go to our Father and His Father, and let us speak with God and ask Him where Jesus is if we have lost His company. We may be sure that He is in His Father's work. We are sure of that. Let us go to work for Him again. Do not let us say, "I feel so dull I cannot pray." Now is the time in which we must pray. "But I do not feel as if I could praise Him." Now is the time when you must praise Him, and the praise will come while you are praising.

At times we have no heart for holy exercises, and the devil says, "Do not go." My dear friend, be sure to go up to the assembly now; go to get the heart for going. Does Satan say with regard to private prayer, "You have not the spirit of prayer; you must not pray?" Tell the devil you are going to pray for the spirit of prayer; and that you will plead till you get it. It is a sign of sickness when you cannot pray, and surely then you should go to the doctor. If there is ever a time when a man should pray more than usual, it is when he feels dead and cold in the holy engagement; go and seek Jesus at the Father's, and seek Him in the Father's work, and those of you who have lost communion with Him will find it again.

One more word, and that is to sinners who are seeking Christ. I would not say a word to discourage any who are seeking Jesus, but I should like to get them far beyond the stage of seeking. Perhaps the Holy Spirit will help them to do so if I read Christ's word to them. "How is it that ye sought Me?" Dear, dear! That is indeed a turning of things upside down. Our Lord Jesus has come into the world to seek and to save the lost, and is it not an odd thing when those who are lost get seeking Him? That is a reversal of all order. "How is it," says He, "that ye sought Me?" Now, if I this morning am a poor, lost sinner, and can honestly say I am seeking Christ, there must be some blunder somewhere! How can this be? How shall I make head or tail of it? Here is a sheep seeking the shepherd. A lost piece of silver seeking its owner. How can this be?

It will all come right if you will just think of this, first, that Jesus Christ is not far away. He is in the Father's house.

"WHERE IS THE FATHER'S HOUSE?"

Why, all around us! The great Father's house covers the whole world, and all the stars; He lives everywhere. He dwelleth not in temples made with hands, like this Tabernacle, or yon cathedral; the Lord God is outside in the fields, and in the streets; wherever you seek Him. What are you looking for, man? Are you seeking for some spirit of the night, or spectre of darkness? An old man of my acquaintance in great distress was looking for his spectacles. Dear good man, he could not have seen if he had not had them on, and he was looking through his spectacles and by their aid to find them. So many a soul is looking after Christ by the grace which they have received in Him. Jesus is near. Believe in Him.

Recollect also another thing, that Christ must be about His Father's business. And

WHAT IS HIS FATHER'S BUSINESS?

Why, to save sinners. This is his great Father's delight. He is glad to bring His prodigals home. Are you seeking Jesus as if He would not be found, as if it were hard to make Him hear, and difficult to win His help? Why, He is busy in saving sinners. Jesus sits on Zion's hill; He receives poor sinners still. Be encouraged, and do not go about among your kinsfolk seeking Him, nor with bitter tears and cries of despair look for Him as if He were hiding away from you. He is not far from any one of us. He stands before you, and He bids you trust Him. Look to Him and be saved. Do you look? You are saved. Go on your way rejoicing. God bless you. Amen.

DANGER OF PAN-ISLAMISM.

By Sir Richard Temple, Bart. G.C.S.I., D.C.L., lately Governor of Bombay, India.

THERE has been for some years past, and there still is, a stir among the Mahomedan nations of the world. It is called "Pan-Islamism" by Europeans; the word "Islam" meaning the Mahomedan religion. As is well known, the Slavs of Europe, or their political leaders, have recently been writing and speaking of "Pan-Slavism." This implies a general union among the Slavs living in Russia, in Austria, in European Turkey. In the same way "Pan-Islamism" implies a general union among Mahomedans dwelling in the various countries of Asia and in some parts of Africa. This Pan-Islamism, then, is a real movement, though perhaps it has not gone very far as yet. But no man can say to what lengths it may go. At all events it deserves the watchful attention of Christians.

England is now the greatest Mahomedan Power in the world. Englishmen may perhaps be surprised to hear that, but it is the case. While England has been busy with her fields and her factories, her trade, her ships, and her colonies, her sons have, within the last generation, raised up for her a dominion among the Asiatic Mahomedans. In the presence of that Anglo-Mahomedan dominion, the Sultan of Constantinople, the Shah of Persia, the Grand Scherif of Mecca, and the Viceroy of Egypt must droop their flags. There are in India and Ceylon fifty millions of Mahomedans subjects or feudatories of the British Queen. In Afghanistan, Beluchistan, and other places there are ten millions more under the political control of England. On the whole, then, the Anglo-Mahomedan dominion includes about sixty millions of souls. As compared with that, the other Mahomedan Powers of Asia have altogether only thirty-two millions. In Egypt and the rest of Africa there may be millions of Mahomedans.

But it may be said that the mere numbers of the population prove little. What is the power and wealth of the Anglo-Mahomedans as compared with that of the other Mahomedans? Well, as regards power, it is impossible to distinguish the Anglo-Mahomedan power from that of England herself. To describe the effective might of such a power, as compared with other nations, might savor of national vanity. We need not, therefore, dwell upon that. But as regards wealth we may remark that the agriculture of the Mahomedan peasantry of India, the navigation in the hands of her Mahomedan sailors and boatmen, the trade conducted by her Mahomedan traders, greatly exceed anything that can be shown by any other Mahommedan nation, indeed, by all other nations together.

Moreover, the Anglo-Mahommedan population is increasing fast, whereas in Turkey and Persia it is understood to be decreasing.

In all the counsels of political Mahommedanism, then, the British Sovereign is entitled to a place in the very first rank, as representing the largest and richest Mahommedan population in the world.

In India the mass of the Mahommedans are peaceful, industrious, and loyal. It is well that Englishmen should realize this great fact. But it is also necessary for them to remember that among these generally sober-minded Mahommedans there are many persons of a different stamp. These are bigoted, and even desperate; and nothing that we can offer will pacify them. Therefore Mahommedan troubles have from time to time arisen in India. The assassination of Chief Justice Norman, at Calcutta, and of Lord Mayo, at Port Blair in 1872-73, are instances fresh in the public memory. Bad as these events were, even worse things might possibly happen if England were to fall asleep.

It may then be asked, "Why are the Mahommedans bestirring themselves in these days, and what is it that they are thinking about?"

Well, outside India, they feel that they are politically decaying. They can no longer help seeing the strides which the Christian nations are making in wealth, power, and civilization. Thus they dread the advance of Christendom. The leaders among them look back wistfully to the great days when the Mahommedan Crescent drove back or bore down the Cross in many of the fairest and holiest regions of the earth. When the Cross rallied under the Christian warriors, such as Charles Martel, of France, and John Sobieski, of Poland, and stopped the Crescent in its career, Mahommedans comforted themselves with the thought that South-eastern Europe, Northern Africa, and a goodly part of Asia still remained to Islam. They perceive, however, that within the last hundred years the Christian power has been making inroads upon Mahommedanism in all directions. Now, however, they are becoming aroused by the idea that Christian influence and authority are drawing so near as to threaten the very existence of Islam itself. The alarm is gradually growing in their minds. This alarm refers in the first place to their political power, but in the second place to their religion also.

Meanwhile they are becoming very uneasy under the prospect, and are thinking that some plunging struggle must be tried. Instead of looking their misfortunes quietly in the face, and devising really workable remedies, they seem to believe that the first thing needful is to restore the energies of their religion. The Wahabi revival in Arabia, of which the public has heard much, was an attempt of this nature. It is likely that similar movements may arise in various quarters; indeed, they are springing up already.

There might then be a rising in Egypt or some other part of the Mahommedan world, outside the Anglo-Mahommedan dominion above described. Such a combined movement would manifestly affect British interests. It would of itself be serious indeed; still England is quite mighty enough to withstand or overcome it, if only she were left to herself. But would she be let alone? Obviously not. Other Christian Powers would be naturally jealous of her acting singly. They would lift up their voices and put in their claims. Thus political complications would arise. In the midst of such complications any rash proceedings on the part of one or other of the Christian Powers might bring on a deadly quarrel in Christendom itself about the affairs of the Mahommedan world. That would indeed be an unseemly spectacle to be exhibited by Christianity in the presence of the heathen.

LIEUTENANT DE LONG.

GEORGE WASHINGTON DE LONG, the commander of the Jeannette, was born in New York in 1844. He was an only child, and his parents dying in his early childhood, he was left quite alone in the world and was reared by strangers. His intelligence, self-reliance, and unwearied industry won him many friends, among whom was Congressman Benjamin Wood, who procured for him an appointment in the Naval Academy. His success from that time was rapid. He graduated in 1865, and was promoted to ensign December 1st, 1866; master, March 12th, 1868, and lieutenant, March 26th, 1869.

"He was connected with the Polaris search expedition in 1873," says the writer of his obituary published in the New York Herald, "as navigator of the United States steamer Juniata, commanded by Captain D. L. Braine. Lieutenant De Long on that cruise accomplished a most perilous undertaking. At Upernavik, Greenland, he superintended the fitting out of the steam launch Little Juniata, a boat about thirty-five feet long, and with a picked crew clad in seal-skins, and with provisions and coal, started further north in search of the missing vessel Polaris and Captain Buddington's party. He attempted to cross Melville Bay as far as Cape York by hugging the coast, but finding himself obstructed by ice he was obliged to put back several times. He finally struck a 'true lead' (a channel way through the ice) and laid his course for Cape York.

"The fifth day out from the vessel a terrific gale sprang up while the boat was under sail, which had been resorted to the day previous to save fuel. For thirty hours they battled with this Arctic gale, more terrible than anything in the lower latitudes, and were threatened with destruction by the hundreds of toppling and crashing icebergs around them. When the gale subsided they found themselves in sight of Cape York, which was only eight miles distant. De Long desired to push on in further search, but as it was impossible to get over the ice to the land, and having imperative orders from Captain Braine to return when the fuel was half consumed, there was no alternative, and he reluctantly returned.

"De Long had been an enthusiast on the subject of Arctic exploration since his return from the cruise in the Juniata. He made a study of the literature of the subject after that expedition was over, and the interest in the problem of the frozen North which that experience fostered never faltered in the mind of the young naval officer. He had the faculty of inspiring others with something of the same interest in Arctic exploration which he felt, and no one was more earnest and persevering in preparing for the Jeannette expedition than he who was to command the unfortunate vessel.

"Lieutenant De Long leaves a widow and one child, his daughter Silvie, for whom a mountain in the Arctic regions was named. Mrs. De Long is the daughter of Captain James A. Wotton, of New York. He commanded the steamer Fulton, one of the American line of passenger vessels plying between this port and Havre, until 1868, when Captain Wotton retired from the service and removed to Havre, France, to become the agent of the company in Europe. His house was always open to Americans visiting Havre, and many of his countrymen, especially naval officers, were in the habit of enjoying his hospitality. It was in this way that Captain De Long became acquainted with one of Captain Wotton's two daughters. The friendship ripened into love, and in 1870, while on leave of absence in this country, the young naval officer returned to Havre for the purpose of making the elder Miss Wotton his wife.

"Captain De Long had a sincere affection for his wife and child, and since his marriage, in 1870, had managed, whenever it was possible in the exigencies of a naval officer's life, to have them with him wherever he was stationed. He was so fortunate as to have them with him the greater part of the time, and when, in 1879, he brought the Jeannette from Havre to San Francisco to prepare for her cruise in the Arctic, Mrs. De Long accompanied him upon the voyage. He always expected to return in safety from the fatal expedition. He told his wife never to give him up, and his last letters to her are buoyant with hopes that were never realized.

"De Long was a man of fine appearance and of splendid physique. He was six feet in height, weight 170 or 180 pounds, and was of a vigorous constitution and athletic frame. One who knew him intimately says of him that he was a gentleman of charming manners and an interesting, brilliant conversationalist. He was an acute observer of men and things, and in his travels had acquired a fund of valuable information. He took great pride and pleasure in his profession and was a close student and an industrious reader. The notes found on his dead body and the testimony of his comrades prove him to have been a man of deep religious feeling, and of a faith that in his overwhelming troubles and in his terrible death never wavered."

Lieutenant Charles W. Chipp, U. S. N., whose portrait we give, was the commander of the third boat, which it is feared foundered in the gale. No intelligence could be found of him by Melville, who searched the coast hoping to discover some relics of his boat. Lieutenant Chipp was second in command, and was born in Kingston, N. Y. He was the companion of De Long in his perilous journey in the Little Juniata in Melville Bay. During his career in the navy he fought in the Korean war, served long on the Asiatic station, and was in Santiago de Cuba during the Virginius excitement.

Past Assistant Engineer George W. Melville was born in New York City in January, 1841. He, like the first two officers, has had previous Arctic experience. He was engineer on the Tigress during her cruise after Buddington and his party from the Polaris. He served on the Chattanooga during the war, and had, when he left with the Jeannette, twelve years of sea service to his credit. He is now on his way back to this country, having conducted the search for his comrades to its final issue.

A Mysterious Document.

CAPTAIN MURRAY'S OFFENCE.

The mail at Emsley Lodge contained a number of letters on all kinds of subjects. Since Mr. Emsley's marriage the social kind of correspondence had largely increased. Edith Murray was a society belle, and when Edward Emsley married her, a large accession to his circle of acquaintance was made.

I was Mr. Emsley's private secretary and had been in his father's employ in a similar capacity before the old man died, and when Edward was a young man at college.

One morning about a year after Mr. Emsley's marriage an unusually heavy mail came in, and our consultation was continued longer than was customary. Mrs. Emsley had risen from the breakfast-table saying that she was going to the city, and Mr. Emsley asked her to come in before she started as he wanted her to discharge a commission for him. She returned in a short time and then Mr. Emsley opened a package and drew out a number of papers. He separated them and selected from among them one oblong strip. "Edith," he said, "I wish you would ask your brother Walter to come here as soon as he can, I find that some one has robbed me and I think he can help me to discover the guilty party."

Mrs. Emsley said, "I should not think very highly of Walter's genius as a detective, but I will certainly ask him to call."

"I do not want Walter to act as a detective at all," Mr. Emsley said, "but he may know who is likely to have performed this piece of rascality. This cheque has come from my bankers with others; and though the writing is so like mine that I could not swear it was not mine, yet I know I never wrote it, and I have been to the bank to inquire to whom it was paid. It appears that an officer in Walter's regiment collected it, and I thought he might give me some clue to the man."

I noticed that Mrs. Emsley's face wore a look of deep concern at this explanation, and as I rose to go to my own room I detected a glance in her eyes that I was sure was one of apprehension. I knew something of Captain Walter Murray, and I had heard that he was fast becoming an inveterate gambler. It crossed my mind when I saw Mrs. Emsley's perturbation that she suspected her brother of the crime. The cheque was for six hundred and fifty dollars, and I was too well acquainted with my employer's business not to be perfectly sure, as he was, that the document was a forgery.

Mrs. Emsley returned later in the day with a message that her brother had promised to make inquiries and would call at Emsley Lodge. It turned out, however, that the message was only a ruse to gain time, for in less than a week afterward Captain Walter Murray was missing and it was reported that he had gone to Europe. Then a disclosure took place, and Mr. Emsley knew that it was his wife's brother who had robbed him.

About two weeks after Captain Murray absconded I was instructed by my employer to go quietly among the Captain's set and if possible get a thorough knowledge of his affairs. The task was not a pleasant one, but I did my best with it, and as people are always ready to talk against an absent wrongdoer I had no difficulty in soon learning all the Captain's faults and offences. It was easy to see that he had been a victim to the wiles of clever schemers who inveigled him into gambling houses and stripped him of his last dollar. Then, like all weak men, he had borrowed money to continue his play in the hope of winning back some of his losses, which is always a vain hope. He had become involved so seriously that in a moment of reckless desperation he committed the forgery of his brother-in-law's name, and used money belonging to his regiment temporarily in his keeping. I learned all this easily and found that there was more sympathy for him among those who knew all the facts than I expected.

On making my report to Mr. Emsley I saw that the revelation was a relief to him, and he immediately gave me instructions to make good the Captain's defalcations, supplying me at the same time with funds for the purpose. Nor did his good work stop there. He was bent on the reclamation of the defaulter. He found out a clergyman who was about to start on a tour in Europe, and acquainting him with the whole story, he begged him to seek out the young man and use his influence in restoring him. The clergyman, guided by a clue I was able to furnish him, traced the young man to England, where, having neither money nor friends, he had enlisted in the army, in a regiment which had been despatched to Africa, where England was then engaged in war with the Zulus. The clergyman was not in time to see him before he sailed, but sent a letter to him by the next mail and also a letter to the chaplain of the regiment asking his interest in the young American.

No more was heard of Captain Murray for several months, but at length a letter came from Africa. I recollect well the morning of its arrival. Mr. Emsley opened it eagerly and then his face fell. The young man was dead. There was a letter from him written the day before he died, full of gratitude for his brother-in-law's kindness, news of which had followed him to Africa. The letter was dated from a hospital where he lay dying of a fever, and he said that the chaplain had promised to write particulars he was then too weak to give.

The chaplain's narrative we did not get until the clergyman returned from Europe who had undertaken the duty of tracing the young man. It was as joyful as it was pathetic. The young American had attracted the chaplain's notice on the voyage to the seat of war by the superiority of his manner and education over his English comrades, and he had won his confidence and learned his history. Remorse filled his heart, and the chaplain had, after many prayers and much pleading been enabled to lead him a penitent to the Saviour. Soon after the arrival in Africa the young man was seized with fever, and while he lay ill, news came of Mr. Emsley's kindness. Then his cup of happiness seemed to run over and he died rejoicing in the consciousness of forgiveness by God and man. His last prayer had been for his sister Edith, that she and her husband who had pitied him in his sin and disgrace might know the same joy that in his last hours filled his soul. That prayer was answered. It was not long before Mrs. Emsley, touched by her dying brother's solicitude on her behalf, was led to earnest inquiry, and first she, and then through her instrumentality her husband, accepted Christ as a Saviour. Thus the act of mercy and pity toward a fallen man led to a blessing of which eternity alone can show the fulness, but which this life has already given an earnest, in peace and joy never enjoyed in the gaieties and pleasures of their former life in the world.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

His Own Children.

THOUGH Phebe telegraphed at once to Canon Pascal, she did not stay in Engelberg till he and Felix could reach her, lest they should urge the burial of Felicity's corpse beside her husband's. She hastened down with her sad charge to Lucerne, and met them there. The tidings of Felicity's death spread rapidly in England. Its suddenness, and the circumstance of its occurring in the Alpine village where her husband had perished, gave it more than ordinary interest. It was naturally discussed in literary circles, and the fashionable clique to which the Riversfords belonged. There were the usual kindly notices of her life and works in the daily papers; and her publisher seized the occasion to advertise her books more largely.

But it was in Riversborough that the deepest impression was made, and the keenest curiosity aroused by the story of her death, obscure in some of its details, but full of romantic interest to her old townspeople, who were thus recalled to the circumstances attending Roland Sefton's disappearance, and subsequent death. The funeral, also, was to be in the immediate neighborhood, in the church where all the Riversfords had been buried time out of mind, long before a title had been conferred on the head of the house. It appeared quite right that Felicity should be buried among her own people; and every one who could get away from business went down to the little country churchyard to be present at the funeral.

But Phebe was not there; when she reached London she was so worn-out that she was compelled to remain at home, brooding over what she had come through. And Jean Merle had not trusted himself to look into the open grave, about to close over all that remained of the woman he had so passionately loved. The tolling of the minute-bell, which began early in the day, and struck its deep knell through the tardy hours till late in the evening, smote upon his ear and heart every time the solemn tone sounded through the quiet house. He was left alone in his old home, for Mr. Clifford was gone as one of the mourners to follow Felicity to the grave, and all the servants had asked to be present at the funeral. There was nothing to demand his attention, or to distract his thoughts. The home was as silent as if it had been the home of death, and he but a phantom in it.

Though he had been six months in the house, he had never yet been into Felicity's study; that quiet room shut out from the noise both of the street and the household, which he had set apart and prepared for her, when she was coming, stepping down a little from her own level, to be his wife. It was dismantled he knew; her books were gone, and all the costly decorative fittings he had chosen with so much joyous anxiety. But the panelled walls which he had worked at with his own hands were there, and the window, with its delicately-tinted lattice panes, through which the sun had shone in daintily upon her at her desk. He went slowly up the long staircase, pausing now and then lost in thought; and standing at last before the door, which he had never opened without asking permission to enter, he hesitated for many minutes before he went in.

In addition to all the other constant calls upon her, Phebe was plunged into the preparations needed for Felix's marriage, which was to take place before they left England. There was no reason to defer it for lack of means, as Felix had inherited his share of his mother's marriage settlement. But Phebe drew largely on her own resources to send out for them the complete furnishing of a house as full of comfort, and as far as possible as full of real beauty, as their Essex rectory had been. She almost stripped her studio of the sketches and the finished pictures which Felix and Hilda had admired, sighing sometimes and smiling sometimes, as they vanished from her sight into the packing-cases, for the times that were gone by, and for the pleasant surprises that would greet them in that far-off land, when their eyes fell upon the old favorites from home.

Felix and Hilda spent a few days at Riversborough with Mr. Clifford; but Phebe would not go with them, in spite of their earnest desire; and Jean Merle, their kinsman, was absent, only coming home the night before they bade their last farewell to their birthplace. He appeared to them a very silent and melancholy man, keeping himself quite in the background, and unwilling to talk much about his own country, or his relationship with their grandmother's family.

But they had not time to pay much attention to him; the engrossing interest of spending the last few hours amid these familiar places, so often and so fondly to be remembered in the coming years, made them less regardful of this stranger, who was watching them with undivided and despairing interest. No word or look escaped him, as he accompanied them from room to room, and about the garden walks, unable to keep himself away from this unspeakable torture. Mr. Clifford wept, as old men weep, when they bade him good-by; but Felix was astonished by the fixed and mournful expression of inward anguish in Jean Merle's eyes, as he held his hand in a grasp that would not let him go.

"I may never see you again," he said; "but I shall hear of you?"

"Yes," answered Felix; "we shall write frequently to Mr. Clifford, and you will answer our letters for him."

"God bless you!" said Jean Merle; "God grant that you may be a truer man, and a happier man, than your father was."

Felix started. This man, then, knew of his father's crime; probably knew more of it than he did. But there was no time to question him now; and what good would it do to hear more than he knew already? Hilda was standing near to him, waiting to say good-by, and Jean Merle, turning to her, took her into his arms, and pressed her closely to his heart. A sudden impulse prompted her to put her arm round his neck as she had done round old Mr. Clifford's, and to lift up her face for his kiss. He held her in his embrace for a few moments, and then, without another word spoken to them, he left them, and they saw him no more.

The marriage was celebrated a few days after this visit, and not long before the time fixed for the bishop and his large band of emigrants to sail. Under these circumstances the ceremony was a quiet one. The old rectory was in disorder, littered with packing cases, and upset from cellar to garret. Even when the wedding was over, both Phebe and Hilda were too busy for sentimental indulgence. The few remaining days were flying swiftly past them all, and keeping them in constant fear that there would not be time enough for all that had to be done.

But the last morning came, when Phebe found herself standing amid all those who were so dear to her on the landing-stage, with but a few minutes more before they parted from her for years, if not for ever. Bishop Pascal was already gone on board the steamer standing out in the river, where the greater number of emigrants had assembled. But Felix and Alice and Hilda lingered about Phebe till the last moment. Yet they said but little to one another; what could they say which would tell half the love, or half the sorrow they felt? Phebe's heart was full. How gladly would she have gone out with these dear children, even if she left behind her her little birth-place on the hills, if it had not been for Mr. Clifford and Jean Merle!

It was early in June, and the days were at the longest. Never before had Phebe found the daylight too long, but now it shone only upon dismantled and disordered rooms, which reminded her too sharply of the separation and departure they indicated.

What was she to do with herself? Quite close at hand was the day when she would be absolutely homeless; but in the absorbing interest with which she had thrown herself into the affairs of those who were gone, she had formed no plans for her own future. There was her profession, of course; that would give her employment and bring in a larger income than she needed with her simple wants. But how was she to do without a home, she who most needed to fill a home with all the sweet charities of life?

She had never felt before what it was to be altogether without ties of kinship to any fellow-being. This incompleteness in her lot had been perfectly filled up by her relationship with the whole family of the Seftons. She had found in them all that was required for the full development and exercise of her natural affections. But she had lost them. Death and the chance changes of life had taken them from her; and there was not one human creature in the world on whom she possessed the claim of being of the same blood.

Phebe could not stay amid the crowds of London with such a thought oppressing her. This heart-sickness and loneliness made the busy streets utterly distasteful to her. To be here, with millions around her, all strangers, was intolerable. There was her own little homestead, surrounded by familiar scenes, where she would seek rest and quiet before laying any plans for herself. She put her affairs into the hands of a house-agent, and set out alone upon her yearly visit to her farm, which until now Felix and Hilda had always shared.

She stayed on her way to spend a night at Riversborough, her usual custom, that she might reach the unprepared house on the moor early in the day. But she would not prolong her stay; there was a fatigue and depression about her, which she said could only be dispelled by the sweet fresh air of her native moorlands.

"Felix and Hilda have been more to me than any words could tell," she said to Mr. Clifford and Jean Merle, "and now I have lost them I feel, as if more than half my life was gone. I must get away by myself into my old home, where I began my life, and readjust it as well as I can. I shall do it best there, with nothing to distract me. You need not fear my wishing to be too long alone."

"We ought to have let you go," answered Mr. Clifford; "Jean Merle said we ought to let you go with them. But how could we part with you, Phebe?"

"I should not have been happy," she said, sighing, "as long as you need me most; you two. And I owe all I am to Jean Merle himself."

The homely little cottage, with its thatched roof and small lattice windows, was more welcome to her than any other dwelling could have been. Now her world had suffered such a change it was pleasant to come here, where nothing had been altered since her childhood. Both within and without the old home was as unchanged as the beautiful outlines of the hills around, and the blue vault of the sky above. Here she might live over again the past, the whole past. She was a woman, with a woman's sad experience of life; but there was much of the girl, even of the child, left in Phebe Marlowe still; and no spot on earth could have brought back her youth to her as this inheritance of hers. There was an unspoiled simplicity about her, which neither time nor change could destroy; the childishness of one who had entered into the kingdom of heaven.

It was a year since she had been here last, with Hilda in her first grief for her mother's death; and everywhere she found traces of Jean Merle's handiwork. The half-shaped blocks of wood left unfinished for years in her father's workshop were completed. The hawk, hovering over its prey, which the dumb old wood-carver had begun as a symbol of the feeling of vengeance he could not give utterance to, when brooding over Roland Sefton's crime, had been brought to a marvellous perfection by Jean Merle's practised hand, and it had been placed by him under the crucifix which old Marlowe had fastened in the window-frame, where the last rays of daylight fell upon the bowed face hidden by the crown of thorns. The first night that Phebe sat alone on the old hearth, her eyes rested upon these until the daylight faded away and the darkness shut them out of her sight. Had Jean Merle known what he did when he laid this emblem of vengeance beneath the symbol of perfect love and sacrifice?

But after a few days, when she had visited every place of yearly pilgrimage knitting up the slackened threads of memory, Phebe began to realize the ter- rible solitude of this isolated home of hers. To live again where no step passed by, and no voice spoke to her, where not even the smoke of a household hearth floated up into the sky, was intolerable to her genial nature, which was only satisfied in helpful and pleasant human intercourse. The utter silence became irksome to her, as it had been in her girlhood; but even then she had possessed the companionship of her dumb father. Now there was not merely silence, but utter loneliness.

The necessity of forming some definite plan for her future life became every day a more pressing obligation. Until now she had met with no difficulty in deciding what she ought to do; her path of duty had been clearly traced for her. But there was neither call of duty now, nor any strong inclination to lead her to choose one thing more than any other. All whom she loved had gone from London, and this small solitary home had grown all too narrow in its occupations to satisfy her nature. Mr. Clifford himself did not need her constant companionship as he would have done if Jean Merle had not been living with him. She was perfectly free to do what she pleased, and go where she pleased; but to no human being could such a freedom be more oppressive than to Phebe Marlowe.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

S.S. Lesson for July 30, Mark II : 1-11. Golden Text, Zech. 9 : 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Christian Worker's Duty—Where he Finds Bound Ones—The Effect of the Loosing—The Real Work of an Evangelist—The Lord's Need—Jesus Visible while the Colt was Hidden—A Great Triumph—Is Jesus Our King?—Where were the Multitude?

AFTER the healing of Bartimeus, "when they came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethpage, and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives, He sendeth forth two of His disciples, and saith unto them, Go your way into the village over against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon never man sat; loose him, and bring him." It was an unusual and might have seemed a questionable errand, but Jesus made provision for any difficulty which might arise. "If any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him; and straightway he will send him hither." This is a lesson for every evangelist or Christian worker. Our first duty is to untie those who are bound, to loose them and bring them to Jesus. We find them, as these disciples found the colt, "in a place where two ways meet." The wrong way and the right way, the way of death and the way of life, the broad way and the narrow, meet before the feet of the unsaved. They are on the broad way, but the other way lies open, and runs out of this one.

The work of an evangelist is to get souls

from the place where they are, from their old life, associations, tastes, desires. It is not enough to bring them to faith in the atoning blood of Christ where they are, and leave them to carry on their own life of ease and comfort, with the addition of some measure of spiritual life, which may render a little Christian work easily done a new interest to them a new way of occupying their time. No, God wants a man to be revolutionized, to give himself completely up to God, to be another man than he was before, so that it could be said of him, he is become "a new creature, old things have passed away, behold all things are become new" (2 Cor. 5 : 17). If this is so, then the former votary of fashion is to be loosed from the world's fashion, and made a striking witness for God's fashion, i.e., "modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety;" and against "brodered hair, or gold or pearls or costly array" (2 Tim. 2 : 9). The former pleasure lover, who spent all he had upon himself, is to be loosed from his self-indulgence, and to become God's chosen witness of the Christian vocation, viz., to live not unto ourselves but unto Him which died for us and rose again. The money lover is to be loosed from his golden idol and ready, like Zaccheus to give away half his goods; nay more, like the early Christians, to abstain from saying of aught that he possesses that it is his own. The man who made his position in society his idol, is to be loosed from it, and made willing to take the lowest place.

The real work of an evangelist is to capture men for Jesus, and in answer to all the stir and tumult of those who do not like the world to be turned upside down, to have but one answer, "The Lord hath need of him." It is time the Lord's claims were advocated; we have had enough of easy going religion, easy going work for God, spasmodic efforts just when it is the thing, of speaking in the aftermeetings when Mr. Moody was in London because Lady So-and-So did it, working in a church mission because such and such a distinguished person was there. But do we find these spasmodic workers sticking to it at all times, coming into hand to hand fights with the devil, when the slaves of drink, of lust, of morphia, or of all three, come and ask if there is salvation for such as they? Are such workers to be counted upon? Do they go with their life in their hands, regardless of comfort, honor, health, or aught else, wherever the Lord calls them?

You may say, "But what evangelist has power to cut souls loose from all these trammels? Not one in himself, but he also as 'a man sent from God' goes forth to do God's work in God's strength; let him once see that God calls men completely out from the world, to be not of the world as He is not of the world (John 17 : 14, 16), and there will be a boldness in his assertion of the Master's claims which will overpower the adversaries. He will not make his appeals on the ground of self-interest, but on the ground of God's right over His creatures. 'The Lord hath need of him.'"

Reader, whoever you are, the Lord hath need of thee, of thy spirit, soul, and body, time, influence, money, children, friends, thy all. Wilt thou surrender all to Him? Two ways meet before thee, first, the way of unreserved consecration to Christ in a path which is unpopular; the way of being misunderstood, despised, and singular as far as earth is concerned, but which is full of the blessed sunshine of God's presence, which brings "a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward man" (Acts 24 : 16), which makes you a blessing to many, and removes from you all fear; secondly, the way of self, whether in open sin, or as a believer in compromise with the world. This is the popular way; but in treading it, who knows you to be a Christian? You often doubt it yourself. What power have you to bless others? what peace have you in your own soul? Are you not paying too heavy a price for the worthless approbation of a condemned world, against whose godless follies you have been called to bear witness?

The two disciples did as they were told, and to every question made them, they returned the answer, "The Lord hath need of him." O how much stronger than any argument is this simple assertion of God's claim. "Why are you so peculiar? why need you be so different from other people?" is often asked. Here is the answer, "That the name of my God may be hallowed in me, that His kingdom may come and His will be done in me." "But you don't think there is any harm in amusements or such and such simple indulgences?" "The Lord has need of me for another purpose" is sufficient answer,

"I AM AT HIS DISPOSAL."

They brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him; and He sat upon him. The colt had never been broken in, but the presence of Jesus did it. He can better use those whom man has not broken into the false notions and the false standards of truth and life which are current. And as Jesus sat upon him, Jesus was raised by means of the colt above the heads of the people; He could be seen and heard by all, but the colt which thus raised Him was hidden out of sight. This is our place; hidden, lost, unperceived; but raising Jesus into prominence; instruments by which He may be seen and heard, not we. "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3 : 30) said His great forerunner, and this is our constant privilege as His disciples.

The Apostle Paul had no shame in naming himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles"

(Eph. 3 : 1). He wrote to the Philippian, "If I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith I joy and rejoice with you all" (Phil. 2 : 17). Let the church live, let Paul die, he was but material to be used up, as God willed, for the cause he served. Moses was ready to be blotted out of God's book, rather than that the cause of God's people should suffer (Ex. 32 : 32).

The example of the disciples was contagious. They had spread their garments upon the colt, the multitude spread theirs in the way. O how easy it is to be generous in a moment of enthusiasm, when one is surrounded by those of a like spirit! But that which God prizes is the continual keeping of ourselves upon His altar. There was that day; it would seem as though the multitude did at last recognize their Messiah, for cries of "Hosanna" (save now) rang through the air, and the shout of the people took up the prophecy of the hundred and eighteenth psalm, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." And then again, "Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest." This was the king, then the kingdom was at hand, then they would be saved now. But what kingdom and what salvation? Alas, alas, earth bounded their horizon, an earthly kingdom and an earthly deliverance from the Roman yoke were the utmost of their desires. It was a short-lived triumph, they knew not the way of the cross, nor did they know from how much they needed to be delivered.

Is Jesus our king? Then let us claim His kingly power. He reigns over all creation, all things are subject to His sway, because He is universal Sovereign, let us live in one continual Hosanna, one constant deliverance from sin, self, the world and sickness, that the exercise of His power may be known in the world which He has created. Instead of being conquered by difficulties and temptations, let our cry and our expectation be

"SAVE NOW."

Let every circumstance, as it arises, be an opportunity for the intervention and the conquest of our King. He has made us responsible by the exercise of faith to let Him work or to hinder Him; and He is as willing to exercise His power in small things as in great, in waking His child for prayer in the morning, as in pouring out the power of His Spirit upon a meeting; in enabling a forgetful servant to remember some injunction, as in bringing thousands of sinners to His feet; in delivering His trusting child from a slight burn or some small pain, as in healing a disease of years' standing.

"Jesus entered into Jerusalem," His own city, "and into the temple," His own house. The passers by said, "Who is this?" for "all the city was moved" (Matt. 21 : 10). The multitude around Him said, "This is Jesus, the Prophet of Nazareth of Galilee." Was that all? "He came unto His own and His own received Him not" (John 1 : 11). The inhabitants of Jerusalem could not and would not believe that any good thing should come out of Galilee; their prejudices and their pride stood in the way of their intercourse with Jesus. He passed by them and they were not saved now. Was it this which made the multitude which followed Him drop off one by one?

When the eventide was come, He went out to Bethany with the twelve. Where were the multitudes? He had made no political demonstration, had not so much as had an interview with Pontius Pilate (that was yet to come). He had only "looked round upon all things" the earthly hopes of the multitude which for a moment had centred in Jesus, were baffled, and only His few chosen ones remained on the evening of His triumphal entry. Did any one among them recognize the fulfilment of our Golden Text, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold thy King cometh unto thee: He is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass?" Their hopes were set upon the words which follow and which can only be accomplished when the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled (Luke 21 : 24).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Bombardment of the Forts of Alexandria by the British fleet on Tuesday, July 11th, resulted in their demolition. The assurance given to the British admiral, mentioned last week, that no hostilities against the foreign ships in the harbor was intended by Arabi Bey was distrusted by Admiral Seymour. As a test of its sincerity the electric light on the ships was thrown upon the forts at night, when it was discovered that large numbers of men were busily mounting guns and strengthening the defences. A demand was then made by Admiral Seymour that the forts should be surrendered to him, and on that demand being rejected he gave twenty-four hours notice of his intention to bombard the forts. The storm of shot and shell commenced at seven A.M., on Tuesday morning and lasted twelve hours. The Egyptians made a vigorous and well conducted defence, but the heavy guns of the British ships made the contest hopeless. The British had five men killed and twenty-seven wounded. The Egyptian loss has not been ascertained, but is supposed to have been very heavy. On Wednesday Arabi Bey hoisted a flag of truce, which the British admiral respected, and a party was sent to negotiate. On its arrival it was found that Arabi had used the flag as a ruse to stop the British fire while he made his escape with his army.

The Burning of the City of Alexandria was ordered by Arabi Bey before he evacuated it. The convicts in the prison were liberated, among them the ringleaders of the riot of June 11th, when the Europeans were massacred. These men, when the soldiers were withdrawn, commenced the pillage of the city and set fire to the European quarter. Early on Thursday morning a number of persons were seen on the edge of the water of the harbor. Glasses showed them to be Europeans. Boats were at once lowered from the fleet, and crews armed to the teeth started for the shore. They found about one hundred Europeans, many of them wounded, who had gathered in the Anglo-Egyptian Bank and had resisted desperately. They had maintained themselves there throughout the night. Toward daylight their assailants drew off, and the party made their way to the shore. They reported that from the part they were defending they could hear shrieks and cries and the reports of pistols and guns. Scores of fugitives were cut down or beaten to death in their sight. The murders were committed with circumstances of horrible barbarity. Some of the victims with their hands tied behind them and their feet tied together were flung into the burning buildings. It is probable that all the Europeans, with the exception of those who reached the beach, have been slain. A newspaper correspondent in Alexandria telegraphed as follows: "The fact that there is still a large portion of the city in flames prevents any investigations being made; but, from what I hear, the number of Europeans killed will not exceed five hundred. If, however, the estimated loss of life should appear in some cases exaggerated, it is impossible to exaggerate the destruction of property. This is complete and absolute. In the European quarter every house appears to have been sacked before it was fired. The whole population left loaded with European goods." Admiral Seymour was unable to take prompt measures to restore order and stop the sacking of the city as he had only three hundred men at his disposal, and Arabi was reported to be lurking near the city with nine thousand.

The Resignation of the Right Honorable John Bright is announced. He has been the close friend and strenuous supporter of Mr. Gladstone in his home policy, and his defection will be a serious blow to the Cabinet, already weakened by the withdrawal of the Duke of Argyll and Mr. Forster. Mr. Smalley, the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, telegraphs that the real cause of Mr. Bright's resignation was the use of force, which was not defensible on moral grounds. "For forty years," Mr. Bright says, "I have told my countrymen that morals were the true basis of politics. I have denounced war, and I should have been false to my principles had I become a party to a war which was begun without necessity." Mr. Bright was opposed to sending a fleet to Egypt originally for any political purpose. He considered that England had no business to interfere with the internal affairs of Egypt, having no serious interest there except in the Suez Canal, and the canal was never menaced by Arabi or anybody else. He believes that the massacre on the 11th of June was largely provoked by the presence of the English fleet. He regards the continued presence of the fleet, with a constantly increasing number of foreign men-of-war in a friendly harbor as in itself a menace and unfriendly act. The motive of sending them, namely, the protection of English subjects, was a good motive; but matters were so managed that the fleet became a source of danger rather than protection.

Mr. Gladstone's Government has been Severely censured in England and in Europe for its want of foresight in leaving Admiral Seymour with a force too small to check the outbreak of lawlessness in Alexandria. When asked in the House of Commons why the government had not done something to save the lives of the people of Alexandria, especially Europeans, from the violence of the mob, Mr. Gladstone replied that the government could not have anticipated the outbreak. As every one else anticipated that it would follow the bombardment, and as people resident in Egypt had warned the government of its certainty, the neglect adequately to provide for its suppression is culpable, and many lives have been lost and much property destroyed through the negligence.

The Fact that Arabi Bey is not the Leader of a national movement, as has been falsely asserted, but is a mere political adventurer, was proved by an order he issued shortly after the bombardment commenced for the murder of the Khédive. He had previously posted a strong force around his palace as a guard, but before he fled from the city the guard was ordered to enter and kill the Khédive. They were, however, induced by gifts of money to abstain from violence, and at the request of the Khédive a guard of British marines has been supplied from the ships. A proclamation has been issued by the Khédive stating that the British have no designs on the country or the city and he assumes his proper authority. The American admiral sent a force of sixty marines to assist the British in restoring order.

The Bill for the Repression of Crime in Ireland passed its three readings in the House of Lords last week and received the royal assent on July 12th. Sixteen counties, four baronies, and eight cities were promptly proclaimed as under the operation of the act. The House of Commons is engaged in the discussion of the bill to relieve Irish tenants of their arrears of rent. Mr. Gladstone announced that the Government could not hope to pass more than one of the measures proposed for the benefit of England and Scotland owing to the lateness of the session; but he intimated that a special winter session of Parliament would be held to arrange rules of procedure for expediting public business. It is evident that the pressure of Irish business on the time of the Parliament is leading to the conclusion that some portion at least of Irish legislation might be wisely relegated to a council of Irishmen.

The Avalanche which Destroyed a Large part of the Swiss village of Elm last fall has left a gap in the mountain side which shows signs of a further destruction. It is estimated that the mass which fell formed only a hundredth part of the whole mass of the impending earth slip. A Geneva correspondent writes that the final catastrophe cannot long be delayed, but that neither the precise time nor the direction of the inevitable fall can be foretold. Much depends upon the weather during the next few months. Meanwhile, although the people of Elm watch the mountain with extreme solicitude and are always ready for temporary flight, they show no disposition to leave their homes permanently.

A Sermon on the Future of America was recently preached in Westminster Abbey by Canon Farrar on the occasion of uncovering a stained glass window presented by American citizens. In the course of the sermon Canon Farrar pointed out the most imminent danger threatening this country as that of socialistic nihilism. He reminded America as well as England, that the shield of liberty is broad and terrible, the ægis of the nations, but at the same time the shield of men—of vipers, not of hyenas that thirst for blood. "If," he said, "murder and anarchy crouch beneath that shield, let them be dragged out of its sacred shadow. It is the shield of innocence, not of outrage; of obedience, not of assassins. The day has come when neither in panic nor with thirst for vengeance, but, girding her loins for work, all nations, firm yet merciful, Freedom must grasp the sword of her sister Justice, not forgetting that it is a sword of celestial temper and forged in the armory of God. And the day may come when not in blind passion, but with the sternness of inexorable duty, she must with that sword star ready to smite once and smite no more."

A Remarkable Case of Faith Healing thus reported in an English journal: A young lady suffering for thirteen years from an internal tumor and other complaints was pronounced to be incurable after being treated by several doctors belonging to some of the London hospitals. She arrived at Bethshan (the house for faith-healing in London) on a Wednesday, looking more dead than alive and almost unable to speak and had to be carried upstairs. On the following Sunday during an address by Dr. Boardman the words "Himself to our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matthe 8: 17) fastened on her mind. She believed that if Christ bore her sickness it was no longer her and therefore she was healed in Christ. She then rose at once in the midst of Dr. Boardman's address, without waiting to experience any feeling of being healed, and openly testified "Jesus has borne my sickness and it is no longer mine, as therefore I am healed." Then at once she felt through her whole body that she was "healed the plague." Her sensation was that of all illness rolling off her from head to foot down to the very ground. She was able to run upstairs that night and has since been actively helping in her home in the country in domestic arrangements. She is now enjoying excellent health.

A Monk Brought to Christ.—Mr. McAll, Paris, relates that a certain man whom he knew had been a monk in one of the severest orders, Trappists, and for seven years had vainly sought peace and happiness by fasting. The first time that he ever heard the Gospel was in a reunion in Paris. A lady gave him a Bible, which became his constant companion. Though in great poverty, he would not give up reading it, even when by so doing he might have obtained much-needed relief from a nun who sometimes visited him, but would not return, because he said, "This book has done me good. Why am I not to read it? Show me what is wrong in it." He shortly afterwards died of consumption, brought on by the privations of a monastic life; but he told the Christian friends who visited him that he had never prayed with so much fervor nor been so happy as in his cold empty garret where he had learned to love Jesus and read His Word. One day, speaking of being a burden to others, he was cheered by the thought that he was of some use in speaking of those around him of Jesus. His end was perfect peace.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxendale, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers of prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. KINDNESS to the widow and the orphan has always been a work especially pleasing to God, and it has seemed throughout all ages that there was a profound significance and a solemn pledge in the words in which Moses enjoined the duty on the Israelites: "The fatherless and the widow which are within thy gates shall come and shall eat and shall be satisfied; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest" (Deut. 14: 29). The marvellous success which has attended the work of George Muller at Bristol, England, is known throughout the world, and has caused astonishment everywhere; but it does not stand alone. Other men in other countries who have put their hands to the same work in faith have had a measure of the same success. One conspicuous example is that of the eminent German professor whose portrait appears this week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Augustus Herman Franké, was born at Lübeck, Germany, on March 23d, 1663. His father, John Franké, was Doctor of Laws and Curator of the Cathedral of Lübeck; but removed in 1666, with his family, to Gotha, whither he had been invited by Duke Ernest, the Pious, who nominated him superintendent of schools and all ecclesiastical concerns in his dominions. Here he died in 1670, when young Franké was only seven years of age.

The early education of Franké was conducted by his parents, and at the age of thirteen he entered the Gymnasium at Gotha, and soon became distinguished for his scholarly habits and varied acquirements. The year following he was dismissed from the school, as being fit for the university. For the next two years, however, he remained at home, continuing his studies under the direction of a private tutor. He also began at this period to study divinity and philosophy. Having completed his sixteenth year he entered the University of Erfurt, which is situated near Gotha, but he removed to Kiel toward the close of the year, where he was supported by one of his uncles.

PROFICIENCY IN HEBREW.

At Kiel, Franké became intimate with a devout evangelical minister, named Christian Kortholt. He not only attended his theological lectures, but also boarded and lodged with him, had the use of his library, and received special instruction from him in ecclesiastical history. After a three years' residence he removed to Hamburg, in 1682, to place himself under the celebrated Hebrew linguist, Ezra Edzardi. But such was his faculty of acquisition, that after only a two months' residence, he returned to his family at Gotha with a knowledge of the rudiments of the language, and during the following year he read through the Hebrew Bible seven times, and became familiar with every word of it.

Franké had spent about eighteen months in the most diligent application to study, when a student of divinity in Leipzig, of the name of Wichmannshausen, who was very wealthy, desired his companionship and tuition in Hebrew. Franké accepted, and removed to Leipzig in 1684. A year later he took his degree of M.A., and began to deliver lectures, which were numerous attended by the students, and founded what was termed the Philobiblical Society, for the purpose of reading and expounding critically the Word of God.

EARLY RELIGIOUS INFLUENCES.

Though Franké had enjoyed the advantages of a religious training in the house of his parents, it was not until 1687, when he was nearly twenty-five years of age, that he was truly converted to Christ. But as a lad he was always serious and thoughtful, as many thought, even beyond his years. When he was but a boy he requested his mother to provide him with a little room, which he could call his own, for the purposes of silent study and prayer. His request was granted, and as often as he came home from attending his private teacher, he went into his room, closed the door, fell upon his knees, and prayed for whatever his childlike heart prompted him.

The example of his youngest sister, who was a pious girl, three years older than himself, had a beneficial influence upon him. She died early, and after her death he retained a vivid recollection of the many and earnest endeavors she had made to lead him to the Saviour. But these impressions died away, and during the period which he spent at the university, his only object was to increase his store of knowledge; in his own language: "It rarely occurred to me to inscribe anything in the way of divinity or the Bible on my heart."

A VITAL CHANGE.

But even at this time, and particularly while at Kiel—where Kortholt's example had an influence over him—he frequently felt constrained to entreat God in secret to grant him a real change of heart and make him His child. Often he walked solitarily on the seashore, and debated within himself—first, how he might attain to true godliness; next, how he might acquire a high degree of learning; and lastly, how he might usefully communicate what he had learnt to others?

How Franké attained, at length, in 1687, through divine grace, to a sense of reconciliation to God through faith in the atoning sacrifice of Christ, the following extracts from a lengthy entry in his private journal will show: "In 1687, when I was about twenty-four years of age, I began to come to myself, to perceive more deeply my corrupt and depraved state, and to long with greater earnestness that my soul might be delivered from it. I perceived that I could not possibly venture to deceive the people, nor enter upon a public office, and then preach to others that of which I had no heartfelt conviction. My heart was led by the Holy Spirit to humble myself before God, to entreat His favor, and frequently to beseech Him, on my knees, to make me a sincere child of His." But the light had not yet dawned.

A BENEFICIAL DISCOVERY.

Settled in Lüneburg for a time, he occupied a small apartment, and enjoyed the society of a few real and earnest Christians. A short time after his arrival he was requested to preach a sermon, in the course of a few weeks, at St. John's Church in that city. "My mind was in such a state," he says, "that I had not the mere exercise of preaching in view, but the edification of my hearers. While reflecting upon this subject, I happened upon the words, 'These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing, ye might have life through His name' (John 20: 31). My intention in selecting this text was, to treat of true and living faith, and how it is distinguished from a mere human and imaginary belief. While revolving the subject in my mind, with all seriousness, I felt that I myself was still devoid of that faith, which would be required in my sermon. I therefore relinquished meditating upon the sermon, and found enough to do with myself."

He then describes the great uneasiness and distress into which he fell but of which he told no one anything, and rather sought to conceal it as much as he was able: "At one time I wept, at another I walked up and down in great distress; then fell upon my knees, and called upon Him whom I knew not. I said, 'O God, if Thou really art, I beseech Thee to have pity on me,' and this I did frequently, and in various ways. One Sunday, I reflected upon the propriety of declining to preach, if no change manifested itself; because I could not preach against my conscience, nor deceive the people with respect to my state. It was in such anguish of soul that I again knelt down, and called upon that God and Saviour whom I knew not, nor believed in, for deliverance from my wretched state. And the Lord heard me. Every doubt disappeared; I was assured in my heart of the favor of God in Christ Jesus; I could not only call Him God, but also Father—my Father." The following Wednesday he delivered his discourse with heartfelt satisfaction. (One of the Pictures in our frontispiece, represents Franké in his distress praying for deliverance.)

OPENS A PRIVATE SCHOOL IN HAMBURG.

While he was at Hamburg, he cultivated close intimacy with Nicholas Langé, afterward superintendent in Brandenburg, and in consequence of several consultations with him upon the defective state of the instruction of the young, he was induced to establish a private school in the city for children. This occupation had great influence upon the whole of his future life. He often asserted, that his teaching the children in Hamburg must be considered in reality as the basis of all that God effected through him.

In 1688-89 we find him again at Leipzig, in the capacity of private tutor, and reading exegetical and practical lectures upon the Epistles to the Corinthians, Ephesians, and Philippians. The applause bestowed on him was enthusiastic. His own hired room becoming too small for him, he obtained the use of the public hall in the university, which also in a short time became so crowded that many of his hearers were obliged to stand outside the door and at the windows. His unwearied labors for Christ were accompanied by the divine blessing, and among those who were brought to the knowledge of the truth was the son of the rector of the university, Godfrey Olearius, who was afterward professor of divinity at Leipzig.

But envious and bigoted opposition arose, and rather than enter into a conflict, in 1690 he left Leipzig for ever. He then took pastoral charge of St. Augustine's Church, in Erfurt, from June, 1690, to September, 1691. There his evangelistic fervor brought down upon him the most malevolent opposition, which compelled him to leave. In February, 1692, he became pastor of St. George's Church, Glaucha, near Halle.

PASTORAL WORK.

When Franké undertook his new pastoral charge, he found his congregation in a very deplorable state. A multitude of taverns and places of amusement, which stood upon the very site of the present Orphan house, and to which the inhabitants of Hallé resorted in crowds, had demoralized the greater part of the population of Glaucha. He therefore found a wide field of labor before him; and only a man of faith, zeal, and love such as he was could have cultivated it as successfully as he. In 1714 he was called to be the pastor of St. Ulrich's Church, in Halle.

At that period, the poor of Hallé were accustomed, on an appointed day in the week, to collect alms at the doors of the charitably disposed, and Thursday was the day on which this was done in the neighborhood of Glaucha. Franké was in the habit of distributing bread and money to them (as shown in one of the panels of our front picture); but he soon began to reflect that this was a favorable opportunity to administer spiritual food in like manner to these poor people, who were living in a state of ignorance and depravity. "Therefore, on an occasion," he says, "when they were assembled as usual before the house, waiting for the customary alms to be distributed, I sent for them all to come into the house, and placing the aged people on one side, and the young on the other, catechised them (as indicated in a panel in our frontispiece), and commended them to God in prayer. I afterward informed them that in future they should have food for the soul as well as for the body every Thursday, in my house, which they accordingly did." This really good work was undertaken at the commencement of the year 1694.

A SCHOOL FOR THE POOR.

The distress of those among the poor who were ashamed to beg, went to his heart. One of the expedients he adopted to obtain money for them, was the fastening up of a box in the parlor of the parsonage-house, over which he wrote, "Whoso hath this world's goods and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" (1 John 3: 17), and underneath 2 Cor. 9: 17. This box, which was destined for the reception of the casual gifts of those who visited Franké, was fixed up at the beginning of 1695. "After it had been there about a quarter of a year," he says, "a certain person put, at one time, four dollars and sixteen groschen (about four dollars) into it. On taking this sum into my hand, I exclaimed with great liberty of faith, 'This is a considerable sum, with which something good must be accomplished; I will commence a school with it for the poor.'

Acting under the impulse of faith, he immediately made arrangements for the purchase of books to the amount of two dollars, and engaged a poor student to instruct the children for a couple of hours daily, promising him a small sum weekly for doing so, in the hope that meanwhile God would send more. The children, of course, joyfully accepted the books, but of twenty-seven which were distributed among them, only four were brought back again; the rest were either sold or kept by the children, who did not return. But Franké did not suffer this to deter him; for with the remainder of the money he again purchased books, which the children were obliged to leave at the school after lessons had concluded. The school was held in the ante-chamber of the good pastor's study, and the children were first regularly received for instruction at Easter, 1695.

PROJECT OF AN ORPHAN-HOUSE.

About Whitsuntide of the same year, Franké laid the first foundation of what was subsequently called the Royal School, at Hallé, and which, in 1709, had attained to considerable proportions. But with all his successful efforts on behalf of the poor, he realized that many a hopeful child was deprived, when out of school, of all the benefit he received in it and he determined if possible to remedy the evil. In the autumn of 1695, he finally decided to undertake the entire charge and education of a limited number of children, "and this," he says, "was the first incitement I felt, and the first idea of the erection of an orphan-house, even before I possessed the smallest funds for the purpose."

On mentioning the plan to some of his friends, one of them funded the sum of five hundred dollars for the purpose—twenty-five dollars for the interest on which were to be paid over every Christmas. Reflecting upon this instance of the divine bounty, he inquired for some poor orphan child, who might be supported by the yearly interest. At once four fatherless and motherless children, all of the same family, were brought to him. He ventured with humble confidence in God, to receive them all; but as one of them was taken by some Christian people, only three were left; but a fourth soon appeared in the place of the one that had been taken. He, therefore, took these four, placed them with religious people, giving them weekly half a dollar for the bringing up of each child. Having once begun in God's name to receive destitute orphans without any human prospect of certain assistance (for the interest on the five hundred dollars was not enough to feed and clothe a single one), he trustingly left it to the Lord to make up whatever might be deficient.

The day after he had undertaken charge of the four orphans above mentioned, two more were added; the next day, another; two days afterward, a fourth; and one more after the lapse of a week. So that on November 16th, 1695, there were already nine, who were all placed out with pious people. Meanwhile, the faithful God and Father of the fatherless, came most powerfully to his aid, and donations flowed in with such rapidity that Franké was emboldened to take a yet further step in the same direction.

A HOUSE FOR THE ORPHANS.

His next neighbor's house, in which rooms had been hired for the instruction of the children of the poor, being offered for sale, Franké purchased it, and in the spring of 1696 added two rooms to the back part of it. But it soon occurred to him that it would be advisable to take away the orphan children, whose number now amounted to twelve, from the three houses in which they were being brought up, and bring them together into the house he had bought. He accordingly did so. Beds and furniture were procured, and the twelve children were fed, attended to, and instructed by good teachers under the inspection of a divinity student named Neubauer, who had been appointed for the purpose. This change was completed a week before Whitsuntide, 1696. During the next six weeks, the number of the orphan children amounted to eighteen.

It was not long before the house which had been purchased for the children became too small for them. Franké, therefore, hired the house adjoining, which he subsequently bought and united with the first. Though he was now in possession of two houses for the use of his schools and orphans, the number of the latter, together with the poor scholars, and impecunious students, who dined at the open table, and which continued to increase, rendered the buildings altogether insufficient for the purpose. With a heroism born of humble faith in an Almighty and ever-faithful God, Franké began to revolve plans in his mind for the erection of a larger building, and sent Neubauer to Holland in June, 1697, to inspect some celebrated orphan-ages there.

THE "GOLDEN EAGLE."

Meanwhile an inn, bearing the sign of the "Golden Eagle," situated outside one of the gates of Hallé, was offered for sale. Franké thought he could make use of it for the purposes of his institution, and purchased it on April 6th, 1698, for $1950. But he soon perceived that the edifice was not exactly suited for an orphan-house, and in particular, that it was not large enough to hold the great number of children, students, domestics, etc., there being already a hundred orphan children and seventy-two students. In order to hinder the plot of ground in front of the "Golden Eagle" from being applied to the building of another tavern, or occupied in some other way to the detriment of the Orphan-house, Franké saw himself compelled to build upon this open space; and, calling Neubauer from Holland, on July 24th, 1698, the first stone was laid, in the name of God, of the present edifice, known by the name of "the Orphan-house."

At the very outset of building, many difficulties presented themselves. At one time stones were wanted, at another sand, lime, etc., and the over-looker of the men was utterly at a loss for want of horses—there being none to be had during harvest-time, even for money. Franké therefore went into his closet, and in silence prayed to God for help. On returning to the place, a laborer handed him which had just been found among the rubbish, on which was impressed the words, Jehovah Conditor Condita Coronide Coronet (Jehovah the Builder complete the work). "This," says Franké, "revived me, and strengthened my faith in such a manner, that I went again cheerfully and courageously to work, in believing hope that I should live to see the completion of the building."

COMPLETION OF THE ORPHANAGE.

Nearly every one who knew of the enterprise was asking, "Is Franké mad?" "Where is he going to get the money from to pay for the work?" It frequently happened, indeed, that he was in great straits; without a farthing left, and hundreds of individuals needing food. But still assistance always came, his orphans and students never wanted a meal—and the masons and day laborers always received their full wages. They always began their work with prayer, and at the end of the week, when the people were paid, Franké concluded with a Gospel address and prayer. Thus the work went on, and on July 24th, 1699, the house was roofed; at Easter of the following year the orphans and students began to dine in it; and at Easter, 1701, the remaining stories were completely occupied.

God's smile continued to rest upon the undertaking, funds and friends and fellow-laborers were forthcoming, and Franké's institution increased from year to year; so that at the time of his death, in 1727, it had attained to extensive proportions. It then contained 134 orphan children, who were attended to by ten male and female overseers; 2207 children and youths in the various schools, who were instructed for the most part gratuitously by 175 teachers and inspectors, and besides the orphans, a great number of poor scholars; it provided dinner also for 148, and supper for 212, besides 255 poor students, who were fed from the funds of the Orphan-house.

As time rolled on the mighty man of faith grew more valiant, and, in the strength of God, more victorious. His confidence in God grew with what it fed upon, and in multiplied, and ever-multiplying labors—among which should be distinctly mentioned his furtherance of the interests of the Bible Institution, founded by his friend Charles Hildebrand, baron of Canstein, and his unwearied activity in the missionary cause; and it was he who at the request of Frederic IV., King of Denmark, selected the first students from the Copenhagen College, for work in the East Indies. But in the midst of his vigilant and energetic toil for Christ, he was summoned to his ETERNAL REST AND REWARD.

In November, 1726, a paralytic stroke deprived him of the use of his left hand, and on his birthday, March 23d, next year, he writes as an addendum to a letter, "My course, thank God, is near its close." On the morning of May 25th, he wished a hymn to be sung to him, which commences—

"Now boldly cross the dark, cold stream;
'Tis not so deep as some may dream," &c.;

and toward evening he was seized by the illness from which he never recovered. On June 1st, on awaking from a faint sleep he said, "Ah, my Saviour Jesus, how shall I feel, and how rejoice, when I behold Thee for the first time face to face!" His weakness continued to increase, but his joy in Christ to deepen; and on June 8th, when asked by his wife whether his Saviour was near him, he replied in the most cheerful manner, "Of that there is no doubt." These were his last words. He then began to slumber, and quietly and blissfully fell asleep, amid the prayers and songs of his family and friends, in the 65th year of his age. "His memory is blessed."

A Moorish Tradition is Described in a Work by Arthur Leared on "Morocco and the Moors." The author says: "The Moors have a current opinion that the end of the world is at hand. We were told in 1872 in the city of Morocco, that the end of the world is to take place in the year 1300 of the Hegira, a date corresponding with A.D. 1883. The destruction of the world will, according to the orthodox Mahomedans, be preceded by wars and tumults, miracles and portents. The successful revolt against the powerful governor Ben Doud was regarded as the first sign of the times." It is worthy of remark that the same year is indicated in Scripture as the end of the 1260 years of the temporal power of the Mahomedan Antichrist (Rev. 11:2, 3), because the Mahomedans date their calendar from the Hegira A.D. 622 as the commencement of their religion; and thus 1260 solar years commencing in 622 end in 1882-3. The Mahomedans reckon by lunar years, according to which 1882-3 is the 1300th year in their calendar from 622.

An "Incurable" has been Cured as the Result of faith and prayer. The incident was related at the recent yearly meeting in London of the Society of Friends. Irena Beard said: "I should like to say a few words on the power of prayer, and illustrate them by my own experience. Thirteen years ago I was here on my way to India. I was an invalid. I came here, and the physicians could do nothing to help me. They said no mortal hand could touch my disease. It came into my heart that there was an Immortal Hand that could. I prayed six weeks, and others prayed with me. One night, 19th of 1st Month, 1874, between three and four o'clock, I woke up with these words: 'If ye abide in Me, and My words in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.' Again I consecrated myself anew to His service, and my health, as though I had it, and I took these words and said, 'Thou hast said it, and Thy words shall never pass away.' I had lost the use of my right side. I could stand, but could not sit upright. I said, 'These are Thy words. I ask the blessing of health,'—that very moment the pain ceased, the abscess was gone, the disease was gone. A new life ran through my body, and I said again and again, 'I have it, I have it!' From that day to this the disease has never made its appearance. I walked a mile that day, and worked in a temperance crusade."

CRYSTALS.

MANY of the precious stones of the Bible have come to prompt recognition. But for the present I take up the less valuable crystal. Job in my text compares saving wisdom with a specimen of topaz. An infidel chemist or mineralogist would pronounce the latter worth more than the former, but Job makes an intelligent comparison, looks at religion and then looks at the crystal and pronounces the former as of far superior value to the latter, exclaiming in the words of my text, "the crystal cannot equal it."

Now, it is not a part of my sermonic design to depreciate the crystal, whether it be found in Cornish mine or Hartz Mountain or Mammoth Cave or tinkling among the pendants of the chandeliers of a palace. The crystal is it is the queen of the cave; it is the ear-drop of the hills; it finds its heaven in the diamond. Among all the pages of natural history there is no page more interesting to me than the page crystallographic. But I want to show you that Job was right when, taking religion in one hand and the crystal in the other, he declared that the former is of far more value and beauty than the latter, recommending it to all the people and to all the ages, declaring: "The crystal cannot equal it."

I. In the first place I remark that religion is SUPERIOR TO THE CRYSTAL in exactness.

That shapeless mass of crystal against which you accidentally dashed your foot is laid out with more exactness than any earthly city. There are six styles of crystallization and all of them divinely ordained. Every crystal has mathematical precision. God's geometry reaches through it, and it is a square or it is a rectangle or it is a rhomboid or in some way it hath a mathematical figure.

Now religion beats that in the simple fact that spiritual accuracy is more beautiful than material accuracy. God's attributes are exact. God's law exact. God's decrees exact. God's management of the world exact. Never counting wrong, though He counts the grass-blades and the stars and the sands and the cycles. His providences never dealing with us perpendicularly when those providences ought to be oblique, nor lateral when they ought to be vertical. Everything in our life arranged without any possibility of mistake. Each life a six-sided prism. Born at the right time; dying at the right time. There are in our theology.

If I thought this was a slipshod universe I would go crazy. God is not an anarchist. Law, order, symmetry, precision, a perfect square, a perfect rectangle, a perfect rhomboid, a perfect circle. The edge of God's robe of government never frays out. There are no loose screws in the world's machinery. It did not just happen that Napoleon was attacked with indigestion at Borodino so that he became incompetent for the day. It did not just happen that John Thomas, the missionary, on a heathen island, waiting for an outfit and orders for another missionary tour, received that outfit and those orders in a box that floated ashore, while the ship and the crew that carried the box were never heard of. The barking of F. W. Robertson's dog, he tells us, led to a line of events which brought him from the army into the Christian ministry, where he served God with world-renowned usefulness. It did not merely happen so. I believe in a particular providence. I believe God's geometry may be seen in all our life more beautifully than in crystallography. Job was right. "The crystal cannot equal it."

II. Again I remark that religion is superior to the crystal

IN TRANSPARENCY.

We know not when or by whom glass was first discovered. Beads of it have been found in the tomb of Alexander Severus. Vases of it are brought up from the ruins of Herculaneum. There were female adornments made out of it 3000 years ago—those adornments found now attached to the mummies of Egypt. A great many commentators believe that my text means glass. What would we do without the crystal? The crystal in the window to keep out the storm and let in the day—the crystal over the watch defending its delicate machinery, yet allowing us to see the hour—the crystal of the telescope by which the astronomer brings distant worlds so near he can inspect them. Oh, the triumphs of the crystals in the celebrated windows of Rouen and Salisbury!

But there is nothing so transparent in a crystal as in our holy religion. It is a transparent religion. You put it to your eye and you see man—his sin, his soul, his destiny. You look at God and you see something of the grandeur of His character. It is a transparent religion. Infidels tell us it is opaque. Do you know why they tell us it is opaque? It is because they are blind. The natural man receiveth not the things of God because they are spiritually discerned. There is no trouble with the crystal; the trouble is with the eyes which try to look through it.

WE PRAY FOR VISION,

Lord, that our eyes might be opened. When the eye-salve cures our blindness then we find that religion is transparent.

It is a transparent Bible. All the mountains of the Bible come out: Sinai, the mountain of the law; Pisgah, the mountain of prospect; Olivet, the mountain of instruction; Calvary, the mountain of sacrifice. All the rivers of the Bible come out: Hidekel, or the river of paradisiacal beauty; Jordan, or the river of holy chrism; Cherith, or the river of prophetic supply; Nile, or the river of palaces; and the pure river of life from under the throne clear as crystal. While reading this Bible after our eyes have been touched by grace, we find it all transparent, and the earth rocks, now with crucifixion agony and now with judgment terror, and Christ appears in some of His two hundred and fifty-six titles, as far as I can count them—the bread, the rock, the captain, the commander, the conqueror, the star, and on and beyond any capacity of mine to rehearse them. Transparent religion!

The providence that seemed dark before becomes pellucid. Now you find God is not trying to put you down. Now you understand why you lost that child and why you lost your property; it was to prepare you for eternal treasures. And why sickness came; it being the precursor of immortal juvenescence.

And now you understand why they lied about you and tried to drive you hither and thither. It was to put you in the glorious company of such men as Ignatius, who, when he went out to be destroyed by the lions, said: "I am the wheat and the teeth of the wild beasts must first grind me before I can become pure bread for Jesus Christ;" or the company of such men as Polycarp, who when standing in the midst of the amphitheatre waiting for the lions to come out of their cave and destroy him and the people in the galleries jeering and shouting, "The lions for Polycarp," replied: "Let them come on," and then stooping down toward the cave where the wild beasts were roaring to get out, "Let them come on." Ah, yes, it is persecution to put you in glorious company; and while there are many things that you will have to postpone to the future world for explanation, I tell you that it is the whole tendency of your religion to unravel and explain and interpret and illumine and irradiate. Job was right. It is a glorious transparency. "The crystal cannot equal it."

III. I remark again that religion surpasses the crystal

IN ITS BEAUTY.

That lump of crystal is put under the magnifying glass of the crystallographer and he sees in it indescribable beauty—snowdrift and splinters of hoar-frost and corals and wreaths and stars and crowns and castellations of conspicuous beauty. The fact is that crystal is so beautiful that I can think of but one thing in all the universe that is so beautiful, and that is the religion of the Bible. No wonder this Bible represents that religion as the daybreak, as the apple-blossoms, as the glitter of a king's banquet. It is the joy of the whole earth.

People talk too much about their cross and not enough about their crown. Do you know the Bible mentions a cross but twenty-seven times while it mentions a crown eighty times? Ask that old man what he thinks of religion. He has been a close observer. He has been culturing an æsthetic taste. He has seen the sunrises of a half century. He has been an early riser. He has been an admirer of cameos and corals and all kinds of beautiful things. Ask him what he thinks of religion and he will tell you, "It is the most beautiful thing I ever saw." "The crystal cannot equal it."

Beautiful in its symmetry. When it presents God's character it does not present Him as having love like a great protuberance on one side of His nature, but makes that love in harmony with His justice—a love that will accept all those who come to Him, and a justice that will by no means clear the guilty. Beautiful religion in the sentiment it implants! Beautiful religion in the hope it kindles! Beautiful religion in the fact that it proposes to garland and enthrone and emparadise an immortal spirit. Solomon says it is a lily. Paul says it is a crown. The Apocalypse says it is a fountain kissed of the sun. Ezekiel says it is a foliated cedar. Christ says it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride. While Job in the text takes up a whole vase of precious stones—the topaz and the sapphire and the chrysoprase—and he takes out of this beautiful vase just one crystal and holds it up until it gleams in the warm light of the eastern sky, and he exclaims, "The crystal cannot equal it."

Oh, it is

it is not a stupid religion, it is not a toothless hag as some seem to have represented it; it is not a Meg Merries with shrivelled arm come to scare the world. It is the fairest daughter of God, heirless of all His wealth. Her cheek the morning sky; her voice the music of the south wind; her step the dance of the sea. Come and woo her. The Spirit and the Bride say come, and whosoever will, let him come. Do you agree with Solomon and say it is a lily? Then pluck it and wear it over your heart. Do you agree with Paul and say it is a crown? Then let this hour be your coronation. Do you agree with the Apocalypse and say it is a springing fountain? Then come and slake the thirst of your soul. Do you believe with Ezekiel and say it is a foliated cedar? Then come under its shadow. Do you believe with Christ and say it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride? Then strike hands with your Lord the king while I pronounce you everlastingly one. Or if you think with Job that it is a jewel, then put it on your hand like a ring, on your neck like a bead, on your forehead like a star, while looking into the mirror of God's Word you acknowledge "the crystal cannot equal it."

IV. Again, religion is superior to the crystal in ITS TRANSFORMATIONS.

The diamond is only a crystallization of coal. Carbonate of lime rises till it becomes calcite or aragonite. Red oxide of copper crystallizes into cubes and octahedrons. Those crystals which adorn our persons and our homes and our museums have only been resurrected from forms that were far from lustrous. Scientists for ages have been examining these wonderful transformations. But I tell you in the Gospel of the Son of God there is a more wonderful transformation. Over souls by reason of sin black as coal and hard as iron God by His comforting grace stoops and says: "They shall be Mine in the day when I make up My jewels."

"What," say you, "will God wear jewelry?" If He wanted it He could make the stars of heaven His belt and have the evening cloud for the sandals of His feet; but He does not want that adornment. He will not have that jewelry. When God wants jewelry he comes down and digs it out of the depths and darkness of sin. These souls are all crystallizations of mercy. He puts them on and He wears them in the presence of the whole universe. He wears them on the hand that was nailed, over the heart that was pierced, on the temples that were stung. "They shall be Mine," saith the Lord, "in the day when I make up My jewels." Wonderful transformation!

THE CARBON BECOMES A SOLITAIRE!

"The crystal cannot equal it." There she is, a waif of the street; but she shall be a sister of charity. There he is, a sot in the ditch; but he shall preach the Gospel. There, behind the bars of a prison, but he shall reign with Christ forever. Where sin abounded grace shall much more abound. The carbon, the solitaire. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Now, I have no liking for those people who are always enlarging in Christian meetings about their early dissipation. Do not go into the particulars, my brothers. Simply say you were sick, but make no display of your ulcers. The chief stock in trade of some ministers and Christian workers seems to be their early crimes and dissipations. The number of pockets you picked and the number of chickens you stole make very poor prayer-meeting rhetoric. Besides that, it discourages other Christian people who never got drunk or stole anything. But it is pleasant to know that those who were farthest down have been brought highest up. Out of infernal serfdom into eternal liberty. Out of darkness into light. From coal to the solitaire. "The crystal cannot equal it."

But, my friends, the chief transforming power of the Gospel will not be seen in this world and not until heaven breaks upon the soul. When that light falls upon the soul then you will see the crystals. Oh what for these jewels of eternity. I sometimes hear people representing Heaven in a way that is far from attractive to me. It seems almost a vulgar Heaven as they represent it with great blotches of color and bands of music making a deafening racket. John represents Heaven as exquisitely beautiful. Three crystals. In one place he says: "Her light was like a precious stone, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "I saw a pure river from under the throne, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "Before the throne there was a sea of glass clear as crystal."

THREE CRYSTALS.

John says crystal atmosphere. That means health. Balm of eternal June. What weather after the world's east wind! No rack of storm clouds. One breath of that air will cure the worst tubercle. Crystal light on all the leaves. Crystal light shimmering on the topaz of the temples. Crystal light tossing in the plumes of the equestrians of heaven on white horses. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

John says crystal river. That means joy. Deep and ever rolling. Not one drop of the Thames or the Hudson or the Rhine to soil it. Not one tear of human sorrow to embitter it. Crystal, the rain out of which it was made. Crystal, the bed over which it shall roll and ripple. Crystal, its infinite surface. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

John says crystal sea. That means multitudinously vast. Vast in rapture. Rapture vast as the sea, deep as the sea, strong as the sea, ever changing as the sea. Billows of light. Billows of beauty, blue with skies that were never clouded and green with depths that were never fathomed. Arctics and Antarcics and Mediterraneans and Atlantic and Pacific in crystalline magnificence. Three crystals. Crystal light falling on a crystal river. Crystal river rolling into a crystal sea. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

"Oh," says some one putting his hand over his eyes, "can it be that I who have been in so much sin and trouble will ever come to those crystals?" Yes, it may be—it will be. Heaven we must have whatever else we have or have not, and we come here to get it. "How much must I pay for it?" you say. You will pay for it just as much as the coal pays to become the diamond. In other words, nothing. The same Almighty power that makes the crystal in the mountain will change your heart which is harder than stone, for the promise is "I will take away your stony heart and I will give you a heart of flesh."

"Oh," says some one, "it is just the doctrine I want; God is to do everything and I am to do nothing." My brother, it is not the doctrine you want. The coal makes no resistance. It hears the resurrection voice in the mountain and it comes to crystallization, but your heart resists. The trouble with you, my brother, is the coal wants to stay coal. I do not ask you to throw open the door and let Christ in. I only ask that you stop bolting it and barring it.

O, my friends, we will have to get rid of our sins. I will have to get rid of my sins and you will have to get rid of your sins.

WHAT WILL WE DO WITH OUR SINS

among the three crystals? The crystal atmosphere will display our pollution. The crystal river would be befouled with our touch. The crystal sea would whelm us with its glistening surge. Transformation now or no transformation at all. Give sin full chance in your heart and the transformation will be downward instead of upward. Instead of a crystal it will be a cinder.

In the days of Carthage a Christian girl was condemned to die for her faith, and a boat was bedaubed with tar and pitch and filled with combustibles and set on fire and the Christian girl was placed in the boat, and the wind was off shore and the boat floated away with its precious treasure. No one can doubt that boat landed at the shore of Heaven. Sin wants to put you in a fiery boat and shove you off in an opposite direction—off from peace, off from God, off from Heaven, everlastingly off; and the port toward which you would sail would be a port of darkness, and the guns that would greet you would be the guns of despair, and the flags that would wave at your arrival would be the black flags of death.

O, my brother, you must either kill sin or sin will kill you. It is no wild exaggeration when I say that any man or woman that wants to be saved may be saved. Tremendous choice. A thousand people are choosing this moment between salvation and destruction, between light and darkness, between Heaven and hell, between charred ruin and glorious crystallization.

THE PRESENT AND FUTURE OF THE JEWS.

An Address at the Conference at Mildmay Park, London, by Rev. J. Wilkinson.

We are now most evidently at the very close of this dispensation. The Lord Himself is near at hand, and will come speedily. These considerations ought to have great weight with us in our efforts to lead the outcasts of Israel to Christ.

As to their guaranteed preservation to the end of time, we need only turn to Jeremiah 31, to find out how explicit and unmistakable are the declarations upon this point. As long as the heavens last, and the sea obeys the voice of God, so long will God's promises to His ancient people endure.

I. We have now to consider briefly Israel's national rejection; its causes, consequences, and duration. The Jews were rejected not solely because of their rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah. On more than one occasion they had been cast out of Palestine before they rejected Christ. Neither were they entirely dispossessed of their land until nearly forty years after the death of the Messiah. There were other and antecedent causes which resulted in the loss of their inheritance. 1. Idolatry. The Books of Kings and Chronicles, and especially Hosea, are sufficiently explanatory and conclusive on this point. 2. Rejection of the Messiah. They knew not the day of their visitation, therefore Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, but no longer. 3. Forbidding the Gospel to be preached to the Gentiles. In reference to this point, read 1 Thess. 2 : 15, 16.

The Consequences of Israel's rejection may be summarized thus: To themselves, there has been loss of country, king, constitution, home, and social privileges. The Kingdom of God has been taken from them. In their corporate capacity they were God's representatives to the world. But what have they been doing for the last eighteen hundred years? Nothing! They are not now His representatives to men; the Kingdom has been taken from them, and given to others.

The Consequences to the Gentiles has been the impossibility of realizing more than a partial blessing. Through the ministry of the Gospel individual Gentiles are being gathered in with individual Jews. There is going on an election of individuals out of all nations, but not an election of nations themselves. And we must not expect more during the continuance of the present dispensation. It is just as I once heard the Rev. Hugh McNeile say in Exeter Hall. There are four steps or stages in the conversion of the world: The salvation of individual Jews, the salvation of individual Gentiles, the salvation of the Jewish nation, then, the salvation of all nations.

As to the Duration of their rejection, I may be asked, When will their wanderings cease? I answer, Until the times of the Gentiles close. Do you ask me when that will be? I answer, It is evidently very near at hand. Keep your eyes open to observe passing events, and what they indicate.

II. I now want to say just a word on the impending restoration of the Jews, and the time of Jacob's trouble. What warrant have we that the prophecies relating to the restoration of the Jews as a nation do not refer to their return from the captivity of Babylon, and have therefore all been fulfilled? 1. In Isaiah 11 : 11, it is said, "The Lord shall set His hand a second time to recover the remnant of His people," etc. If it has ever been once done, why do it a second time? 2. In the very next verse (12) it is declared the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah shall be assembled from the four corners of the earth. That is to say, the whole of Israel and Judah shall be assembled, and this has never yet been done. 3. When once restored to their land, they will never again be driven from it and dispersed. Some persons say, "Suppose the Jews do go back to Palestine, they may be scattered again?" But this cannot be, for in Amos (9 : 15) God says: "I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." 4. The Promised Land is still the Land of Promise. It never has been fully possessed by them yet; they have possessed some—from Dan to Beersheba—but not all. Voltaire used to ridicule the idea that the Jews' land was, as it is declared to be (Judges 18), a "good land and a large," but the land formerly trodden by them does not comprehend the whole of God's promise. The extent of the land to be possessed according to the frontiers assigned by God includes an area of 300,000 square miles, or two and a half times as large as Great Britain and Ireland put together; and in the latter chapters of Ezekiel we have the predetermined location of the tribes, and the distribution of the land which will soon take place.

OF THE TIME OF JACOB'S TROUBLE,

I simply quote what the Chief Rabbi in England, Dr. Adler, has recently stated: "The time of Jacob's trouble has now commenced." Yes, it has commenced now, and it will grow more intense, but its climax will be reached in Palestine, for "His fire is in Zion, and His furnace in Jerusalem" (Isaiah 31 : 9).

III. The Position and Mission of the Jews in the Millennial Age. 1. Their geographical position in relation to man is described in Deuteronomy 32 : 8; Acts 17 : 6; and Ezekiel 5 : 5, to which I refer you. 2. Their religious position in relation to God is most solemn and tender. Men talk about their "scientific frontiers," and so on, and in order to secure them nations are plunged in repeated wars. But all this will cease at the beginning of the Millennium, for God Himself will assign geographical limits to the nations. God's geographical centre is Palestine, and Jerusalem is in the midst of Palestine.

AN awful and abominable practice which still prevails in some parts of Africa, especially in Ashanti and Dahomey, is that of the offering of human sacrifices. This is done by the deluded natives with the idea of appeasing the anger of their demon gods, whom they believe delight in human blood, of honoring those who have recently been called away by death, and of sending messages to them in the spirit world. If a chief or nobleman wishes to convey a message to a departed friend, he whispers the message in the ear of a slave, adding, "be sure to tell him," and immediately orders his head to be struck off. And at the death of persons of distinction hundreds and sometimes thousands of hapless human beings are cruelly slaughtered, that their spirits may attend, in the unseen world, upon the distinguished person deceased in honor of whom they are slain. On the death of a former King of Dahomey two hundred and eighty of his wives fell victims to the sanguinary superstitions of the country, and still larger numbers have fallen in Ashanti on similar occasions.

The missionary traveller, Whartin, thus describes a visit which he paid to the Court of Ashanti: "At a moderate calculation there could not have been an assemblage of less than 10,000 persons to witness my reception by the King of Ashanti in his capital of Kumasi, all immersed in the greatest ignorance and superstition, literally without God and without hope in the world. One circumstance of the reception deeply impressed me, and, being the first of the kind I had witnessed, I shall not easily forget it. While waiting to receive the respects of the King and his counsellors, two men about to be sacrificed were marched along near where I sat. They were in a state of complete nudity. Their arms were closely tied behind their backs. Long spear knives were thrust through their cheeks, from which the blood flowed copiously and curdled on their breasts. The moans of one of the victims were most heart-rending. In all, eight human beings fell under the sacrificial knife that day in Kumasi alone, in honor of the deceased Queen of Jabin. Human sacrifices are almost of daily occurrence in Kumasi. I have witnessed several decapitations since I came here, and have seen as many as twelve headless human bodies scattered along the public streets of the town."

That Africa needs the light and love of the Gospel to be widely diffused among her dark people, the cruel practice described in the following sketch by Bishop Crowther clearly shows: A slave who professed to be a doctor was decoyed from a neighboring village under pretence that he was appointed to offer sacrifices to a dead man, for which a goat was also brought to the village Alenso. On arrival at the house where the corpse was laid out, the goat was taken from the slave doctor, and he was at once pounced upon by two stalwart men and bound fast in chains. The poor man saw at once that he himself, not the goat, was to be the victim. He calmly addressed the people around, saying he was quite willing to die and need not be put in chains. A pipe was brought to him, which he smoked, a new cloth replaced his rags and while he was having his last smoke the daughter of the deceased chief stood before him and began to eulogize her dead father, telling of his former greatness and achievements. The address was directed to the victim, as if to her dead father, that he might repeat the same to the inhabitants of the spirit world when in attendance there.

The news of the intended sacrifice was soon circulated. It reached the ears of the missionary, Rev. J. Buck, who, with some Sierra Leone friends, hastened to the spot. A large hole had been already dug; the poor man was led into it, and ordered to lie on his back with his arms spread out. The missionary and his friends used all possible arguments, entreaties, and pleadings for his release, but in vain. They offered bullocks for sacrifice instead of the man, but these were flatly refused; and while they stood entreating, the corpse was brought and placed on the poor slave. He was then ordered to embrace it, and obeyed. The missionary and his friends turned away from the horrible sight as the grave was being filled, burying the living, as a sacrifice, with the dead.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Trying for a Medal.—At the Circus Meeting, Glasgow, on June 15th, the Rev. R. M. Thornton said: "Lately, I saw a lad who was going to stand an examination. He was going to compete for a medal. The prize was to be given to any boy who could recite the last five chapters of St. John's Gospel without a single mistake. He recited three chapters, beginning at the fourteenth, perfectly, and then he made one error. So now he has given up all hopes of winning the medal. Similarly we fail with God's law. The Word of God says, 'Whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point is guilty of all.'"

An Infidel Lecturer Saved.—A Young Man said: "About eighteen months ago I went to the little town of Ayr, and after being there for some time I thought I had fairly deserted the devil's service, but I soon found I was still wearing part of his uniform, and plunged deep in sin again. A friend called on me and began to reason with me about the plan of salvation, but I knew it already; however, his kindly way of dealing with me led me to Christ, and from that day to this I have been rejoicing in the Lord Jesus Christ. This was on the 15th of February last year. Not only was I a hard drinker before that, but I committed many other sins too numerous to mention. I was an infidel lecturer for six years; but I have now found victory through the blood of the Lamb."

A Thankful Wife's Letter.—Mr. Miller said: "I have had a letter put into my hands from the wife of a man who has been reclaimed from a life of drunkenness at these meetings. She says: 'Sir,—It is now three weeks ago since my husband told me that he had been converted to Christ at one of Mr. Moody's meetings. I can with deepest gratitude thank God for the great benefit to him and to our home; for since he has accepted Christ as his Saviour, he has successfully resisted that great and evil temptation, strong drink. I can only testify as a wife and mother that it has made a great and happy change in our home. These meetings have been a great comfort to me also, and I earnestly pray that you all may be long spared to carry on this blessed work.'"

A Civil Engineer's Anxiety.—Mr. Scroggie said: "I was told yesterday that there was a man in the meeting who wanted to see me. I went to him; he was a poor degraded-looking object, as he sat there, with his head down, crying. He took hold of my hand and said, 'You will not know me?' 'No,' I said, 'I do not.' Then he told me his name, and said he came from the same town as I did. I then remembered him, for I used to work with him. He was a clever young fellow, a civil engineer, and might now have been in a good position; but drink had got him down; it had led to the separation of himself from his dear wife and child; and now his one piteous appeal was, 'Do you think there is any hope for me?' I told him 'Yes,' and tried to lead him to Christ. I believe he will yet rejoice in His salvation, but I want you all to pray for him."

Warning from a Death-Bed.—At the Gospel Temperance Meeting, in the Circus, Mr. Richard Hill said: "I knew a man in Edinburgh who was 'hail-fellow-well-met' with nearly everybody, but he was a hard drinker. After one of his drinking bouts he ran off to England, and was away for six months. During this time his mother died. He came home, went into a public house to see some of his old companions, and one of them cried, 'Halloa, Bob! are you back again? Don't you know your mother is dead?' He staggered to the counter and cried, 'A gill! a gill!' with the feeling that the floor was giving way, and that he would fall into hell because of his conduct. I often spoke to him about his soul. Sometimes he cried. Again he would put the matter off, and at other times he would say, 'It is not my fault that I am not saved.' He was carried to the infirmary one day very ill. The last time I saw him he was screened off from the other patients. I pushed aside the screen, took his hand, and spoke to him about the Lord Jesus Christ; but all was dark with him. I turned to leave him, but I thought, 'I will never see you again—I cannot leave you.' So again went to his bedside. I said, 'Will you make a desperate effort, and take the salvation that Jesus offers you? He says, "Him that cometh will in no wise cast out." He died to save you and now you are dying.' He said, 'Oh, am I dying? Am I dying?' and in three minutes he was in the eternal world."

Laying Down the Bottle for Christ.—Mr. Sawyer, in appealing for the assistance of a Christians in his Gospel Temperance work at the Circus, Glasgow, on June 16th, said: "We were forming a committee in New York, when one of the gentlemen said to me, 'I cannot help you, because I am not a total abstainer myself.' I said, 'That is a very flimsy excuse. You are a Christian?' 'Yes.' 'And you love the Lord Jesus and wish to see these men saved, don't you?' 'Yes; my heart is right in the work.' I said, 'You won't want to drink any more by serving our committee,' and he agreed to serve. Six months had not passed before he confessed, 'I have laid aside everything. No wine comes to my table or to my house now. I could not see so much of this work and be even a moderate drinker. If Christ has laid down His life for me—as I firmly believe He has—I can well lay down the bottle for Him.'"

Sins, not Religion.—The Rev. James Scott said, at the meeting on May 8th: "I was dealing with inquirers at the Circus last night, and among others I saw five young women who interested me. I said to the eldest, 'Would you like to become a Christian?' 'Oh, no, no, Sir,' she replied, 'I don't want to do that.' I was very much surprised at the answer, and I said, 'How is that?' 'Oh,' she replied, 'I don't belong to your religion at all. It didn't come in here for anything of that kind; it just came in to hear the singing.' 'Well,' I said to her, 'but would you really not like to become a Christian?' After a pause she answered, 'Oh, no, but if I belonged to you I would be converted in a minute; I would not wait a minute; but I don't belong to you, and I don't want to hear anything of your religion.' I said, 'Isn't it true that it is not religion, you have no trouble about that, but it is your sins?' She said, 'I am all right; I never did anything wrong.' I asked, 'Can you read?' 'No, I can't. Come away,' she said to her companions, and three of the girls ran out. The other two were, however, dealt with successfully by lady workers. These ignorant Roman Catholic girls come in to hear the singing; and I think we should pray that the singing may be very much used in reaching the people."

A Sunday Sportsman.—A Man between thirty and forty years of age said: "It is five weeks yesterday since that I was brought to the light." I had not before that been to any church or chapel since I was a boy. I remember once then going to hear Mr. McCall in the Briggate, and except when in the Colonies I one day went to church, I do not remember going again. I used then generally to go out with a gun on the Sabbath. However, five weeks ago I went to the Circus, and I heard Mr. Scroggie speaking. I thought it was rather curious. I said, 'If it is so easy to take Christ it is easy for me to accept Him.' A gentleman asked me if I was a Christian, and I told him no, but I was willing to be one, and he laid down the 37th verse of the 6th of John, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.' I accepted Christ, and went home and told my 'better half' of the change that had come over me. I got her to come to the Circus, and Mr. Scroggie sent Miss Jones to speak to her. My wife was also led to accept Christ. I praise God I have now a blessed house; I never was so happy either since I was married or before. I have seen a good deal in my day of going into the dramshop and cursing and swearing, but I tell you it is a deluded idea that you can do anything great without Christ."

How Mr. Sawyer was Converted.—Mr. Sawyer, of New York, said: "Nine years ago on the 27th day of November, I had been drinking so long that I hadn't any hope of living. I used to have good positions and everything of that kind, but the devil got me right down, and I was without money without hope, without friends, without anything in this cold world. One day, under the influence of drink, I went into a little meeting, smaller than this; there was only one man beside myself present, and that man spoke to me about my soul. He treated me kindly and though I forget everything else I shall never forget that man's kindness. I staggered into his office, and he took me by the hand and led me into his back office, saying to me, 'Sit down and sleep as long as you want.' After I woke up he came to me and said, 'I am sorry for you, my good friend, but I think I can be of some service to you.' Then he said, 'Have you had any breakfast?' 'No,' I said; 'I don't know when I had anything to eat.' 'Go out and get a little refreshment and then come back and see me;' and he slipped a dollar into my hand. I thought I would go out into the first public-house and get a good square drink, but when I remembered his kindness I could not do that; it broke my heart, and big tears rolled down my cheeks. I got something to eat and returned. 'Sit down,' he said, 'I want to have a bit of talk with you. Nine years ago I was a poor drunken sot in the streets of this city, and one day when laid down in the gutter an old, white-haired apostle of God came along and showed me a little kindness—a good old man named Dr. Lord, whose heart was full of the love of God. He took me by the arm and led me home; talked to me a little and said, 'I will be round in the morning and see you again. That man kept his word, and was there before I rose. He spoke to me about my Saviour, and got me to give my heart to God.' This story went to my heart. I had heard a score of good sermons, but they all went over my head; but when the man told me his living experience and brought out the practical truth of kindness he won my heart, and it wasn't long before I followed his example and took Jesus as my Saviour."

"COMING EVENTS AND THE COMING KINGDOM."

IS THE LORD NEAR AT HAND?

MR. GOODHART adverts in his book, as do all writers who maintain that the coming of the Lord is not to be regarded as an event that may take place immediately, to 2 Thess. 2, the popular interpretation of which he maintains to be the true one. That it is not the true one, however, is, I affirm, rendered conclusive by the fact that the rendering of the Greek word translated "is at hand," verse 2, is admittedly one of the few utter and palpable mistranslations of our Authorized Version. The true rendering, as given by Alford and in the Revised Version, is, "is come," or "is present."

Now the Thessalonians could not possibly have imagined that the Second Advent of the Lord to the earth to set up His glorious kingdom over it had actually come and was present. Nor, if they had, according to the mistranslation of the Authorized Version, supposed that such was near at hand, could they, as true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, and expecting a glorious reign with Him in immediate connection therewith, have been "shaken in mind and troubled" at the thought of its nearness. Nor, least of all, could the apostle, who in his previous epistle had set that Advent before them as an object of most joyful expectation—have now permitted fear and trouble of mind as the result of thus expecting it to have passed unproved—or rather have sanctioned and encouraged such feelings by just striving to allay them for the present, assuring the Thessalonians that the object of their fear was not, as they imagined, imminent, inasmuch as there were interposing events yet future, which it was necessary should previously occur.

THE THESSALONIANS' EXPECTANCY.

The true interpretation of the passage manifestly is as follows: The Thessalonian converts had their minds much occupied with the subject of the Second Advent. They fully entertained the blessed, happy view which, in chapter 4 of his previous epistle, St. Paul had set before them, of the Advent to the air in the first instance, the resurrection of the dead in Christ, and their rapture together with that of the living, to the meeting of the Lord in the air. Of this they were in constant expectation, as the Lord would have all His people at all times to be.

But fearful tribulations had come upon them; and these they had been somehow led to regard as the commencing troubles and judgments of the "great and dreadful day of the Lord," previous to which they had expected to be "taken," but for which they now supposed themselves to have been "left" (see Luke 17: 34-37). This most naturally disturbed and troubled them very much. And to remove all such trouble, the inspired Apostle assures them that no trials, however sore and hard to be borne, were to be regarded as indicating the presence of the day of the Lord's judgment until after the revelation of a yet unrevealed "man of sin."

That this passage, thus interpreted, affords no warrant whatever for regarding any intervening events as necessarily to occur between the present moment and the Advent of the Lord for His saints to the air, is most evident, while the popular interpretation represents both the feelings of the Thessalonian Christians and the teaching of St. Paul to them as at utter variance with what God's Word everywhere instructs us ought to be the feelings entertained by Christ's people at the prospect of His approaching Advent, and with the express teaching both of our Lord Himself, as also with that of the Apostle Paul throughout his other epistles.

WAITING FOR HIS COMING.

But our author further proceeds thus: "Once more it is urged that if anything must intervene between the present time and Christ's coming, we are looking for that event, and not for the Lord's Advent. This is scarcely a point for argument; we would rather treat it in the way of illustration. The looking for Christ must depend really on the state of the heart and soul of the believer; and if these are really waiting and longing for Christ, no intervening event can occupy His place. Any one waiting for the friend he loves most dearly to arrive by the train, knows that he cannot come till the signal of the train's approach has been given. The wife waiting for her husband from a distant land, looks earnestly and anxiously for the telegraphing of the vessel—but neither of them is therefore looking—not for the friend or the husband—but for the signal or the telegraph."

My reply to this is simply that, while I do for my part very humbly, but very earnestly, claim to be regarded as one of those who are "really waiting and longing for Christ," I must also maintain that the very reality and earnestness of this waiting and longing would only cause me to look all the more anxiously and jealously for an intervening event (were there any such) which I believe would from its commencement place an interval of three years and a half between me and the possibility of His coming; and the non-occurrence of which as yet puts necessarily a still longer, and I know not how much longer period than these three years and a half between Him and me. The very reality and earnestness of my waiting and longing would, I feel convinced, cause this event, and not the subsequent Advent of my Lord, unavoidably to in my outlook at the future. I should indeed in such case, be looking for Him and expecting Him, but I could not as yet expect Him for more than three years and a half, and therefore I could not occupy that position of constant, unremitting watchfulness for him, and expectation of Him, which I maintain that He has Himself enjoined upon me.

Again, as to the illustrations which I have quoted: they would, no doubt, be very apposite were the event thus placed between us and the Advent at all analogous in its relationship to it, to the signal of the approaching train, or the telegram announcing the arrival of the vessel—were the event, in other words, the immediate precursor of the Advent. In such case, its occurrence would, of course, seem of small moment in comparison with the glorious one of which it was the immediate herald. Such, however, is by no means the case as regards the revelation of the Antichrist. This event, according to Mr. Goodhart, will, when it occurs, assure those who witness it that three years and a half of imminent and awful tribulation and martyrdom are between them and the Coming of the Son of Man. Is it, I would ask, in human nature to overlook, in our expectations of the future, the occurrence of such an event? Is it in human nature to long for such an event?

I should like to use a somewhat similar illustration to those employed by our author.

EXPECTING A SON FROM INDIA.

A few months ago I was myself in anxious expectation of the return from India, after six years absence, of an only son. I knew the time at which the vessel in which he was a passenger was to leave Bombay, I knew the time at which she was due at Portsmouth, I knew also that after his arrival there, he would have to go to London to report himself to the authorities, and to obtain his leave of absence. Until, therefore, the telegram announcing his arrival in Portsmouth and his departure for London had been actually received, I was not in daily expectation of his return home.

I did not occupy a position with regard to him at all resembling that of a servant watching "with girded loins and lighted lamp for his master's return from a wedding, that when he comes and knocks, he may open to him immediately." I was not at all in a position resembling that of those who are watching for an arrival of which they know not whether it will take place "in the second watch, or in the third watch, at even, at midnight, at cock-crowing, or in the morning." Had I only known that my son was positively coming home from India without knowing anything as to the time at which he was to leave or to arrive, without expecting any telegram or other notification of his actual arrival—my expectation having simply been that on some day, at some hour, near at hand, he would be present; then my position would have accorded with such language. But my position with respect to my Saviour's coming, ought, I submit, to be ever and always in exact accordance with such language, inasmuch as the language is His own!

"MY LORD DELAYETH HIS COMING."

I have myself known an instance in which the idea of the intervention of the restoration of the Jews, and the revelation of the Antichrist being between us and the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ has been hailed with heartfelt satisfaction and pleasure, as affording assurance that the world would go on as at present, at all events for some time longer, and would continue to afford enjoyment to its votaries even as it is doing now. Surely the view which may possibly thus minister to the thought of the evil servant, "My Lord delayeth His coming," is one that without very sure warrant from Scripture for its maintenance, we should be slow to maintain.

The very great importance of the views, so familiar to the student of prophecy, which I have thus endeavored to maintain, is my only, and, I trust, will be a sufficient apology, for criticizing in an apparently adverse spirit, any portion of a work with by far the larger portion of which I most fully agree, and from which I have derived some valuable instruction concerning "Coming Events and the Coming Kingdom."

It will, I trust, be most fully understood that I do not for a moment mean to imply that Mr. Goodhart, and many of those who hold with him in this matter, are not looking and longing for the Advent of our blessed Lord. I am perfectly sure that they are so doing. What I contend for is that, so long as they put one or more as yet unaccomplished events, with at least three years and a half subsequent to their occurrence, as of necessity to intervene between them and that Advent, so long they cannot expect it as possibly immediate—so long must they regard it and long for it as being still certainly at some distance, and not, as His solemn and repeated injunctions, as I understand them, would have us regard Him, as one who may at any moment be present with us, and we with Him.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Improvement and Development of the postal service was a subject which occupied the attention of the House of Representatives during a part of last week. Several bills were passed, the effect of which, if they become law, will be to modify the postal money-order system. One of them provides for the issue of "postal notes" for sums less than five dollars, to meet a want which has been strongly felt ever since the fractional currency went out of circulation. The fee for the issue of a postal note is to be three cents, and the note is to be payable to bearer at the money order office from which it is issued, or at the office designated by the person who procures it. The bill also provides that the amount of all money orders which shall have remained unpaid for a period of seven years shall be deposited in the treasury for the service of the Post Office Department. The total amount of unpaid money orders at the end of June, 1881, was $2,005,966.56, of which the Post Office Auditor intimates that $1,250,000 is never likely to be demanded by the parties to whom it belongs.

Secretary of State Frelinghuysen has Written a letter in reply to a suggestion that he should warn foreign governments of the nature of Mormonism. In the course of his reply Mr. Frelinghuysen states that such a warning was given by William M. Everts, while Secretary of State. Mr. Frelinghuysen then continues: "As to my individual views, an expression of which you invite in connection with certain suggestions concerning Mormon polygamy, I may assure you of my hearty sympathy with any movement which has for its object the eradication of such evils as are practised by Mormons, and the elevation of our people to a higher plane of morals, consistent with the broadest Christian ideas. Whatever influence, therefore, I might be able to exert, either as a private citizen or in my official capacity as Secretary of State, toward the accomplishment of that desirable end, would not be spared in that direction."

The Legality of the Political Assessments has been submitted in the form of a question to the Attorney-General, and Mr. Brewster has now given his opinion. The issue was raised between Mr. George William Curtis and Representative Hubbell, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee. Mr. Brewster holds that a member of Congress is not an officer of the United States; so that a gift to him for campaign purposes does not fall within the statute regulating political assessments. This is based on the principle that a member of Congress is not an officer of the United States within the meaning of the law against assessments; first because he is not "appointed," as such officers are assumed to be, and second because the penalty of the law—removal by the President—cannot be visited upon a Congressman. The day laborers, scrubwomen, little boys and old men to whom Mr. Hubbell has forwarded his application will therefore have to pay or take the consequences.

The Post Office Self Supporting is the Grati-fying intelligence published in the Washington reports. It is stated that the receipts of the Post Office Department for the quarter ending March 31st, 1882, were $10,956,235.86; payments $9,976,307.81; excess of receipts, $979,927.99; probable profits on money orders, $75,000; total $1,054,927.99. The expenses properly belonging to the quarter not yet paid are expected to aggregate $450,000. This makes the net receipts for the Postal service for the quarter, above all expenditures and liabilities, more than $600,000.

The Reports of Bright Prospects for the South gladden the hearts of the people throughout the country. Bishop Warren, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose residence is in Atlanta, said last week that there was a great future for the Southern States. Northern capital is pouring in, and the people are becoming inspired with Northern enterprise to a degree surprising to those acquainted with the South before the war. The wheat crop was phenomenally large this year, and the cotton crop will be above the average. The extension of Southern railroads and the development of the mines and the opening up of markets for Southern products, the bishop cited as evidence of prosperity. The devastation by the spring floods has made the abundant crops of this year all the more welcome by the people. All the South needs, the bishop says, is a continuance of the present spirit of investment and local improvements and for helping on the cause of education.

The Prohibition Wave is Reported as Roll-ing over the Western States, especially Wisconsin and Minnesota. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press says: "An influential official, who lives in the southern part of the latter State, writes that the temperance wave has swept from Iowa into the southern tier of counties, and is carrying every thing, temporarily at least, before it. He says people are wild with excitement, and that the question of prohibition, or certainly of local option, will be a prominent issue in the fall." The victory in Iowa is ascribed to the ladies of the State, who, says a correspondent, entered into the work as they never did before, and to them belongs much of the credit of the success. In Des Moines and all over the State they were at the polls in large numbers, distributing tickets and in a womanly way soliciting votes. These women were most exemplary wives of prominent citizens, and mothers interested in the future of their children.

Mrs. Abraham Lincoln Died at the Home of her sister, in Springfield, Ill., on Sunday, July 16th. She had been afflicted, mentally and physically, for a long time, and had indeed never recovered the shock occasioned by the murder of her husband, at whose side she was sitting when Booth fired his fatal shot. On Saturday, July 15th, she was stricken with paralysis and remained in a comatose condition until she died. Mrs. Lincoln, whose maiden name was Mary Todd, was a native of Lexington, Fayette County, Ky. She was the daughter of a physician, and was born in the year 1815. She married the future President on November 4th, 1842. Her life was one of many troubles. Her second son died in childhood. Her third son, William, died during the first year of Mr. Lincoln's Presidency. He was a lad of singular and unusual precocity, having a taste and talent for mathematics which were extraordinary. Her fourth son, Thomas Todd, who was the pet and plaything of the Executive Mansion, died some eight years ago, after a short and very painful illness. Her eldest and only surviving son is the present Secretary of War. After the assassination of the President, Mrs. Lincoln remained for several weeks in a state of nervous prostration, which it was thought would end fatally. She recovered her health, however, but her mind never thoroughly regained its balance. Her mental condition rapidly deteriorated, until about seven years ago symptoms of the most alarming gravity supervened, and it became necessary for her friends to take legal measures to have her placed under restraint. She remained under the charge of a competent physician for some time, and then, her condition having somewhat improved, she was released from restraint and immediately sailed for Europe, where she remained until the fall of 1880, residing chiefly at Pau, in the Pyrenees.

A Verdict Against the Merchants' Dispatch Transportation Company is one of the results which the strike of freight handlers has developed. It is one of several attempts being made to force the railroad companies to perform the duties required of them under their charters. As it is, rather than grant their employes the three cents demanded of them, they suffer the freight to accumulate and business to stagnate, while merchants are losing hundreds of thousands of dollars a day. The verdict in the case of this company was for only forty dollars and was claimed by a carman for detention; but if it is affirmed in the higher courts a principle will be established which may make the companies less reckless in their oppression of their servants.

A Most Righteous Decision was Rendered in a New York court on Wednesday, July 19th, in a case in which the overseers of the poor endeavored to make an old man eighty-two years of age contribute to the support of his dissolute son, a man thirty years old. Judge Gifford, who presided, listened to the aged father's account of his efforts to reclaim his son, who could not resist the attractions of the saloons, and then he indignantly refused to make the order requested by the overseers. "The town," he said, "has licensed the establishments where this old man's son buys his rum, so the town must take care of the drunkard. I cannot order a man of eighty-two to provide for a son who, were it not for rum, could and should now be caring for his father."

A Prize Fight Under Police Supervision took place in Madison Garden, New York, on July 17th. Sporting men explain that it was not a prize fight because the combatants wore gloves, but the fact that one of the men had to remain for some days in bed under medical treatment after his contest and that the other was knocked down twenty-six times in fifteen minutes, shows that the fight was serious enough. The saddest part of the affair is the proof furnished by the exhibition, of the vast number of people in the city who delight in such brutality. More than fifteen thousand persons were present, all of whom had paid one dollar, and the greater part of them two dollars, to witness the performance. The fact that the Englishman, who won, received $11,000 as his share of the proceeds renders his decision to become a citizen instead of going back to England comprehensible. If such disgraceful exhibitions are not contrary to law, as is asserted, there is urgent need for an amendment of the law.

The Opening Services at Ocean Grove on Tuesday, July 18th, attracted a large gathering. Dr. Stokes delivered an address of welcome to those who had come to take part in the National Temperance Camp Meeting. Hon. William E. Dodge was elected permanent president, and in a brief but exhaustive address reviewed the results of the year's work and congratulated the friends of temperance on the progress made. Mrs. J. Ellen Foster also delivered a stirring speech, in which she recalled the pledge given two years ago in the same place that Iowa would be won for prohibition. She received a perfect ovation, and deserved it, for to her labors and to those of her lady colleagues much of the credit of the victory is due. An address by Mr. Edward Craswell, of Canada, was also listened to with much interest.

The Seaside Sabbath-School Assembly will be held August 1st to 15th, at Asbury Park, three miles south of Long Branch, N. J. Board and hotel accommodations may be had at from six to twenty dollars per week. Programmes of the exercises, containing full information on all points of inquiry, may be had on application to the secretary of the Sabbath-school Committee of Synod of New Jersey, Newark, N. J.

A Quaint Epitaph is inscribed on a Monument in a cemetery at Syracuse, N. Y., where a printer was interred last week. Several years ago the veteran Syracuse journalist who died on Friday, July 14th, had placed in the cemetery lot where he wished to be buried a humble marble slab, having inscribed upon it, under a carved medallion portrait, the words: "Lewis H. Redfield, printer. A worn and battered 'form' gone to be recast, more beautiful and perfect." The confidence implied in those words is very beautiful, for if the form has been worn and battered in God's service, its recasting will be for more efficient and more exalted employment (1 Cor. 15 : 43).

The Long Snow White Hair which Covers the head of an aged politician in Texas has a history that gives additional interest to its remarkable appearance. The citizen who wears it was an ardent supporter of Henry Clay during the latter's candidacy for the Presidency of the United States about 1840, and in a moment of enthusiasm he registered a vow never to allow his hair to be cut until Clay was elected President. There are many men still living who shared in the disappointment of that time, but this gentleman's hasty vow and his faithful fulfillment of it, silly as it was, render his enthusiasm in the great statesman's cause memorable. It would not have been surprising if so rash and unavailing a vow had been broken, but his persistence in its observance is a sad contrast to the conduct in a better cause of some Christian men, whose vows of fidelity, service and sacrifice made to God in moments of sickness and peril are often lightly broken (Eccles 4 : 4, 5).

Senator Brown's Gift of Fifty Thousand dollars to the University of Georgia is to be administered on a novel principle. He directs that it be invested in a special State bond, running fifty years, and bearing seven per cent interest. This annual income of $3500 will be lent to poor but promising young men, to enable them to pursue courses of study at any department of the university, or at the North Georgia Agricultural College. Not more than $200 annually will be lent to any one student at the university, and not more than $150 each to students at the college. Senator Brown's four surviving sons have the right each to choose one beneficiary annually. On being graduated the young men are to begin paying four per cent interest on the loans, and are to repay the principal thereof as soon as they have earned a sufficient amount in addition to economical living expenses. This interest and the repaid loans are to be added to the principal of the fund. Students for the ministry will be required to pay back only half the amount they receive.

A Thrilling Adventure in a Mine Occurred at Hyde Park, Pa., on July 18th. On the morning of that day Mr. Thomas Richards the "donkey runner" of the Oxford Mine, accompanied by Mr. James Lewis, one of the workmen, descended the pit, which is now idle, to examine an engine in one of the lower workings. No men were at work in the pit and the journey was therefore one of the gloomiest imaginable. The two men entered the car and were lowered to within thirty-five feet of the bottom of the shaft. Then water appeared upon the carriage, and Lewis said that their feet would get wet, but not thinking there was any danger. Richards, knew that the shaft was flooded; which was only too true, the water having overflowed a dam at the Rock vein above and filled the mine to the depth of thirty-five feet. When Richards saw the water, with a spring from the side of the carriage he reached the side of the shaft, and clung to a water-pipe that passed down the shaft. He called to Lewis to do the same, but the latter, realizing the danger now, was too excited and tailed to follow. The engineer at the top of the shaft was not aware of the danger below, and kept letting the car containing Lewis under the water nearly twenty-eight feet. As soon as freed his body floated to the surface, where he grasped the rope, which attaches to the roof of the carriage, and floundered about. In the meantime Richards, who had jumped from the car, was undergoing a severe struggle. One hundred and fifty feet separated him from the only place now left to signal the engineer. Hand over hand he clambered up the pipe. At last he gained the signalling place, but the time consumed was three-quarters of an hour, and all that time Lewis was clinging for life to the rope. Richards quickly gave the signal, and the engineer hoisted the carriage from the water. As the carriage gained the top of the water Lewis slid down the rope to the car, and so both were saved by Richards' desperate exertions. Had Lewis neglected to avail himself of the way of escape his companion had struggled to obtain for him, he would have been denounced as an ingrate and an imbecile. We constantly see, however, men more desperately situated spiritually, persisting in such wicked and stupid conduct (Heb. 2 : 3).

The Ingenuity of a Blind and Deaf Man in the South is described in a New Orleans journal. It might be expected that sight and hearing, the two chief gateways of knowledge, being closed to him, he would lead a dark and gloomy life, but his ingenuity has enabled him to acquire considerable knowledge and to become proficient in many branches of education. The sense of touch, quickened in him by the loss of hearing, enables him to understand what is said to him, for among his inventions is a leather glove with the letters of the alphabet painted on it. Any one can talk to him as fast as they can touch those letters with the end of the finger. Another of his inventions is a mechanical writing machine. The machine pricks its way along the paper, and he can read his own writing by the sense of touch. Others can use the machine to write out for him anything not procurable in raised type, and he can then read it with his fingers and indirectly have access to the literary gems which would otherwise be a sealed book to him. He has had many books copied for him with this machine, which he has read and largely memorized. He has even essayed authorship by its means, and a volume of his poetry displaying ability and taste has been published. His triumphs over difficulties apparently insuperable show him to be a man of extraordinary character. It would be difficult to imagine a case furnishing a more startling contrast to the spiritual condition of the men our Saviour denounced (Matt. 13 : 14, 15).

The Return of Paupers to Germany from this country may, it is hoped, teach the authorities there that we do not intend to have America made a dumping ground for their social refuse. Among those recently sent back was Christine Linck, an unprepossessing-looking young woman about twenty-six years old, who was among the immigrants landed at Castle Garden by the Rotterdam, on June 25th. She had no money, and she seemed unable to keep any situation. According to her story, she was sent here by the poor authorities of Bornheim, Germany. For a year she was an inmate of the Rothenburg Prison, having been committed for vagrancy. After her discharge she was again arrested as a vagrant and sent back to prison for a further term of three months. Finally, the poor authorities of Bornheim had her sent to this country, paying an agent named Wieder 100 marks for her passage money and other expenses. She was entirely destitute on her arrival here and has since been a pauper. The Commissioners of Emigration required the steamship company which brought her here to return her to the poor authorities of Bornheim. Had the immigrant shown any inclination to honest labor she would have been permitted to commence a new life in the new world, but she had no disposition in that direction and to impart it was beyond the power of the Commissioners. They were, therefore, obliged in self-defence to reject her. Christians who go out into the highways and hedges inviting all who will to come to the Saviour and commence a new life, have no fear of any such result happening to those whom they bring in. He rejects none, and He is able to give them a new heart (Ezek. 36 : 26-28).

"LOVE AND I"—A MYSTERY.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I have declared unto them Thy name, and will declare it : that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them."—John 17 : 26.

A Rich Soil—A Prayer under Solemn Circumstances—The Last Word of the Prayer—Love is the Crown Jewel—I. The Food of Love.—What it is—Who gave it—How it Comes—Righteous and yet a Father—The Name as Character—II. The Love Itself—What it is not—Of a Peculiar Sort—Its Four Precious Things—Its Power Expulsive and Impulsive—III. The Companion of Love—Jesus and Love as Guests—Where Love is, Life is—And Faith—A Sacred Secret.

FOR several Sabbath mornings my mind has been directed into subjects which I might fitly call the deep things of God. I think I have never felt my own incompetence more fully than in trying to handle such subjects. It is a soil into which one may dig, and dig as deep as ever you will, and still never exhaust the golden nuggets which lie within it. I am, however, comforted by this fact, that these subjects are so fruitful that even we who can only scratch the surface of them shall yet get a harvest from them.

You see, this text is taken out of our Lord's last prayer with His disciples. He did as good as say, "I am about to leave you, I am about to die for you ; and for awhile you will not see me ; but now before we separate, let us pray." It is one of those impulses that you have felt yourselves. When you have been about to part from those you love, to leave them perhaps in danger and difficulty, you have felt you could do no less than say, "Let us draw nigh unto God." Your heart found no way of expressing itself at all so fitting, so congenial, so satisfactory as to draw near unto the great Father and spread the case before Him. Now, a prayer from such a one as Jesus, our Lord and Master ; a prayer in such a company, with the eleven whom He had chosen, and who had consorted with Him from the beginning ; a prayer under such circumstances, when He was just on the brink of the brook of Cedron, and was about to cross that gloomy stream and go up to Calvary, and there lay down His life—such a prayer as this, so living, earnest, loving, and divine, deserves the most studious meditations of all believers.

You will observe that

of our Lord's prayer is concerning love. This is the last petition which He offers: "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them." He reaches no greater height than this, namely, that His people be filled with the Father's love. How could He rise higher? For this is to be filled with all the fulness of God, since God is love, and he that loveth dwelleth in God and God in him. What importance ought you and I to attach to the grace of love ! How highly we should esteem that which Jesus makes the crown jewel of all. If we have faith, let us not be satisfied unless our faith worketh by love and purifieth the soul. Let us not be content indeed until the love of Christ is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us. Well did the poet say,

"Only love to us be given, Lord, we ask no other heaven ;"

for indeed there is no other heaven below, and scarcely is there any other heaven above than to reach to the fulness of perfect love. This is where the prayer of the Son of David ends, in praying "that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them."

I shall this morning try to speak first upon the food of love, or what love lives upon ; secondly, upon the love itself, what kind of love it is ; and then, thirdly, upon the companion of love. "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them."

I. First,

to God : what is it ? It is knowledge. "I have made known unto them Thy name, and will make it known." We cannot love a God whom we do not know : a measure of knowledge is needful to affection. You cannot reciprocate love which you have never known, even as a man cannot derive strength from food which he has not eaten. Till first of all the love of God has come into your heart, and you have been made a partaker of it, you cannot rejoice in it or return it. Therefore our Lord took care to feed His disciples' hearts upon the Father's name. He labored to make the Father known to them. This is one of His great efforts with them, and He is grieved when He sees their ignorance, and has to say to one of them, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then Show us the Father?" Study much, then, the Word of God; be diligent in turning the pages of Scripture and in hearing God's true ministers, that the flame of love within your hearts may be revived by the fuel of holy knowledge which you place upon it.

The knowledge here spoken of is a knowledge which Jesus gave them. "I have known Thee, and these have known that Thou hast sent Me. And I have declared unto them Thy name, and will declare it." O beloved, it is not knowledge that you and I pick up as a matter of book learning that will ever bring out our love to the Father; it is knowledge given us by Christ through His Spirit. It is not knowledge communicated by the preacher alone which will bless you; for however much he may be taught of God Himself, he cannot preach to the heart unless the blessed Spirit of God comes and takes of the things that are spoken, and reveals them and makes them manifest to each individual heart, so that in consequence it knows the Lord. Jesus said, "O righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee," and you and I would have been in the same condition, strangers to God, without God and without hope in the world, if the Spirit of God had not taken of divine things and applied them to our souls so that we are made to know them.

This knowledge, dear friends,

COMES TO US GRADUALLY.

The text indicates this. "I have declared unto them Thy name, and will declare it." As if, though they knew the Father, there was far more to know and the Lord Jesus was resolved to teach them more. Are you growing in knowledge, my brothers and sisters? My labor is lost if you are not growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I hope you know much more of God than you did twenty years ago when first you came to Him. That little knowledge which you received by grace when you found "life in a look at the Crucified One" has saved you; but in these after years you have added to your faith knowledge, and to your knowledge experience; you have gone on to know more deeply what you knew before, and to know the details of what you seemed to know in the gross and the lump at first.

Are you not thankful for this blessed word of the Lord Jesus: "I will declare it;" "I will make it known?" He did so at His resurrection, when He taught His people things they knew not before; but He did so much more after He had ascended up on high when the Spirit of God was given. "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." And now to-day in the hearts of His people He is daily teaching us something that we do not know. All our experience tends that way. When the Spirit of God blesses an affliction to us, it is one of the Saviour's illuminated books out of which we learn something more of the Father's name, and consequently come to love Him better; for that is the thing Christ aims at. He would so make known the Father, that the love wherewith the Father hath loved Him may be in us, and that He Himself may be in us.

Now let me try to show you what the Saviour meant when He said, "I have declared unto them Thy name, and will declare." This knowledge which breeds love is knowledge of the name of God. What does He mean by "Thy name." Now, I do not think I should preach an unprofitable sermon if I were to stop with the connection and say that the "name" here meant is specially the name used in the twenty-fifth verse: "O righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee." "This is the name which we most need to know—" righteous Father."

Observe the singular combination here.

RIGHTEOUS, AND YET A FATHER.

"Righteous;" to us poor sinners that is a word of terror when first we hear it. "Father,"—oh, how sweet. That is a word of good cheer even to us prodigals; but we are afraid to lay hold upon it, for our sins arise, and conscience protests that God must be righteous, and punish sin. Our joy begins when we see the two united: "righteous Father,"—a Father full of love, and nothing but love, to His people, and yet righteous as a Judge, as righteous as if He were no Father. Dealing out His righteousness with stern severity as the Judge of all the earth must do, and yet a Father at the same time.

I do protest that I never did love God at all, nor could I embrace Him in my affections, till I understood how He could be just and yet the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus; how, in a word, He could be the "righteous Father." That satisfied my conscience and my heart at the same time, for my conscience said, It is well. God hath not put away sin without a sacrifice, and hath not winked at sin nor waived His justice in order to indulge His mercy, but He remains just as He ever was—the same thrice holy God who will by no means spare the guilty. He hath laid the punishment of our sins upon Christ; He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. And all this He has done that He might act to us as a Father, and save His own children from the result of their transgressions.

Here we see the righteous Father. But the world will not learn it, and a large part of the professing church, which is nothing better than the world wrongfully named with Christ's name, will not learn it. They do anything they can to get away from atonement; love without righteousness is their idol. Substitution is a word that is hard for the world to spell; they cannot abide it. That Christ should suffer in the stead of the guilty, and bear that we might never bear the Father's righteous wrath—this they cannot away with. These who have been taught by Christ, and these alone, come to find as much joy in the word "righteous" as in the word "Father;" and blending the two together they feel an intense love to the "righteous Father," and their hearts rejoice in a holy Gospel, a message of mercy consistent with justice, a covenant salvation ordered in all things and sure, because it does no violence to law and does not bind the hands of justice.

Still, I would take the word "name" in a wider sense. "I have declared unto them Thy name," which signifies "Thy character." The word "name" is used as a sort of summary of all the attributes of God. All these attributes are well adapted to win the love of all regenerate spirits. Just think for a minute. God is holy. To a holy mind there is nothing in the world, there is nothing in heaven more beautiful than holiness. Moreover, we learn from our Lord Jesus that God is good. "There is none good but one; that is God." How inexpressibly good He is! There is no goodness but what comes from God. His name, "God," is but short for "good," and all the good things that we receive in this life, and for the life to come, are but enlargements of His blessed name. To sinners like ourselves perhaps the next word may have more sweetness. God is merciful; He is ever ready to forgive. Note how the prophet saith, "Who is a God like unto thee, passing by transgression?" He does not say, "Who is a man like unto thee?" for none among our race can for a moment be compared with Him; but even if the gods of the heathen were gods, none of them could be likened unto the Lord for mercy. Now, when a man knows that he has offended, and yet the person offended readily and freely forgives, why, it wins his love. If he is a right-hearted man he cries, "I cannot again offend one who so generously casts all my offences behind his back."

But then there is a higher word still. God is love, and there is a something about love which always wins love. When love puts on her own golden armor, and bares her sword bright with her own unselfishness, she goeth on conquering and to conquer. Let a man once apprehend that God is love, that this is God's very essence, and he must at once love God. I do not mean merely "apprehend" that God is love in the cold intellect; but when this heart begins to glow and burn with the divine revelation, then straightway the spirit is joined unto the Lord, and rests with delight in the great Father of spirits. Love knits and binds. O to feel more of its uniting power!

Thus have I shown you the manna which love feeds upon, the nectar which it drinks. Everything in God is lovely, and there is no trait in His character that is otherwise than lovely. All the lovelinesses that can be conceived are heaped up in God without the slightest admixture of adulteration. He is love altogether, wholly, and emphatically. Oh, surely our Lord and Master was wise when He fed His people's love upon such meat as this.

II. Brethren, we have as yet only been standing at the furnace mouth; let us now enter into the devouring flame while we speak, in the second place, upon

THE LOVE ITSELF.

Observe, first, what this love is not. "I have declared unto them Thy name, and will declare it that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them." Do notice that the prayer is not that the Father's love may be set upon them, or moved toward them. God does not love us because we know Him, for He loved us before we knew Him even as Paul speaks of "His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in trespasses and sins." Jesus has not come to set His Father's love upon the chosen. Oh, no; He did not ever die with that object, for the Father's love was upon the chosen from everlasting. "The Father Himself loveth you" was always true. Christ did not die to make His Father loving, but because His Father is loving; the atoning blood is the outflow of the very heart of God toward us. So do not make any mistake.

And this love is of a very peculiar sort. Let me read the verse again: "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them." It is God's own love in us. The love of the Father toward Jesus springs up like a crystal fountain, and then the sparkling drops fall and overflow, as you have seen the fountains do, and we are the cups into which this overflowing love of God toward Christ Jesus flows, and flows till we too are full. The inward love so much desired for us by our Lord is no emotion of nature, no attachment proceeding from the unregenerate will, but it is the Father's love transplanted into the soil of these poor hearts, and becoming our love to Jesus.

But what can this mean? I must ask you to observe that it includes within itself four precious things.

First, the text means that our Lord Jesus Christ desires us to have a distinct recognition of the Father's love to Him. He wants the love wherewith the Father loves Him to be felt in us, so that we may say, "Yes, I know the Father loved Him, for I, who am such a poor, unworthy, and foolish creature, yet love Him; and, oh, how His Father must love Him!" Now, go a step further and deeper. Our text bears a further reading. Remember that you are to have in your heart a sense of the Father's love to you, and to recollect that it is precisely the same love wherewith He loves His Son. "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them." Oh, wonder of wonders, I feel more inclined to sit down and meditate upon it than to stand up and talk about it! The love wherewith He loved His Son—such is His love to all His chosen ones.

But now this goes to a third meaning, and that is that we are to give back a reflection of this love, and to love Jesus as the Father loves Him. A dear old friend speaking to me the other day in a rapturous tone said, "I love Jesus as the Father loves Him." This is true; not equally, but like. Is not this a blessed thought? I said, "O friend, that is a strong thing to say!" "Ah," said he, "but not stronger than Jesus would have it when He prays that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them." His people love Christ as the Father loves Him—in the same way, though from want of capacity they cannot reach to the same immeasurable force of love. And then, fourthly, this love of the Father in us is to go beaming forth from us to all around. When we get the love wherewith the Father loves the Son into our hearts, then it is to go out toward all the chosen seed. He that loveth Him that begat loveth also them that are begotten of Him. Ay, and your love is to go forth to all the sons of men, seeking their good for God's glory, that they may be brought in to know the same Saviour in whom we rejoice. Oh, if the love of the Father to Christ once enters into a man's soul it will change him; it will sway him with the noblest passion; it will make him a zealot for Christ; it will cast out his selfishness; it will change him into the image of Christ, and fit him to dwell in heaven where love is perfected.

So I conclude this second head by saying that this indwelling of the Father's love in us has the most blessed results. It has an expulsive result. As soon as ever it gets into the heart it says to all love of sin, "Get thee hence; there remains no room for thee here." When the light enters in the darkness receives immediate notice of ejection; the night is gone as soon as the dawn appears. It has also a repulsive power by which it repels the assaults of sin. It repels the devil, the love of the world, the love of sin, and all outward temptations. And then what an impulsive power it has. Get the love of Christ into you, and it is as when an engine receives fire and steam, and so obtains the force which drives it. Then have you strengthening, then have you motive power, then are you urged on to this and that heroic deed which, apart from this sublime love, you never would have thought of. And, oh, how elevating it is. How it lifts a man up above self and sin; how it makes him seek the things that are above! How purifying it is; and how happy it makes the subjects of its influence. If you are unhappy you want more of the love of God. "Oh," say you, "I want a larger income." Nonsense. A man is not made happy by money. You will do very well in poverty if you have enough of the love of God.

THE COMPANION OF LOVE.

"I in them." Look at the text a minute and just catch those two words. Here is "love" and "I"—love and Christ come together. Oh, blessed guests! "Love and I," says Christ; as if He felt He never had a companion that suited Him better. "Love" and "I": Jesus is ever at home where love is reigning. When love lives in His people's hearts, Jesus lives there too. Does Jesus, then, live in the hearts of His people? Yes; wherever there is the love of the Father shed abroad in them He must be there. We have His own word for it, and we are sure that Jesus knows where He is.

We are sure that He is where love is; for, first, where there is love there is life, and where there is life there is Christ, for He Himself says, "I am the life." There is no true life in the believer's soul that is divided from Christ. We are sure of that; so that where there is love there is life, and where there is life there is Christ. Furthermore, where there is love there is faith, for faith worketh by love, and there never was true love to Christ apart from faith; but where there is faith there is always Christ, for if there is faith in Him He has been received into the soul. Jesus is ever near to that faith which has Himself for its foundation and resting place. Where there is love there is faith, where there is faith there is Christ, and so it is "love and I."

"I in them." Yes, if I were commanded to preach for seven years from these three words only I should never exhaust the text, I am quite certain. I might exhaust you by my dulness, and exhaust myself by labor to tell out but I should never exhaust the text. "I in them." It is the most blessed word I know of. You, beloved, need not go abroad to find the Lord Jesus Christ. Where does He live? He lives within you. "I in them." As soon as ever you pray you are sure He hears you, because He is within you. He is not knocking at your door; He has entered into you, and there He dwells, and will go no more out forever.

What a blessed sense of power this gives to us. "I in them." Then it is no more "I" in weakness, but, since Jesus dwells in me, "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me." "I in them." It is the glory of the believer that Christ dwells in him. "Unto you that believe He is precious."

Hence we gather the security of the believer. Brother, if Christ be in me, and I am overcome, Christ is conquered too, for He is in me. "I in them." I cannot comprehend the doctrine of believers falling from grace. If Christ has once entered into them, will He not abide with them? Paul saith, "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." To that persuasion I set my hand and seal.

I know not what more to say, not because I have nothing more, but because I do not know which to bring forward out of a thousand precious things; but I leave the subject with you. Go home, and live in the power of this blessed text. Go home, and be as happy as you can be to live, and if you get a little happier that will not hurt you, for then you will be in Heaven. Keep up unbroken joy in the Lord. It is not "I in them" for Sundays, and away on Mondays; "I in them" when they sit in the Tabernacle, and out of them when they reach home. No; "I in them," and that forever and forever. Go and rejoice. Show this blind world that you have a happiness which as much outshines theirs as the sun outshines the sparks which fly from the chimney and expire. Go forth with joy and be led forth with peace; let the mountains and the hills break forth before you into singing.

"All that remains for me
Is but to love and sing,
And wait until the angels come,
To bear me to the King."

"Oh, but I have my troubles." I know you have your troubles, but they are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in you, nor even with your present glory. I feel as if I could not think about troubles, nor sins, nor anything else when I once behold the love of God to me. When I feel my love to Christ, which is but God's love to Christ, burning within my soul, then I glory in tribulation, for the power of God shall be through these afflictions made manifest in me. "I in them." God bless you with the knowledge of this mystery, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—
John 17.]

"A DROP TO KEEP THE SPIRITS UP."

"WHERE are you off to now?"

This question, although somewhat prying, was asked of two men who were moving pretty briskly across the road.

Doubtless, if they had been more leisurely in their movements, and less eager in their looks, the question would never have been asked. But under the circumstances the questioner might well be pardoned for thinking that there was, as he afterward expressed it, "something up."

There was "something up." And the men were not slow to confess it. They were off, they said, for "a drop to keep the spirits up."

Apparently, this reply was entirely satisfactory. It was a sufficient justification for their unusual hurry. He perfectly understood it. He himself was both eager and quick in his movements when off for "a drop to keep the spirits up."

I am not satisfied, however. I hold their reply to be eminently unsatisfactory. And it is with this conviction that I now purpose to take a good long look at this expression. Time and labor will not be thrown away if I can show that there is no more delusive set of words than these, "A drop to keep the spirits up."

In the first place, they do not keep the spirits up, if by "spirits" is meant the spirit of merriment, and laughter, and lightness. It sends them up, if you like, for a moment or two; perhaps for an hour or two. But as for keeping them up, a glance at the drinker's face soon after will testify to the direct opposite. In the act of drinking there is no doubt a flash of enjoyment and satisfaction, but how long does it last?

Isn't it a fact as clear as daylight, that instead of "keeping the spirits up," it sends them down? Where will you find gloomier and more dismal faces than those of the men who, but a little before, visited the public-house? It is a great mistake surely to speak of "a drop to keep the spirits up."

And even if they did keep the spirits up, what are they worth when they are up? A man may laugh, and joke, and sing songs, and yet not be really happy. Excitement and happiness are by no means the same thing. Beer and brandy are not the manufacturers of true peace, and never can be. And if a looker-on can pass an opinion, he would only pity the man who, having taken his drop, has got "his spirits up."

Of all sad and melancholy sights that any sensible man can witness, few can give a greater heart-ache than that of the man whose drop has sent his "spirits up."

And another fact worth pondering, is the kind of spirits the drop keeps up. Not good spirits, but bad ones. These, if you like, are kept up. Bad tempers, bad thoughts, bad desires, bad everything. The worst part of a man gets uppermost when the drink is in. In this sense of the word, men are perfectly right who expect the drink to keep their spirits up.

And here is a question which will not come amiss in our consideration of this expression. Are "spirits" the only things to be kept up? Surely, a wise man will remember that there are many other things beside this. There's position to be kept up. There's strength to be kept up. There's the home to be kept up. There's reputation to be kept up. Which are the most important, these things, or the "spirits"? And who doesn't know that either the one or the other must go to the wall? Pursue "the drop," and money, time, respectability, position, home, and strength must be squandered. O! foolish men, so to scatter your substance for the sake of a shadow.

And then, how long will the "drop" suffice? When the drop loses its virtue, as in the very nature of things it must, you will have to multiply it, "to keep the spirits up." And not only will you need more drops, but drops of stronger and more fiery stuff. And where will you stop? It is a perilous path that you have chosen. It is a path where many are even now stumbling and falling. It is a path which, if you pursue it, must lead to utter drunkenness. Terribly sad is the prospect of that man who is obliged to add to his drops in order "to keep his spirits up."

Neither should we forget the abominable selfishness of the man. As though his "spirits" were the only "spirits" in the universe. He quite forgets that his wife and family, and friends and neighbors, have "spirits" as desirous and as worthy of being "kept up" as his own.

But no, so long as his spirits are kept up, others' spirits may go down as much as they like. So long as his spirits are high, nobody has a right to complain of the way in which he does it, although they may suffer from his free expenditure. If the landlord seeks his rent, the tradesman the payment of his account, the wife money for bread and clothing, they should, one and all, be satisfied with the information that he is "keeping his spirits up." Whatever is left after his spirits are kept up, he promises faithfully to pay in. And if they are not contented with this, they ought to be ashamed of themselves. O, miserable man! So eaten up with selfishness! A hardening process indeed is this of "keeping the spirits up!"

"Keeping the spirits up!" Up where? Not "up" in a spiritual sense, certainly down, down, terribly down, as regards the never-dying soul. How can that man, whose only object in life is "to keep the spirits up" by strong drink, face the great Judge at the last great day? With spirit soiled and blackened, it will fare ill with him then.

Better far to cease these drinkings, to spurn

these false supports, and to seek the one only way of peace through the Lord Jesus Christ, who "made peace by the blood of His Cross."
"There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

ARABI PACHA,

THE leader of the revolution in Egypt, whose portrait appears in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, is a man whose capacities are variously estimated by those who have come in contact with him. The first notice of him that reached the world outside of Egypt was that he was the colonel of a regiment in the Egyptian army. He was represented as an ambitious man, without education or culture, but very popular in the army. He received an excellent education in a military school. After leaving the military school he entered the army and remained for some time in the ranks. Although the late Khédive patronized him he did not advance above the rank of major under that ruler. On three different occasions he endeavored to obtain the rank of Bey or Colonel, but Ismail replied to the person advocating his cause: "If I create him a Colonel, he will create a revolt in the regiment under his command in less than six months." But when Ismail abdicated, his son and successor, Tewfik, shortly after his accession gazetted Arabi a colonel.

In January, 1881, Arabi aroused an agitation against the favoritism shown by the Khédive of Egypt toward Turkish and Circassian officers. Arabi, who is an Arabian by birth and about forty-five years of age, conceived the idea of forming a national party in Egypt looking toward the expulsion from Egypt of the Turkish Khédive as well as the English and French controllers. The army was officered exclusively by Turks, and the civil service was in the hands of

Ismail, the late Khédive, had expended large sums of money in unproductive public works, on his own palaces and on his harem. He had borrowed this money at a high rate of interest, principally in England and France. He was unable to pay either interest or principal, for of the taxes levied, large sums were stolen by the collectors and other officials. He then applied to his creditors for assistance, and by the advice of the European governments placed the conduct of the finances in the hands of controllers appointed by England and France. Under their management the taxes were honestly applied to the expenses of the government, including the payment of the interest on the debt. But, with a singular lack of sagacity and tact, they dismissed the Egyptian employees of the government and filled the offices with their own relatives and hangers on, who in many cases did not even know the language of the country, and while performing a small modicum of service drew large salaries from the impoverished national treasury.

DISCONTENT WAS SPREADING rapidly, and Arabi found no difficulty in fanning the glowing embers into a flame. He had read the history of such heroes as Washington and Napoleon, and without understanding anything of the circumstances which gave strength to their cause, his ambition was fired to tread in their footsteps. His first effort was directed toward the removal of the Turkish and Circassian officers in the army, he feeling assured that with Arab officers the army might be used to coerce the Khédive into dismissing the controllers, and after that he might succeed in deposing the Khédive himself. The project was a dazzling one, and it had in its favor several important coincidences. The Khédive was a weak man, the Sultan of Turkey had his hands full at home, France was busy in Tunis and England was ruled by a man remarkable for nothing so much as his dilatory and vacillating foreign policy.

ARABI'S FIRST MOVEMENT

—that of a petition against the Turkish officers—resulted in his being cast into prison, with two other Arab officers who had supported him. Before they were tried, and while the court was still sitting on their case, the regiments rose and carried off their officers. They then demanded their reinstatement without trial. The Khédive and Ministers protested, entreated, but the attitude of the troops was so threatening that the Khédive gave way. They demanded, further, that the Minister of War should be dismissed, with the same result. Incited by Arabi they then demanded the right of electing their own officers, and when this was agreed to they asked that their numbers should be increased.

Other demands followed, and the Khédive becoming uneasy, accepted the advice of Riaz Pacha, his minister of war, and ordered the removal of Arabi's regiment from Cairo to Alexandria. Then open rebellion broke out, and the troops surrounded the palace of the Khédive and demanded that the Minister who had advised the obnoxious measure should be dismissed with his colleagues, and menaced the Khédive with deposition in the event of his refusal. The danger was imminent, and the Khédive, being without protection and at the mercy of the army, made the concession demanded. The ministers were dismissed and a new cabinet formed, in which Arabi himself held the portfolio of Minister of War. Arabi's first step was the convocation of a species of parliament, which he called an Assembly of Notables, composed of leading men of the various provinces, but only such as Arabi thought were favorable to his design of expelling the English and French controllers. This body was convened on the 26th of December, 1881, and proposed to establish reforms limiting the power of the Khédive and vesting the power of levying taxes in its own hands.

England and France had been watching the progress of events with anxiety because of the large interests which their subjects had as holders of Egyptian bonds, and on the 8th of January last they united in to the Khédive informing him that the two governments "consider the maintenance of His Highness on the throne under the conditions sanctioned by successive firmans of the Porte, and which they have officially accepted, as being at present and in the future the only possible guarantee for the maintenance of order and the development of the general prosperity of the country." This, however, had no effect on the Notables, and on the 2d of February Cherif Pasha, the Prime Minister, resigned, being unwilling to provoke a conflict with the European governments and feeling it impossible to conduct the government in opposition to the Notables, who were really the creatures of the army.

The next important event, and the one which ultimately produced the present crisis, was the discovery about three months ago of among the Circassian officers in the army against Arabi. They were charged with conspiring to take his life, and were tried before a court-martial of his friends, who sentenced forty Circassian officers to be degraded and sent to the extreme Soudan region, where the climate is so unhealthy that few exiles ever return. The Khédive, acting by order of the Sultan of Turkey, who was as much under the power of England and France as the Khédive himself, refused his sanction to the sentence, and commuted the punishment to a mere exile out of Egypt. Arabi and his party protested against this act, and a pronouncement was issued in Cairo. The Khédive was informed by Arabi, on the 10th of May, that he would be deposed if he persisted in refusing his sanction.

Cairo, the Capital of Egypt.

in consequence of these threats and the danger to public order, the consuls general of England and France telegraphed to their Governments for ships of war to sustain the authority of the Khédive. Meanwhile Turkey was secretly encouraging Arabi to resist and sent him a decoration of honor. A pacha also was sent from Turkey, who appears to have exerted no useful influence.

Finally, an ultimatum was handed by the English and French ministers to the Khédive, requiring him to banish Arabi Pacha. He, poor fellow, would have been glad enough to comply on his own account, or even to have his ambitious subject beheaded, but he had no means of executing his sentence, and he knew well enough that if he injured a hair of Arabi's head he would have to reckon with the whole army, who had now come to regard Arabi as a national hero. The situation was further complicated by the outbreak of a riot in Alexandria on June 11th, which if not ordered by Arabi was instigated by him, and a large number of Europeans were killed.

British ships were sent to Alexandria in the hope that they would frighten Arabi into submission. Arabi, however, declined to be scared, and commenced strengthening the fortifications of the harbor. As the guns were so placed as to bear on the ships, orders were issued by the admiral in command to discontinue the work. These orders were disregarded, and then the British fleet opened fire and dismantled all the forts. Arabi then let loose a tribe of wild Bedouins and convicts from the prisons, whom he ordered to burn and pillage the city. He then hoisted a flag of truce to stop the British fire, and under its protection he escaped with his troops to a position of safety.

Arabi's movement being called a national movement, and its object being stated as "Egypt for the Egyptians," has called forth much sympathy in his behalf in this country, which has been fostered by public speakers who should have known better. Arabi's object is simply to replace the Khédive with a military despotism of which he would be the head and hold supreme power. If he were successful the last state of that land would be far worse than the first.

has recently been published from the pen of Dr. Henry M. Field, the eminent Presbyterian minister of New York, who met the Egyptian agitator during his recent visit to Egypt and conversed with him. Dr. Field says: "The first time I saw Arabi Pacha but a moment, but the second time I was in his society for a whole evening. It was last February. Consul General Wolf, with General Stone, the chief of staff to the Khédive, and some other Americans passing the winter at Cairo, thought it would be pleasant to celebrate Washington's Birthday with a grand dinner, which was given at the hotel where I was stopping. It brought together a distinguished company, although it is not common for Arabs and Europeans to mingle, and all the Khédive's Ministers were present. There was the greatest curiosity to see Arabi, and I was placed opposite him at the table.

"He is a man of large physique and rather heavy features; but his eye looked as if it might flash fire were he aroused. He had committed a gross act of insubordination in leading the army against the government, for which, had Ismail Pacha been still Khédive, he would undoubtedly have been shot. I felt that he might be destined to supreme power or death, and I observed him closely. His manner was very quiet, and although it was a merry party and Americans and Europeans on all sides were gayly drinking wine he was very grave, and I noticed that he did not even raise the cup to his lips. He spoke Arabic, but through the interpreter he told me that he had come out that evening, although not feeling well, to do honor to the memory of a man who had freed his country from a foreign yoke. I felt that he was thinking that what Washington had done for America he might do for Egypt.

"I was not impressed with his greatness. He is unquestionably a very brave man, for he took his life in his hand when he revolted against the government, but his looks do not indicate greatness. His heavy jaw shows a strong will, and his eye indicates craft, but if he proves himself a great man he will disappoint most people who have studied his face.

"He is a Moslem above all things. A gentleman who knew him intimately told me that he is very devout in private. Undoubtedly he is thoroughly established in the faith of Mohammed. He is also considered by those who know him well a sincere patriot—that is, he desires to elevate Egypt and make his country great. But selfish ambition is mingled with his devotion to Egypt and Mohammed, and he would like to make himself a monarch."

CAIRO.

THE attention of the whole world has for some months been attracted to Egypt by the stirring political events which have occurred there. Though the centre of interest has for the moment shifted to the city of Alexandria, it was originally at Cairo the capital of Egypt, that the movement originated which is now agitating the cabinets of Europe, and it is in that city that the final development of the agitation will be witnessed.

The illustration on this page represents the portion of the city of Cairo most frequented, on account of its including the principal Mahomedan place of worship, the Mosque of Sultan Hassan. This mosque is a building of exceeding beauty, its two tall and graceful minarets rendering it a conspicuous object throughout the city. The walls of the mosque are very strong and massive; they have frequently afforded protection, during the five centuries that have elapsed since they were erected, to insurgents who have seized the building and used it as a fortress, in constantly recurring revolutions. Its courtyard is paved with marble strangely streaked with red. These streaks were not in the marble when it was laid, they are the stains of blood shed in defending the building at various times of conflict.

Near the mosque is the citadel, which, like many eastern strongholds, is quite a town in itself, and contains some of the largest fountains to be found in the locality. It is situated on the side of a hill, commanding the city, and is said to occupy the site of the Acropolis of ancient Bablioun.

The citadel will always be a matter of historical interest from the fact that it was the scene of the massacre of the Mamelukes, by Mehemet Ali, in 1811. Only one escaped, Emir Bey, who spurred his charger over a heap of his slaughtered comrades, and sprang upon the battlements. "It was a dizzy height," says the historian Warburton, "but the next moment he was in the air; another, and he was disengaging himself from his crushed and dying horse, amid a shower of bullets." He escaped and found sanctuary in a mosque. The eastern platform terrace of the citadel whence he leaped is still called "the Mameluke's leap."

The city of Cairo covers about three square miles, and is surrounded by a wall of considerable strength. Under the rule of the late Khédive the city was very greatly improved. New streets were opened, imposing buildings erected and it was lighted with gas. The frequent outbreak of religious riots brought about the precaution of separating the city on religious or race lines. The Christians, the Jews, the Turks, etc., have each their separate quarter divided off by huge gates, which are closed and guarded every night. The entire population of Cairo is 327,462, about the same as that of Baltimore, Md. What their present condition is there is no means of learning. Since the Khédive removed from Cairo to Alexandria, so as to be near the British fleet on which he relied to protect him from his own army, little has been heard of the state of Cairo. Reports of anarchy and of the slaughter of Europeans have been brought in, but they were not considered trustworthy, though probably not without foundation.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Last Words.

PHEBE had sauntered out one evening, ankle-deep among the heather, aimless in her wanderings, and a little dejected in spirits. For the long summer day had been hot, even up here on the hills, and a dull film had hidden the broad landscape from her eyes, shutting her in upon herself and her disquieting thoughts. "We are always happy when we can see far enough," says Emerson; but Phebe's horizon was all dim and overcast. She could see no distant and clear sky-line. Therefore the sight of Jean Merle's figure coming near to her through the dull haziness brought a quick throb to her pulse, and she ran down the rough wagon track to meet him.

"A letter from Felix," he called, before she reached him. "I came out with it, for you could not get it before to-morrow by post, and I am longing to hear news of him and Hilda."

They walked slowly back to the cottage, side by side, reading the letter together, for Felix could have nothing to say to Phebe which his father might not see. There was nothing of importance in it; only a brief journal dispatched by a homeward-bound vessel that had crossed the track of their steamer; but every word was read with deep and silent interest, neither of them speaking till they had read the last line.

"And now you will have tea with me?" said Phebe joyfully.

He entered the little kitchen, so dark and cool to him after his sultry walk up the long, steep lanes, and sat watching her absently, yet with a pleasant consciousness of her presence, as she kindled her fire of dry furze and wood, and hung a little kettle over it by a chain hooked to a staple in the chimney, and arranged her curious old china, picked up long years ago by her father at village sales, and set the quaintly carved table in the coolest spot of the dusky room. There was an air of busy, simple gladness in her face, and in every quick, yet graceful movement, that was inexpressibly charming to him. Maybe, both of them glanced back at the dark past, when Roland Sefton had sat watching her with despairing eye; but neither of them spoke of it. That life was dead and buried. The present was altogether different.

Yet the meal was a silent one, and as soon as it was ended they went out again on to the hazy moorland.

"Are you quite rested yet, Phebe?" asked Jean Merle.

"Quite," she answered, with unconscious emphasis.

"And you have settled upon some plan for the future?" he said.

"No," she replied; "I am altogether at a loss. There is no one in all the world who has a claim upon me, or whom I have a claim upon; no one to say to me 'go,' or 'come.' When the world is all before you, and it is an empty world, it is difficult to choose what way you will take in it."

She had paused as she spoke, but now they walked on again in silence, Jean Merle looking down on her sweet, yet somewhat sad face with attentive eyes. How little changed she was from the simple, faithful-hearted girl he had known long ago! There was the same candid and thoughtful expression on her face, and the same serene light in her blue eyes, as when she stood beside him, a little girl, patiently yet earnestly mastering the first difficulties of reading. There was no one in the wide world whom he knew as perfectly as he knew her; no one who knew him as perfectly as she did.

"Tell me, Phebe," he said gravely, "is it possible you have lived so long, and that no man has found out what a priceless treasure you might be to him?"

"No one," she answered, with a little tremor in her voice, "only Simon Nixey," she added, laughing.

Jean Merle stopped, and laid his hand on Phebe's arm.

"Will you be my wife?" he asked.

The brief question escaped him before he was aware of it. It was as utterly new to him as it was to her; yet the moment it was uttered he felt how much the happiness of his life depended upon her answer. Without her all the future would be dreary and lonely for him. With her—Jean Merle did not dare to think of the gladness that might yet be his.

"No, no," cried Phebe, looking up into his face furrowed with deep lines, "it is impossible! You ought not to ask me."

"Why?" he said.

She did not move, or take away her eyes from his face. A rush of sad memories and associations was sweeping across her. She saw him as he had been long ago, so far above her that it had seemed an honor to her to do him the meanest service. She thought of Felicitia in her unapproachable loveliness and stateliness, and of their home, so full to her of exquisite refinement and luxury. In the true humility of her nature she had looked up to them as far above her, dwelling on a height to which she made no claim. And this dethroned and discredited king of her early days was a king yet, though he stood before her as Jean Merle, still fast bound in the chains his sins had riveted about him.

"I am utterly unworthy of you," he said, eagerly and sorrowfully; "but let me justify myself if I can. I had no thought of asking you such a question when I came up here. But you spoke mournfully of your loneliness; and I, too, am lonely, with no human being on whom I have any claim. It is so by my own sin. But you, at least, have friends; and in a year or two, when Mr. Clifford dies, you will go out to them; to my children, whom I have forfeited and lost forever. I am older than you, poorer, a dishonor to my father's house. Yet for an instant I fancied you might learn to love me; and no one but you can ever know me for what I am; only your faithful heart can possess my secret. It was a selfish impulse that prompted me to speak. Forgive me, Phebe, and forget it if you can."

"I never can forget it," she answered with a low sob.

"Then I have done you a wrong," he went on; "for we were friends, were we not? And you will never again be at home with me as you have hitherto been. I was no more worthy of your friendship than of your love; and I have lost both."

"No, no," she cried, in a broken voice, "I never thought—it seems impossible. But oh! I love you; I have never loved any one like you. Only it seems impossible that you should wish me to be your wife."

"Cannot you see what you will be to me?" he said passionately; "it will be like reaching home after a weary exile; like finding a fountain of living waters after crossing a burning wilderness. I ought not to ask it of you, Phebe. But what man could doom himself to endless thirst and exile? If you love me so much that you do not see how unworthy I am of you, I cannot give you up again. You are all the world to me."

"But I am only Phebe Marlowe," she said, still doubtfully.

"And I am only Jean Merle," he replied.

Phebe walked down the old familiar lanes with Jean Merle, and returned to the moorlands alone, while the sun was still above the horizon. But a soft west wind had risen, and the hazy heat was gone. She could see the sun sinking low behind Riversborough, while the fine cloud of smoke hanging over it this summer evening was tinged with gold. Her future home lay there, under the shadow of those spires, and beneath the soft floating veil ascending from a thousand hearths. The home Roland Sefton had forfeited, and Felicitia had forsaken, had become hers. There was a deep sadness mingled with the strange, unanticipated happiness of the present hour; and Phebe did not seek to put it away from her heart.

Nothing could have delighted Mr. Clifford so much as a marriage between Jean Merle and Phebe Marlowe. The thought of it had more than once crossed his mind, but he had not dared to cherish it as a hope. When Jean Merle told him that night how Phebe had consented to become his wife the old man's gladness knew no bounds.

"She is as dear to me as my own daughter," he said, in tremulous accents, "and now, at last, shall have her under the same roof with me. I shall never lie awake in the night again, fearing lest I should miss her on my death-bed. I should like Phebe Marlowe to hold my hand in hers as long as I am conscious of anything in this world. All the remaining years of my life I shall have you and her with me as my children. God is very good to me."

But to Felix and Hilda it was a vexation and surprise to hear that their Phebe Marlowe, so exclusively their own, was no longer to belong only to them. They could not tell, as none of us can tell with regard to our friends' marriages, what she could see in that man to make her willing to give herself to him. They never cordially forgave Jean Merle, though in the course of the following year he lavished upon them munificent gifts. For when Mr. Clifford died, in less than twelve months after his marriage, Jean Merle found himself once more a wealthy man, and, as the old banker's heir standing high in the estimation of Riversborough.

No parents could have been more watchful over the interests of their children than he and Phebe were for the welfare of Felix and Hilda. But these two could never reconcile themselves to the marriage. They felt that Phebe's shortcoming made the old country less of a home to them; she had severed the last link that bound them to it. Canon Pascal alone cordially rejoiced in the event, though conscious there was some deep secret about it which was to be kept forever from all the world.

"Phebe," said her husband some few days after the funeral of Mr. Clifford, "do you feel as if you would be happy out of England?"

"I could be happy anywhere with you, if I knew we were not acting against God's will," she answered.

"I feel," he said, "as if this place grew more intolerable to me. I walk among my fellow-townsmen as one guilty of perpetual deceit, knowing more of them than they think I know. It seems to me as if I could live a truer and simpler life in my mother's old home among her people. Would it grieve you to live in Switzerland?"

"In Switzerland?" she repeated.

"Yes," he replied, "this house is haunted for me. I cannot shake off its oppressive memories. Out yonder there would be no memories but those of my boyhood; for we will not go near Engelberg, Phebe. Where my grandfather lived is a quiet village up the mountains, with a wide parish, and a very simple population. We could find work enough among them, and I should feel more at peace there than here. Only you would feel it strange and foreign, I fear."

"No," she answered, "not with you."

So in the distant mountain village, where his happiest and most innocent days had been spent, Jean Merle found a new home. Phebe also lived in a more natural atmosphere among the simple people, and the simple customs of the little village, than she had done as Jean Merle's wife in the old house at Riversborough. The past lay all behind them; to Jean Merle as a thirsty and burning wilderness which he had crossed; to Phebe as the green pastures and quiet waters beside which her path homeward had led her, on that pilgrimage which was not yet ended. Yet though Jean Merle thanked God daily, and felt his love for Phebe growing and deepening, there were times, when in brief intervals of utter loneliness of spirit, the long buried past arose again, and cried to him with sorrowful voice amid the tranquil happiness of the present.

The children who called Phebe mother looked up into his face with eyes too like those of the little son and daughter whom he had once forsaken, and their sweet shrill voices at play sounded like the echo of those far-off tones, which had first stirred his heart to its very depths. For there were times when he had still to pass through deep waters, with the light of his Father's face withdrawn, and the sense of forgiveness lost. He had sinned greatly, and suffered greatly, and the scars of that bitter conflict remained. He loved, as he might never otherwise have loved, the Lord, whose discipline he professed to be; yet there remained for him seasons of bitter remembrances, and vain looking ack upon the irrevocable past. It was no part of her nature to inquire jealously if her husband loved her as much as she loved him. In this, as in all other things, she knew "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Her tenderness for him was perfectly unselfish and faithful, and she was satisfied that she made him happier than he could have been in any other way. No one else knew him as she knew him; Felicita herself could never have been to him what she was. When darkness fell upon him, and she saw his grave face sadder than usual, she left everything to sit beside him, with his hand in hers, ministering to him by her silent and tranquil sympathy; and by-and-by the sadness fled away. This true heart of hers, that new all, and loved him in spite of all, was to him sure token of the love of God.

THE END.

THE FRUITLESS TREE.

S. Lesson for Aug. 6, Mark 11 : 12-23. Golden Text, John 15 : 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jesus Hungering for more than Ordinary Food—Fruitless Human Trees—Life without Development—The only Source of Life—A Wonderful Declaration—The Sentence on the Fig Tree—Why it was Pronounced—Unreal Prayer—The Lord's Pledge Absolute.

ON the morrow after His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, Jesus was hungry. We are not told how He was engaged during the night, but very probably some part of it was passed in communion with God, for the Gospel of Luke tells us, "In the day time He was teaching in the temple; and at night He went out, and abode in the mount that is called the Mount of Olives" (Luke 21 : 37). Jesus "was hungry": His hunger and His thirst were of a deeper kind than those of most men. When He said to the Samaritan woman, "Give Me to drink," He thirsted for that woman's soul, that He might deliver her from sin, and make her a vessel of His grace to others, much more than for the water of Jacob's well, and when she left her waterpot, and went into the city with her simple, self-condemning message, "Come, see a Man, which told me all things that ever I did; is not his the Christ?" He had meat to eat of which His disciples knew not; the longings of His heart were satisfied, there was in that woman a blessed proof that He had not labored in vain. And on the present occasion He was hungering for more than ordinary food.

"Seeing a fig tree afar off, having leaves, He came, if haply He might find anything thereon: and when He came to it, He found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet." To how many of the children of men does Jesus come, hungry after some fruit of all His labors and sufferings, and find there nothing to satisfy

THE LONGINGS OF HIS HEART,

"nothing but leaves." To how many of His own loves He come, seeking the fruit of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. 5 : 22), and instead of this precious fruit, He finds nothing but leaves; an evidence of life, but not of development; the tree beautiful in itself, but yielding nothing. Jesus said, "Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be My disciples." His own life was one long giving itself out in fruit to God and man; it was all yielding. And He would have us to be like Him, always yielding, always giving out that which will satisfy God. But O how true are His words, "From Me shall ye fruit find" (Hos. 14 : 8). "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in Me" (John 15 : 4). All is the outcome of the life of Jesus who dwells in us, manifest in our mortal body (2 Cor. 4 : 10, 11); it is not us at all, it is His own life with its peculiar properties, His own nature with its special characteristics.

"Love" is the exact contrary of self, and cannot exist but on the death of self. Joy, real joy, comes from Christ's joy being in us, and then our joy is full (John 15 : 11), for joy in what we are or what we have is short-lived, the fount of it is soon exhausted. Love creates "longsuffering, gentleness, goodness," these are but manifestations of a self-forgetful love. And who can love God without trusting Him? therefore Christ in us must produce "faith" in God, and also in one another, for nothing wounds love like distrust. Faith again brings with it "meekness" and "temperance," for faith which always sees God cannot assert itself in His presence, and must therefore be meek; recognizing His hand, must be temperate, neither given to exaltation nor to depression.

But how many there are who sigh to bring forth such fruit, and yet are conscious that the Master finds on them "wild grapes" (Isa. 5 : 2), or "nothing but leaves." And yet they strive, and pray, and do all they can, but it is in vain; they are seeking to do themselves that which Christ in them alone can do, what He wants of them is themselves as His dwelling-place, where He can produce His own fruit. "He that abideth in Me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without Me [apart from Me] ye can do nothing." How clear is the inference here, that if we are doing nothing, if we are bringing forth no fruit, we are not abiding in Him and He in us. We may be doing something, or hoping for something, independently of Jesus; but the branches severed from the vine lose the vital power which is fruit producing. "I am determined I will love such and such a person who has injured me," says a self-reliant Christian. But the injury is repeated, the determination is put to the test, the Christian feels himself wronged, and all his determination goes to the winds. "Lord Jesus," says a self-surrendered Christian, "Thou hast permitted me to be tried by the injury of such an one: Lord I trust Thee in me to love him, and to keep me from any bitter feeling," and the Lord surely responds.

Perhaps the most wonderful declaration of our Lord regarding fruit-bearing is the following: "Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in My name, He may give it you" (John 15 : 16). God is longing to put us in possession of power with Him.

HE WANTS US TO CONQUER HIM, prevail with Him, and obtain what we will; but in order that this may be possible, we are ordained to bring forth fruit, and fruit which remains, immortal fruit, a life and ministry which is eternal in its character and issues, because it gives God His place. The life of any man which is not thus serving God's purpose is useless, and the branches in the vine which do not bear fruit He takes away; but men gather them, like the savorless salt they are "trodden under foot of men" (Matt. 5 : 13). Yes, men, men of the world gather the fruitless branches, the savorless salt, the light hidden under a bushel, and seek to prove from such as these that Christianity is a failure.

Jesus had a lesson to teach His disciples, and He said to the fig-tree, "No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever." Does this look like severity? It is the same Lord who spoke the parable of the unfruitful fig tree, for which the dresser of his vineyard pleaded, saying, "Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit well; and if not, then after that Thou shalt cut it down." The Jewish nation had been dug about and tended, God had sent unto Jerusalem prophets "rising up early and sending them," but they had not hearkened to His voice. And now there was but one course, they must be cut off from being a people, must be put out of their position of honor as God's chosen witnesses, and "abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image [or a standing], and without an ephod, and without teraphim" (Hos. 3 : 4). And just as surely, any child of God who has been in a position of privilege, who has been sought again and again by God, and who has nevertheless refused to deny himself, take up his cross and follow Christ, must be cut off from his privileges, and be eternally a loser; there is no other alternative, there must be fruit-bearing or death (Heb. 6 : 7, 8).

After teaching in the temple, Jesus went with

His disciples, probably after dark, out of the city. "And in the morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots. And Peter calling to remembrance saith unto Him, Master, behold, the fig tree which Thou cursedst is withered away. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God," or "Have the faith of God." As though to say, As living "by the faith of the Son of God" (Gal. 2 : 20), deal with God and have power about everything. "For verily I say unto you, That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith." "Shall not doubt in his heart," this is the essential for prevailing prayer. How often we are requested, "Pray every day" for such and such a blessing for my daughter or my son, or for the healing of such an invalid. Now if God really did undertake the case the first day it was laid before Him, why continue asking Him to do it, as though He had not undertaken it? O how much there is of

UNREAL PRAYER!

Sometimes we depend more upon the feeling of our own hearts, the measure of liberty we have had in prayer, than on the faithfulness of God. How can He answer us? We are looking for the answer really from our own earnestness, and thus our expectation is from ourselves and not from God. Let us give God credit for being at least as real as we ourselves, and if we have actually committed a thing into His hands, let us not act as though He were indifferent to it.

Elijah said to the prophets of Baal, "Cry aloud; for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked" (1 Kings 18 : 27). Too many follow with regard to God, advice thus given in regard to Baal. But when Elijah himself began to pray he put his case in a few simple words before God, there and then counting upon the answer, "and the fire of the Lord fell." O for more of reality in prayer! "Shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass." In these words there is no perhaps, there is no If it be Thy will, all is certainty; when we have God to deal with, we may be absolute. For "if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us: and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask; we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him" (1 John 5 : 14, 15). "We know that we have," not we feel that we have; we know it, because God cannot fail us; we know it, because "faithful is He that calleth you, who also will do it" (1 Thess. 5 : 24).

The Lord continued, "Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them," or (Rev. Ver.), believe that ye have received them, and ye shall have them. "But," say many, "is not this to believe a lie?" If we were dealing with fallible, unreliable man, it might be so, but God is pledged to keep His Word, and to be true to Himself; to trust Him with anything is to place it in the utmost security, a thing cannot be unsafe in His hands; and thus we may say when we have lodged a request with Him, which is according to his will, "It shall be done," for we dishonor Him if we are not absolute about it.

A Word of Sound Advice to the Advocates of prohibition was spoken by Rev. Phillips Brooks at the last meeting of the Temperance Union in Boston the other day. Dr. Brooks urged that the best help to the movement would be the establishing of places that would successfully compete with the beer saloons in point of attraction for men who had uncomfortable homes. He said everything which makes it possible for a poor man to find some healthy stimulus outside the grog-shop will have an inestimable influence in bringing about total abstinence. We may close our grog-shops just as completely as we can, but if we do not open places where the poor, hard-working, unfortunate people can resort, they will find places of their own in spite of all the laws that can be made."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The International Conference at Constantinople convened to consider the Egyptian problem, after repeated invitations to Turkey to participate has at length received notice from the Sultan of his acceptance of the invitation. The note of acceptance does not imply that the Sultan will send troops to Egypt, but it is now proposed by England that she, with the aid of France and Italy, shall protect the Suez Canal, while the Turkish army operates in the interior against Arabi. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald telegraphs that "daily sessions of the Conference are being held, where the more serious duties of the wily diplomatists are sandwiched between delightful variations of lawn tennis, five o'clock tea, riding parties and sailing excursions. The six Plenipotentiaries pull together in most delightful harmony in everything except politics. The concentrated wisdom of Europe, as represented by the Therapia Conference, seems to have at length come to the conclusion that the Egyptian question can now be solved in no other way but by sending a military expedition to Egypt. But of what troops this expedition is to be composed, or, in other words, who is to bell the cat, is a point upon which no two of the ambassadors agree. To send Turkish troops would be simply to reinforce Arabi's army. To send European troops would kindle terrible flames in India and Algeria. The Conference is for the moment at a deadlock."

The Condition of Egypt is Described as one of complete anarchy. Arabi Pacha issues commands to the Governors of the provinces which are countermanded by the Khédive, and the Governors, not knowing whom to obey, are taking no precautions for the safety of Europeans. From Cairo and Port Said reports arrive of outrages and massacres, and the ruffians of the cities, which seem to form no inconsiderable part of the population, pillage and kill unchecked. The Khédive's following is of the smallest, and even of those who remain with him the majority are said to be in communication with Arabi. A reconnoissance has been made by the English troops in Alexandria of Arabi's position, and they were met by the Egyptian cavalry six miles from the city, where a skirmish ensued. Arabi was found occupying a strong position flanked by two rivers, from which it will be difficult to dislodge him. Arabi has embarrassed the English by diverting the Mahmoudieh Canal, which supplies Alexandria with water. The attitude of the people has changed from abject servility to sullenness and insolence. Newspaper correspondents in Egypt assert that there is no longer any doubt but that the religious hatred against Christians is spreading like a contagious disease from Egypt to Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor.

Active Preparations for War in Egypt are being made by England, and a special vote of $11,500,000 has been asked from the Parliament to defray the cost of the expedition. Twenty thousand men are to be sent out under the command of Sir Garnet Wolseley, the Duke of Connaught, Major-General Sir Archibald Alison and Major-General Sir Evelyn Wood will command the brigades under him. It is expected that the force will arrive at the seat of war in two weeks. Considerable indignation is expressed in Parliament and in the country against Mr. Gladstone, whose dilatory policy has rendered this large expenditure and serious risk necessary. It is apparent now that the bombardment of Alexandria ought not to have taken place until England had troops ready to follow up the attack. Had the troops been at hand Arabi's army might have been overcome, and the horrible slaughter of innocent persons and the destruction of property averted. Numerous blunders are reported in the preparation of the expedition.

Preparations for the Coronation of the Czar of Russia at the end of August are now being made. Fears of a Nihilistic explosion on the occasion have spread, and foreign courts and have made a change of the programme necessary. According to custom in such cases the foreign Powers would be represented by the heirs to the respective thrones of Europe. The invitation to Germany, however, elicited in reply a communication from the aged Emperor stating that the interest of his dynasty was opposed to his exposing the Crown Prince, and if he did not send his son on account of the danger he could not decently intrust the perilous mission to another of his relatives. Then the German Court, not wishing to be the sole one abstaining, communicated its reply to the other European Courts, which immediately decided on a general abstention. A St. Petersburg newspaper correspondent says: "The Emperor of Russia has been influenced in fixing positively the date of the coronation for August by certain proceedings of the party of the Grand Duke Constantine, which are beginning to develop themselves, and the phrase of 'the deposition of an uncrowned sovereign' is frequently to be heard. Placed in the alternative of either losing his life or his crown the Czar prefers to expose the first to save both, knowing that in losing the second he would probably lose the first and that all his dynasty and family would share his fate. He also knows that the party of the Grand Duke Constantine is being organized to this point, and that it is already completely provided with ministers who would accept the responsibility of a constitution." It is understood that some extensive reforms will be granted by the Czar on the occasion, but that the general demand for a constitution will not be granted.

The Appalling Destitution Prevailing in some districts in Ireland was described on July 20th in the House of Commons by the Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Trevelyan said that the official reports showed a state of abject pauperism existed throughout the west of Ireland. The poor rates were so heavy that they were threatening to reduce the whole population to beggary. It is stated that there are 800 homeless families in Clifden at present, although 1300 persons have lately been emigrated by the charity of Luke's Committee. The poverty of the people is so great that they have already sold or pawned the most necessary articles of furniture. One inspector reports that in Clifden alone he has seen 300 beds in pawn.

The Arrears of Rent Bill Introduced by the British Government for the relief of the Irish tenants passed the House of Commons on July 20th and was sent to the Lords. A new clause was previously inserted authorizing Boards of Guardians to borrow money to promote emigration, and empowers the Board of Works to make a free grant of £100,000 to the impoverished unions of Behnullet, Clifden, Newport, Oughterard and Swineford, where there is the greatest distress, for the same purpose. The Government stated in the course of the debate that care would be taken that emigrants should not be thrown adrift in the great cities of their new country, but that they should be forwarded to places where they could obtain work. Conservative opposition to the bill was anticipated in the Lords, but at a meeting of Conservative peers at Lord Salisbury's residence on July 21st to consider the course to be adopted, Lord Salisbury stated that, in consequence of the gravity of foreign affairs, he could not recommend the peers to bring about a crisis on a domestic question by rejecting the bill.

A Letter from Queen Victoria to Mrs. Booth, wife of the general of the Salvation Army, was read at the army's "field-day" at the Alexandra Palace on July 3d, at which about 20,000 persons were present. During the proceedings the letter was read by Mr. Booth, in which her Majesty, while declining to subscribe to the fund being raised for acquiring the Grecian Theatre, expresses the satisfaction with which she has heard of the society's efforts to win thousands of people "to the ways of temperance, virtue, and religion."

The Effect on Russian Business of the Jewish persecutions has been most disastrous. "They have," says the London Daily News, "put a complete stop to business, and the passenger traffic of the Russian Steam Navigation Company between Odessa, Nicolaieff, Kherson, and the Dneiper, and also of the South Russian Railways, fell lower than it had been in any previous year. The Kachovka May fair was a complete failure, as half of the Jews, who do nearly all the trading, abstained from appearing, and half the remainder hurried back their goods before the fair opened. At this time barges were hired and moored off the shore and household effects and valuable goods placed on board, to be safe in case of riot—those Jews who had Christian friends bringing to them for safe keeping their jewelry and documents.

The Programme of Messrs. Moody and Sankey has been arranged as far forward as April 14th, 1883, when they hope to return to America. From September 1st to 24th they expect to labor at Swansea and other towns in Wales. They then go to Plymouth, in the south of England. Thence on October 8th to Paris; on October 24th they will commence services in Bristol, England. After leaving Bristol they will hold services in Cambridge, Oxford, Torquay, Exeter and other large cities in England. From January 1st, 1883, to February 6th, they hope to work in Ireland. Returning to England on February 8th and commencing labor in Birmingham, they intend visiting also Leicester, Nottingham, Manchester, Leeds etc., arriving in Liverpool March 31st, and spending two weeks in that city, whence they hope to sail for America on April 14th.

Major Sawyer, of New York, is Earnestly following up Mr. Moody's work among the inebriates of Glasgow. The Circus, the scene of hundreds of conversions, not solely, but specially of drunkards, is now closed, and the degraded district of Cowcaddens is the centre of Mr. Sawyer's labors.

The United Christian Army Recently held its annual conference at Goole, England. It is an organization employing a similar method to the Salvation Army, but having a distinct organization. Most of its members originally belonged to the Salvation Army, but seceded from it on account of its recent strange developments and because of that "army" being a "one-man" movement. The United Christian Army has stations in Yorkshire and North Lincolnshire, and is purchasing and acquiring property at its several stations the last purchase being the Public Rooms there which cost them $8500. The main business of the conference was to settle a code of doctrines, as well as rules and regulations for the government of the "army." The doctrines defined are of the simplest—the belief in God, Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and the efficacy of Christ's atonement. The rules place the government of the body in the hands of an annual conference. Over 100 delegates and evangelists were present. The Rev. W. Garner presided, and he was subsequently, by the unanimous vote of all present elected general superintendent. Arrangements were made for the work of the coming year.

A Beautiful Bible was Presented to the Duke and Duchess of Albany recently among other gifts and congratulations at Buckingham Palace. The Countess of Aberdeen introduced a deputation of twenty young ladies, who presented the duchess with a beautiful Bible, subscribed for by twenty-six thousand maidens of the United Kingdom.

The REV. CANON ELLISON, President of the English Episcopal Church Temperance Society.—
The Great Temperance Fete at THE CRYSTAL PALACE, on July 4th.

THE REV. CANON ELLISON.

President of the Church of England Temperance Society.

The Pioneers of the Temperance Movement in the Episcopal Church of England—A Well-Deserved Encomium—Canon Ellison's Character, Qualifications, and Distinctions—Report of Convocation in 1870—A Drunkard Reclaimed—A Suicide Averted—The Crystal Palace Fête on July 4—The Mass-Meeting, and Speeches.

THE early band of temperance pioneers in the Episcopal Church included many clergymen of eminence for their services on behalf of the Gospel of Christ, and for the enlightenment and elevation of the people. Such were Dean Close, Canon Bardsley, Dr. Maguire, and Canon Babington, who stood shoulder to shoulder in the hard fight against prevalent drunkenness and consequent poverty and immorality. Among the most prominent and persevering stands the name of the Rev. Canon Ellison, who has throughout the whole course of the movement been a tower of strength to the temperance cause within the Church of England, and it is to his wise judgment and unflinching and well-directed zeal that, under God's blessing, the organization owes its great success and present commanding position.

CHURCH TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Some details of the origin and progress of this movement in the Church of England have already appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They were related in connection with the life of Mr. Robert Graham, whose portrait appeared in the issue of January 5th last, and who is the energetic and indefatigable secretary of the American Church Temperance Society. He was originally connected with the same movement in England.

Of Canon Ellison's efforts on behalf of the English Temperance Society there are many testimonies. The London Church Standard says of him: "It would be impossible to speak too highly of Canon Ellison's labors as a founder—one might almost say the founder—of the Church of England Temperance Society. At Church Congresses, conferences, public meetings, and in the pulpit, he has been from the first its chivalrous champion through evil report and keen criticism, and happily lives to see his labors crowned with a success far exceeding the most hopeful anticipations of those who were associated with him during the difficult course of its early history."

The progress of the society, which in its present form was inaugurated about ten years ago, like all efforts undertaken for the amelioration of the masses, has been attended with many difficulties, arising not only from the nature of the work itself, but also from the prejudices, and animosities, and misunderstandings, which have been encountered since its commencement; but so manifestly has the divine favor rested upon the heroic undertakings and untiring energy of the agents and agencies employed by the society, that nearly every diocese in Great Britain is now thoroughly organized for temperance effort; sermons are preached periodically in most of the churches; coffee-stalls and coffee-trucks have been multiplied in the streets; coffee taverns and workmen's restaurants established; and an illustrated and well-edited journal, entitled The Church of England Temperance Chronicle, is published weekly, dealing with every aspect of the temperance question in Great Britain.

QUALIFICATIONS AND DISTINCTIONS.

Canon Ellison is rather more than sixty years of age, but happily possesses the vitality and strength of many a far younger man. His duties are multifarious and onerous, but he discharges them with a readiness and ease which demonstrates the versatility of his genius and the cordiality and thoroughness of his devotion to the work in which he is engaged. He graduated at the University of Oxford about forty years ago, when he took his M. A. degree, and was appointed vicar of Edensford, in Derbyshire, whence he afterward removed to Windsor. There his labors in the church and in the cause of temperance were incessant. There was considerable scope in the royal borough for work in both capacities, and Mr. Ellison was not the man to leave undone, or half done, work ready to his hand. The result was that his health, never very robust, broke down and necessitated his removal to another sphere where the labors would be less onerous.

He accepted the appointment to the parish of Haseley, of which he is now the esteemed Rector; and as a result of the appreciation of the University authorities for his invariable urbanity, ripe scholarship, and conscientious ministry, he had the distinction conferred upon him of an honorary canonry in connection with his alma mater, Christ Church College, Oxford. He is also a Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and has been for many years past the able and energetic Chairman of the Church of England Temperance Society, and the controlling and directing leader of the movement.

REPORT OF CONVOCATION IN 1870.

A remarkable impetus to the work of the Church Temperance Society was given in 1870 in a report of Convocation issued in reply to an inquiry into "The Extent, the Causes, the Results, and the Remedies of Intemperance." The testimony as to the results of intemperance was unanimous and unqualified. In turning over the pages of the report such sentences as the following catch the eye: "No drunkard attends the ordinances of religion;" "Sabbath-breaking, swearing, and drunkenness are vices that go together;" "No room in man's heart for two Gods; when they worship drink, there is a corresponding absence from God's worship." Such were the unmistakable testimonies of those who had opportunities of observing the effects of the vice.

On the other side of the question, it was stated that in 2000 parishes there was no grogshop or beershop; and in answer to the inquiry, how does it work? twenty-five pages of testimonies were given: "The constable's office is a sinecure." "I have no squalor and misery, no rags, no tatters in my parish." "Magistrates never have a case from this parish, nor has there been a pauper in the union for a long time."

This Convocation report gave a remarkable impulse to temperance effort in the Church of England. The 2000 parishes thus privileged were placed in contrast with the other eight or ten thousand in which "crime, misery, lunacy, pauperism, disease, suicides, with a frightful waste of human life, and deterioration of national character," were resulting as the inevitable fruit of the evil tree of intemperance. Many of the clergy have long been laboring individually in their parishes to rescue drunkards from the slavery of their besetting vice; but now the necessity and wisdom of organized and united effort became apparent. Already, happily, a "Church of England Temperance Society" was in existence; and presently the committee of Convocation recommended this society as the very instrumentality required for dealing practically with the plague of national intemperance.

which were rescued during his residence in Windsor, and which happy result was in no small measure due to his own exertions. Among these was the case of George Annett, a man who made it his boast that he began to drink earlier in the day, and left off drinking later than any man in Windsor. Mary Annett, George's wife, had been the victim of his ill-treatment and neglect for twenty years, and was fast falling into premature old age. Mary was a Christian, and amid all her troubles had managed to give her children a Christian education, and when Canon Ellison first visited the house, though mother and children were uniting in prayer for the rescue of the drunkard, it was a most miserable and despairing home.

A second visit was paid by Canon Ellison to the home of the drunkard. A different sight greeted his eyes. The wife and children were rejoicing, for as the wife told him "George had signed the pledge." Canon Ellison at that time had not much faith in the pledge as a means of effecting a permanent change. He however welcomed the improvement in Annett gladly, and urged the wife to bring him under religious instruction. Time was necessary for this, but it was something that George should spend his Sundays at home and not at the grogshop. In a very few months another step was taken, and George appeared at church and was converted to God.

George Annett forthwith commenced mission labors among the class from which he had been rescued, and it was at his solicitation that a temperance society was established at Windsor with Canon Ellison as president.

A SUICIDE AVERTED.

Canon Ellison relates that during his residence at Windsor a young man holding a responsible position in the city was discharged, after repeated warnings, as an incorrigible drunkard. Annett heard of it and went to his house the same night. He found the man sitting there the picture of misery. His wife and children had found some temporary shelter, for every article of furniture had been melted down into rum, and the man, having lost his situation, was preparing to commit suicide. Annett was the messenger of God to defeat his purpose. He talked with him and prayed with him, and finally brought him to Canon Ellison to sign the pledge. "Annett had the happiness," says Canon Ellison, "of seeing him before his death not merely re-established in his former position, but, within two or three years promoted to good conduct to a position of much greater responsibility and honor."

Canon Ellison is a very effective speaker, he has labored assiduously in the personal work of reclaiming drunkards, and when he rises to address a meeting it is patent to every one present that they are under the influence of a man who knows of what he is speaking, and who has faith in God that the power of Jesus is strong enough to deliver the victim of liquor from his thralldom.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE FETE.

THE Crystal Palace, London, a picture of which appears on the first page, is an enormous building composed wholly of glass and iron, and is used for monster fêtes, concerts, flower shows, etc. It was erected in 1854 on its present site at Sydenham, about seven miles from London proper, at a cost of $7,500,000. It is surrounded with gardens a pleasure grounds tastefully laid out, which cover about two hundred acres.

At the temperance fête held there on July 4th it is estimated that about 35,000 persons participated in the holiday. Visitors came from all parts of the country, many of them wore the now popular blue ensign of total abstinence on their coat or dress, and as the society is said to have nearly four millions of pledged adherents, it can be imagined that the attendance was only representative of the supporters of the cause.

There was a large number of Bands of Hope from all quarters of London and various places in the provinces. They were accompanied by band banners, flags, and adorned with medals and temperance regalia. The executive of the Church of England Temperance Society had evidently determined to spare no pains to make the Fourth of July a memorable day in the annals of the society and the believers in the Declaration of Independence from Drunkenness were invited "to hear the firing of the temperance canons and the other speakers who would deliver Fourth of July orations," in which the cause of temperance should be reviewed and its prospects proclaimed.

THE MASS MEETING.

In accordance, therefore, with this portion of the programme, a mass meeting was held, in the course of the day, in the concert hall, under the presidency of the Rev. Canon Ellison, and he was supported by many eminent clergymen and laymen.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings said: "The movement in favor of total abstinence is one that goes hand-in-hand with the teaching of the Gospel. I therefore should feel ashamed, as minister of the Church of Christ, if I did not recognize and endeavor by all means in my power to foster it."

Canon Fleming, who was the next speaker, and who received an ovation, said in reference to the early history of the temperance cause, that "our pioneers had to suffer persecution, and even the Christian Church stood aloof from them. At the esent time, however, Christians are being ousured to a sense of their duty and of the impor- of this mission ; hence the blessing of God is sting upon the multiplied efforts which are being ade."

CANON WILBERFORCE.

Canon Wilberforce followed, and in eloquent rmons declared that he must utter a strong protest ainst the refreshment bars being open for the le of intoxicating drink in the building on that y. He said, "It is the first time, and I hope it ill be the last, when a temperance meeting shall e literally held within the walls of a public-house. ere are gathered together in this building people ho have been rescued from this damning vice of eperance, and whom we are telling to keep out e temptation ; indeed, we have been in the habit e hearing that the devil tempts every man, but hen a teetotalter goes into a public-house he mpts the devil.

"I see on all sides of me bits of blue ribbon, stifying that the wearers have signed the pledge e name of the loving Jesus, and though I am t going to rob temperance reformers in the past e credit of their labors, I must say there never s been a time when the movement had been so knowledged of Almighty God as during the past w years, when this wave of blue has been eading all over the land. Away with our sec- rian exclusiveness ; away with our miserable elesiastical narrow-mindedness ; and away with e spirit, the very opposite to that of our Master, hich when it sees another man saving a soul in e unaccustomed way, says 'Drop that soul ; ave it alone !'

"Blessed be the name of the Lord, where this ovement has been spreading, this one thing has en doing—it has been gathering together in one eblendid embrace, men who name the name of e hrist, who hitherto have been standing aloof from ch other, and it may be coldly and suspiciously earding each other. Now they are offering an e divided front to the enemy, and where there was e oldness and division before there is Christian love e d Christian union now.

"Now I have got something very disagreeable ay. It is simply this, that I believe this great urch of England, to which I belong and which ove, has rested upon her shoulders a tremendous eponsibility with regard to intemperance. I ve here an extract, which I am going to ask the eporters to print, and which says that the Church e England, to which I presume you all belong, e d which we all love, is

THE LARGEST OWNER OF SALOON PROPERTY any corporation or large association in the whole e England at this moment. It is said that on ds of the Bishop of London there is one public ouse, called 'The Hero of Waterloo,' from which e returns are $50,000 a year. Where does this me from but the hard-earned wages of the work- e classes, whom we are seeking to keep out of e mptation?" Canon Wilberforce went on to show ow the hands of the temperance advocates are eed while such things exist, and to advocate that e properly belonging to the Church of England ould in future be leased for the purpose of per- efitting the sale of liquor. In conclusion, he said, e We must work while it is day, for the night ometh when no man can work ; and we must be engle-minded and have clean hands, then God will e less our work."

ADDRESS BY MR. R. T. BOOTH.

Mr. R. T. Booth, who has done so much for urtherance of Gospel temperance principles in e England, was the next speaker. With character- eistic enthusiasm he referred to the development and eproaching triumph of the movement, and said : e When I came to this country I was told that eands of music, singing and shouting would not educe the people of Great Britain to sign the eledge. To a certain extent this is true, but then, e the people are going to be converted by logic and e argument and scientific proof, we had sufficient e years ago. But 'It is not by might nor by e power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord.' As of e old, the evil spirit of drunkenness is cast out in the e name of Jesus of Nazareth. A grander and nobler epression of Christian manhood and womanhood has never been known in the world than in connec- e tion with the Gospel Temperance movement.

WONDERFUL STATISTICS.

"When I landed in London I was told that the e Blue Ribbon had already found lodgment in the e land. There were some 15,000 who were wearing e it ; to-day, as I stand upon this platform, in those e towns and districts where I have visited, there are e more than 900,000 wearing the Blue Ribbon. Since the fifteenth day of last September I have e conducted eleven missions in all, and in the places e where such missions have been held, there have e been 240,000 new singers of the pledge. In New- e castle-upon-Tyne alone 36,000 names have been e placed on the roll of honor, and there are now e thirty-six fewer licensed houses, otherwise man- e traps, than there were a few months ago.

AN INTERESTING INCIDENT.

"Now, the question is asked, in view of all these e results, Do the men stand? One of the most in- e teresting incidents that ever happened to me was e when I was in Southampton. I was leaving a e meeting with Canon Wilberforce, about ten o'clock e at night, and as we were going down a little alley e a man ran up to Canon Wilberforce, and clutching e him by the arm, said, 'Mr. Wilberforce I could e na: let you go home to-night until I had spoken to e you.' He said, 'Why not, my man?' 'Well,' e the man answered, 'It is just four years ago since e I heard you speak on temperance and I signed e the pledge. To-night is the anniversary, and I e wanted to tell you I had been true to it.' I know e that in Leicester the converts have been visited from e three to five times since last October, and ninety- e seven out of every hundred have been true to their e pledge. In Swansea, where there have been e 26,000 new signers, 99 per cent have kept the e pledge inviolate. They are, for the most part, not e trusting in their own power, but in the strength e given them by God.

"We find, too, that moderate drinkers all over e the country are giving up their little drops for e Jesus' sake. This self-denial is helpful to those e who have been rescued from a life of drunkenness, e but who are still beset with temptations, and the e effect of this magnificent meeting ought to deter- e mine every one present not to rest content till a e law is inscribed on the Statute-book that should e give Englishmen the right to say that the rumshop e shall not be set over against their dwellings. I e maintain that the public prints do not adequately e represent the extent of this movement, and, as an e instance of its far-reaching character, I would e mention that in Birmingham 50,000 signed the e pledge in twenty-four days.

BRING THE MEN UP TO THE COLORS !

"In the history of England I have read of a e regiment ordered to storm a fort. When they had e almost reached the breastworks a shower of leaden e hail stopped them, but he who carried the Union e Jack leaped the trenches, and planted the flag up- e on the enemy's ground. The colonel, fearing for e the safety of his soldiers, shouted, 'Sergeant, bring e the colors back to the men !' but the sergeant, turn- e ing his face begrimed with powder, shouted, e 'Never ! bring the men up to the colors.' Let it e be the same with reference to the proposed law of e local option, or entire prohibition ; let it be put on e the Statute-book and signed by the Queen ; it has e already been sanctioned by the King of Heaven. e Then let the people come up to it."

The programme of the day possessed special e attractions for the occasion. For the purpose of e exemplifying endurance without alcohol, Edward e Payson Weston, the well-known pedestrian, who e is a teetotalter, arranged to walk fifty miles in ten e hours without a rest. He covered the distance e within an hour of the appointed time, and, to use e the words of a spectator, "seemed none the e worse after it all." Nine or ten gentlemen ama- e teurs, members of the society, including the Rev. e J. W. Horsley, walked one hour each with West- e on. There was a grand concert on the Handel e orchestra by a choir of 4000 voices, under the e direction of Mr. G. Chapple. A lecture was given e by the Rev. J. W. Horsley on "Prisoners and e Prison Life." The Palace Company's military e band played at intervals during the day, and music e was also provided by several really efficient bands that came with the temperance contingents, in- e cluding that of the Royal Hospital School, Green e wich.

It is interesting to learn from these accounts and e statistics that the temperance cause is making e rapid progress in a land where drunkenness has e been the national vice. It is also gratifying to e notice that the speakers and workers who have e most prominently contributed to the success of the e movement there, have to a very considerable extent e crossed the Atlantic from this country. That e American speakers and workers have been the e most energetic and successful in the temperance e cause in England, is a fact generally admitted even e by Englishmen, and that too without jealousy.

M. Reveillaud's Remarkable Conversion was described at a recent religious meeting in London. e M. Réveillaud is much esteemed in this country, e but the narrative of his conversion has not been e generally known here, notwithstanding its wonder- e ful and interesting circumstances. Mr. Donald e Matheson, who presided at the meeting, said that e five years ago the distinguished French evangelist e was a Freethinker and was living in immorality, e but from the fact of his intense hatred to the e priests he was led to attend a Protestant church e after the baptism of his child. On a certain Sun- e day in July, 1878, the minister happened to be e preaching on the death of Stephen, and spoke of e his witnessing to the power of the Holy Spirit. e The minister begged that all who felt that power e would bear witness to it, and M. Réveillaud at e once walked to the spot where he was standing, e and begged that he might be allowed to do e so. Of course he was allowed to speak, and e he then told an extraordinary story. He said e that in agony of soul he had cried, "If there be a e God, save me from my sins !" One night he had e a remarkable dream, and he thought that he was e conversing with one who said, You have no relig- e ion. His reply was to repeat the Creed, and he e went on repeating it until he came to the sen- e tence, "He shall come to judge the quick and the e dead," and then he felt as if everything were e tumbling down beneath him. But in his dream e he had said, "I believe in the Holy Ghost," and he e awoke in a sort of ecstasy. He felt his pulse to e know if he were really awake or asleep, and he e then told his wife what had happened. She could e hardly believe it. He then awoke his servants and e read to them out of the Bible. He received the e baptism of the Holy Ghost, and was a new creat- e ure, and as he told his story that Sunday all felt e this, and they prayed that they too might have e the baptism of the Holy Ghost. From that time he e became a preacher of the Gospel, and has been e the means of great blessing to the church in Paris e and elsewhere.

Mr Moody has Issued a Letter of Suggest-

e tions to the Christians in all the places he expects e to visit. In the course of this letter he says : e "What you and I both need—what we all need—is e more power, the power of the Holy Ghost for e service and testimony ; and the help of this Divine e Person we are sure to obtain in answer to believing e prayer. Let me entreat you then to be much in e prayer, united prayer as well as individual prayer ; e for it is when we manifest love one to another that e all men know that we are His disciples. Let e minor differences be laid aside in view of the great e end we are seeking to secure ; and let us with one e mind besiege the Throne of Grace. I have found e that a United Daily Prayer-meeting at noon is in- e valuable as a centre and rendezvous for Christian e workers. And as prayer and work must go to- e gether, I would suggest the opening of your e churches and chapels for evangelistic meetings. e I am thankful to know that in many places such e services are being held. But with such masses all e around still away from God, there is much need e of largely extended effort. It will also tend to help e forward the work when it shall please God to send e me among you. Efforts should be made, some- e what systematically, by a staff of earnest minded e persons, to invite non-church-goers to attend the e evangelistic services, by calling at their houses and e speaking a kindly word when leaving notices of e the meetings.

THE WELL AT THE GATE.

"Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"—2 Samuel 23 : 15.

WAR, always distressing, is especially ruinous in harvest time. When the crops are all ready for the sickle, to have them trodden down by cavalry horses and heavy supply trains gulling the fields, is enough to make any man's heart sick. When war broke out between France and Germany I rode across their golden harvest fields and saw the tents pitched and the trenches dug in the very midst of the ripe fields—the long scythe of battle sharpening to mow down harvests of winrows of the dead. It was at this season of the harvest that the army of the Philistines came down upon Bethlehem.

HARK TO THE CLAMOR

of their voices, the neighing of their chargers, the blare of their trumpets and the clash of their shields. Let David and his men fall back!

The Lord's host sometimes loses the day. But David knew where to hide. He had been brought up in that country. Boys are inquisitive, and they know all about the region where they are born and brought up. If you should go back to the old homestead, you could, with your eyes shut, find your way to the meadows or orchard or hill back of the house, with which you were familiar thirty or forty years ago. So David knew the cave of Adullam. Perhaps in his boyhood days he had played "hide and seek" with his comrades all about the old cave; and, although others might not have known it, David did.

Travellers say there is only one way of getting into that cave, and that by a narrow path; but David was stout and steady-headed and steady-nerved; and so, with his three brave staff officers, he goes along that path, finds his way into the cave, sits down, looks around at the roof and the dark passages of the mountains, feels very weary with the forced march, and water he must have or die. I doubt not there may have been drops trickling down the side of the cavern, or that there may have been some water in the goat-skin slung to his girdle; but that was not what he wanted. He wanted a deep, full, cold drink—such as a man gets only out of an old well with moss-covered bucket. David remembered that very near that cave of Adullam there was such a well as that—a well where he used to go in boyhood—the well of Bethlehem; and he almost imagines that he can hear the liquid plashing of that well, and his parched tongue moves through his hot lips as he says: "Oh that some one would give me drink from the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"

It was no sooner said than done. The three brave staff officers bound to their feet and start. Brave soldiers will taken even a hint from their commander. But between them and the well lay the hosts of the Philistines, and what could three men do with a great army? But where there is a will there is a way; and with their swords slashing this way and that, they make their path to the well. While the Philistines are amazed at the seeming foolhardiness of these three men, and can not make up their minds exactly what it means, the three men have come to the well. They dropped the bucket. They brought up the water. They poured it in the pail and started for the cave. "Stop them!" cried the Philistines; "clip them with your swords! Stab them with your spears! Stop these three men!" Too late. They have got around the hill. The hot rocks are splashed with the overflowing of the water as it is carried up the cliffs. The three men go along the dangerous paths, and with cheeks flushed with the excitement and all out of breath in the haste, fling their swords red with the skirmish to the side of the cave and cry out to David: "There, captain of the host, is what you wanted—a drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"

A text is of no use to me unless I can find Christ in it; and unless I can bring a Gospel out of these words I shall wish I had never seen them. I have heard it said that carrier-pigeons have sometimes letters tied under their wings, and that they fly hundreds of miles—a hundred miles in an hour—carrying a message. So I have thought I would like to have it with the Gospel. O heavenly Dove, bring under thy wing to my soul some message of light and love and peace!

It is not an unusual thing to see people gather around a well in summer time. The husbandman puts down his cradle at the well. The builder puts down his trowel. The traveller puts down his pack. Then one draws the water for all the rest, himself taking the very last. The cup is passing around and the fires of thirst are put out, and the traveller starts on his journey and the workman takes up his burden. Thus we come around

THE GOSPEL WELL.

We put down our pack of burdens and our implements of toil; one man must draw the water for those who have gathered around the well. I will try to draw the water; and if, after I have poured out from this living fountain, I just taste of it myself, no one will begrudge me a "drink from the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

I. This Gospel will be like the one spoken of in the text:

A WELL OF BETHLEHEM.

David had known hundreds of wells of water, but he wanted to drink from that particular one; and he thought nothing could slake his thirst like that; and unless our souls can get access to the fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness we must die. That fountain is the well of Bethlehem. It was dug in the night. It was dug by the light of a lantern—the star that hung down over the manger. It was dug—not at the gate of Cæsar's palaces—not in the park of a Jerusalem bargain-maker. It was dug in a barn. The camels lifted their weary heads to listen as the work went on; the shepherds, unable to sleep because the heavens were filled with bands of music, came down to see the opening of the well. The angels of God at the first gush of the living water, dipped their chalices of joy into it and drank to the health of earth and heaven as they cried: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace." Sometimes, in our modern times the water is brought through the pipes of the city to the very nostrils of the horses or cattle; but this well in the Bethlehem barn was not so much for the beasts that perish as for our race—thirst-sinited, desert-travelled simoom-struck. O my soul, weary with sin, stoop down and drink out of that Bethlehem well!

David said: "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so my soul panteth after Thee, O God!" One would get a better understanding of this if he were amid the Adirondacks in summer time. Here comes a swift-footed deer. The hounds are clear on the track; it has leaped chasms and scaled cliffs; it is fagged out, its eyes are rolling in death; its tongue lolling from its foaming mouth. Faster the deer, faster the dogs, until it plunges into Schroon Lake, and the hounds can follow it no further, and it puts down its head and mouth, until the nostril is clean submerged in the cool wave, and I understand it: "As the hart panteth for the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God."

Oh! bring me water from that well. Little child, who hast learned of Jesus in the Sabbath-school, bring me some of that living water. Old man, who fifty years ago didst first find the well, bring me some of that water. Stranger in a strange land, who used to hear sung amid the Highlands of Scotland, to the tune of "Bonnie Don," "The Star, the Star of Bethlehem," bring me some of that water. "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall never thirst." "Oh that some one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

II. Again: This Gospel well, like the one spoken of in the text, is

A CAPTURED WELL.

David remembered the time when that good water of Bethlehem was in the possession of his ancestors; his father drank there, his mother drew there. He remembered how that water tasted when he was a boy, and came up from play. "I never forget the old well we used to drink from when we were boys or girls. There was something in it which blessed the lips and refreshed the brows better than anything we have found since. As we think of that old well the memories of the past flow into each other like crystalline drops, sun-glinted; and, all the more, we remember the hand that used to lay hold of the rope, and the hearts that beat against the well-curb, are still now. We never get over these reminiscences."

George P. Morris, the great song writer of this country, once said to me that his song "Woodman, Spare that Tree," was sung in a great concert hall, and the memories of early life were wrought upon the audience by that song. "Woodman, Spare that Tree," that, after the song was done, an aged man arose in the audience, overwhelmed with emotion, and said: "Sir, will you please to tell me whether the woodman spared the tree?" We never forget the tree under which we played. We never forget the fountain at which we drank. Alas, for the man who has no early memories.

David thought of that well—

THAT BOYHOOD WELL—

and he wanted a drink of it; but he remembered that the Philistines had captured it. When the three men tried to come up to the well in behalf of David, they saw swords gleaming around about. And this is true of this Gospel well. The Philistines have at times captured it. When we come to take a full, old-fashioned drink of pardon and comfort, don't their swords of indignation and sarcasm flash? Why, the sceptics tell us we cannot come to that fountain. They say the water is not fit to drink anyhow. "If you are really thirsty now, there is the well of philosophy; there is the well of art; there is the well of science." They try to substitute instead of your boyhood faith, an ideal religion. They say a great many beautiful things about the soul, and they try to feed our mortal hunger on rose leaves, and mix a mint julep of worldly stimulants, when nothing will satisfy but "a drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is at the gate."

They try to starve us on husks when the Father's banquet is ready; and the best ring taken from the casket, and the sweetest harp struck for the music, and the swiftest foot is already lifted for the dance. They patronize heaven and abolish hell; and try to measure eternity with the hour-glasses, and the throne of the great God with their yard-sticks. I abhor it.

I tell you the old Gospel well is a captured well. I pray God that there may be somewhere in the elect host, three anointed men, with courage enough to go forth in the strength of the omnipotent God, with the glittering swords of truth to be the way back again to that old well. I think the tide is turning and that the old Gospel is to take its place again in the family, and in the university and in the legislative hall. Men have tried world philosophies and have found out that they do not give any comfort, and that they drop an arched midnight upon the death pillow. They fail who there is a dead chief in the house; and, when the soul comes to leap into the fathomless ocean of eternity, they give to the man not so much as a broken spar to cling to.

Depend upon it that well will come into our possession again, though it has been captured. There be not three anointed men in the Lord's host with enough consecration to do the work, then the swords will leap from Jehovah's bucklers and the eternal three will descend—God the Father, God son, and God the Holy Ghost—conquering for lying race the way back again to "the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate." And be for us, who can be against us? It God did not His own Son, but freely gave Him up for all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things? For I am persuaded that neither height, nor depth, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall take from us into final captivity the well of the Lord Jesus Christ.

I. Again, the Gospel well, like the one spoken of in my text is

A WELL AT THE GATE.

The traveller stops the camel to-day, and gets on and dips out of the valley of the east some beautiful, clear, bright water, and that is out the very well that David longed for. Do you say that that well was at the gate, so that nobody could go into Bethlehem without going right past it. And so it is with this Gospel well—it is at the gate. It is, in the first place, at the gate of purification. We cannot wash away our sins unless at that water. I take the responsibility of saying that there is hardly any man, woman or child who has escaped sinful defilement. Is it outrageous and ungallant for me to make such a charge? I have all committed a sin worse than murder. I have by our sin, crucified the Lord, and that decide! And if there be any who dare to plead "not guilty" to the indictment, then the hosts of heaven will be empanelled as a jury to render a unanimous verdict against us: guilty one—guilty one.

With what a slashing stroke that one passage sweeps us away from all our pretensions: "There is no one that doeth good, no not one."

"Oh," says some one, "all we want—all the world wants—is development." Now I want to say that the race develops without the Gospel into a hell, a Five Points, a great Salt Lake City. It develops downward and never upward, except as the grace of God lays hold of it. What is to become of your soul without Christ? Punishment—disaster. But I bless my Lord Jesus Christ that there is a well at the gate of purification. For great sin, great pardon. For eighty years of transgression an eternity of forgiveness. For crime deep as hell, an atonement high as heaven. That where sin abounded, so grace may reach more abundantly. That as sin reigned unto death even so may grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. Angel of the covenant, dip thy wing into this living fountain and wave it over us that our souls may wash in "the water of the well of Bethlehem which is by the gate."

Further, I remark that this well of the Gospel is at the gate of comfort.

Do you know where David was when he uttered the words of the text? He was in the cave of Adullam. That is where some people are now, as the world always goes smoothly with you? as it never pursued you with slander? Is your health always good? Have your fortunes never diminished? Are your children all alive and well? Is there one dead lamb in the fold? Are you ignorant of the way to the cemetery? Have you ever heard the bell toll when it seemed as if every stroke of the iron clapper beat your heart? Are the skies as bright when you look into them as they used to be when other eyes, now closed, used to look into them? Is there some trunk or drawer in your house that you go to only on anniversary days, when there comes beating against your soul the surf of a great ocean of agony? It is the cave of Adullam—the cave of Adullam!

Is there some David whose fatherly heart toward Absalom has broken? Is there some Abraham who is lonely because Sarah is dead in the family plot of Macpelah. After thirty or forty years of companionship how hard it was for them to part. Why not have two seats in the Lord's parlor so that both the old folks might have gone up at once? My aged mother in her last moment said to my father: "Father, wouldn't it be nice if we could both go together? No, no, no; we must part." And there are wounded hearts now. Some have had trouble. The world cannot give comfort. What can it bring? Nothing—nothing.

The salve they try to put on your wounds will not stick. They cannot with their bungling surgery mend the broken bones. Zophar the Naamathite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Eliphaz the Temanite come in and talk and talk and talk; but miserable comforters are they all. They cannot pour light into the cave of Adullam. They cannot bring a single draught of water from "the well of Bethlehem which is by the gate." But, glory be to Jesus Christ, there is comfort at the gate. There is life in the well at the gate. I will draw up a promise for every man, woman and child. I will lay hold of the rope of the old well.

WHAT IS YOUR TROUBLE?

"Oh," you say, "I am so sick, so weary of life—ailments after ailments." I will draw up a promise: "The inhabitant shall never say, I am sick." What is your trouble? "Oh, it is less of friends—bereavement," you say. I will draw up a promise fresh and cool out of the well. "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me though he were dead, yet shall he live." What is your trouble? You say it is the infirmities of old age. I will draw you up a promise: "Down to old age I am with thee, to hoar hairs will I carry thee." What is your trouble? "Oh," you say, "I have a widowed soul and my children cry for bread." I bring up this promise: "Leave thy fatherless children—I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in Me." "Oh," says some one, "you have missed my case, that is not my trouble." I will not miss it. I bring up now a promise for every Christian soul: "All things work together for good to those who love God," I break through the armed ranks of your sorrows and bring to your parched lips a drink of "the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

Again: this Gospel well is at

THE GATE OF HEAVEN.

I have not yet heard one single intelligent account of the future world from anybody who does not believe in the Bible. They throw such a fog about the subject that I do not want to go to the sceptic's heaven, to the transcendentalist's heaven, to the worldly philosopher's heaven. I would not exchange the poorest room in your house for the finest heaven that Huxley or Stuart Mill or Darwin ever dreamed of. Their heaven has no Christ in it. Heaven without Christ, though you could sweep the whole universe into it, would be a hell! Oh, they tell us, there are no songs there, there are no coronations in heaven, that is all imagination. I turn to my Bible, and I find John's picture of that good land—that heaven which was your lullaby in infancy—that heaven which our children in the Sabbath-school sing about—that heaven that has a well at the gate.

After you have been on a long journey and you come in all bedusted and tired to your house, the first thing you want is refreshing ablution; and I am glad to know that after we get through the pilgrimage of this world—the hard, dusty pilgrimage—we will find a well at the gate. In that one wash away will go our sins and sorrows. I do not care whether cherub or seraph, or my own departed friends in that blessed land place to my lips the cup of life, the touch of that cup will be life, will be heaven. I was reading of how the ancients sought for the fountain of perpetual youth. They thought that if they could find and drink out of that well, the old would become young again, the sick well, and everybody would have eternal juvenescence. Of course they could not find it.

EUREKA!

I have found it—"the water of the well of Bethlehem which is by the gate." I think we had better make a bargain with those who leave us—going out of this world from time to time—as to where we will meet them. Travellers parting appoint a place of meeting. They say: "We will meet at Rome or we will meet at Stockholm or Vienna or Jerusalem or Bethlehem." Now, when we come to stand by the death pillow of those who are leaving us for the far land, do not let us weep as though we would never see them again, but let us there standing appoint a place where we will meet. Where shall it be? Shall it be on the banks of the river? No, the banks are too long. Shall it be in the temple? No, there is such a host there—ten thousand times ten thousand. Where shall we meet our loved ones? Let us make an appointment to meet at the well by the gate. Oh, Heaven! sweet Heaven! Dear Heaven! Heaven where our good friends are. Heaven where Jesus is. Heaven! Heaven!

But while I consider there comes a revulsion of feeling when I know there are notwithstanding the well at the gate. Between them and the well of Heaven there is a great army of sin; and though Christ is ready to cleave a way to that well for them, they will not have His love and intercession. But I am glad to know that you may come yet. The well is here—the well of Heaven. Come, I do not care how feeble you are. Let me take hold of your arm and steady you up to the well curb. "He, every one that thirsteth, come." I would rather win one soul to Christ than wear the crown of the world's dominion. Do not let any man say I did not invite him. Oh, if you could only just look at my Lord once, if you could just see Him full in the face, if you could only just come up behind Him and touch His feet—methinks you would live.

In northern New Jersey some winters ago three little children wandered off from home in a snow-storm. Night came on. Father and mother said: "Where are the children?" They could not be found. They started out in haste, and the news ran to the neighbors, and before morning it was said that there were hundreds of men hunting the mountains for these three children, but found them not. After a while a man imagined there was a place that had not been looked at and he went and saw the three children. He examined their bodies. He found that the elder boy had taken off his coat and wrapped it around the other one, the baby, and then taken off his vest and put it around the younger one. And then they all died, he probably the first, for he had no coat or vest. Oh, it was a touching scene when that was brought to light. I was afterward on the ground and it brought the whole scene to my mind; and I thought myself of a more melting scene than that—it is that Jesus, our elder brother, took off the robe of His royalty, and laid aside the last garment of earthly comfort, that He might wrap our poor souls from the blast. Some ministers say the worst can be saved, because Richard Baxter was saved and John Newton was saved, and any man can be saved. I do not want to put it in that way. You can be saved. I am certain of it; because I have been saved. Oh, the height and the depth, and the length and the breadth of the love of God!

A Sleepy Worshipper in a Scottish Church was locked in a few weeks ago. A gentleman who was passing a church in Selkirk, about nine o'clock on the evening of June 4th, had his attention attracted by a sound proceeding from the building. Getting over the wall surrounding the church grounds, he saw a man standing inside one of the windows of the ground floor of the building. He naturally inquired, "What'er 'e daein' there?" to which came the response from inside, "Man, I'm lockit in." "Lockit in!" exclaimed the interrogator; "hoo did 'e get lockit i' the kirk?" "I'll tell 'e that efter," was the reply; followed by the request, "Wull 'e gang for the keys, an' let me oot?" The door being opened, how the man came to be "lockit i' the kirk" was soon explained. He had been one of the congregation at the evening service, had fallen asleep, and on awaking had found himself the sole occupant of the church. He began to look for a way of escape, but there was none. He at length found his way down the stair leading to the vestry; this room being near the thoroughfare he was able to attract the attention of passers-by and so was released. He resolutely expressed his determination "no' tae fa' asleep i' the kirk again." If he keep his promise he may hear something which by the blessing of God may save him from a worse fate than being locked up in a church. It is to be feared that the lack of interest in divine things of which sleeping in church is a sign may lead to some people being locked out of the House of God.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Nearly Over the Brink.—A Man of much Intelligence, speaking at the Circus Temperance Meeting, said: "For twelve years I was a total abstainer; but I gave way, broke my pledge, and I was gliding very quietly, almost unconsciously, down the river toward a drunkard's grave, and what I have no doubt would have been a drunkard's hell, when, on the night before the last Glasgow Fast, the 6th of April, God arrested me, and since then not a single drop of intoxicating liquor has passed my lips, and, God helping me, never shall."

Betty's Flitting.—Mr. R. Hill, Speaking of the peace and calm enjoyed by a Christian at death, said: "There was an old woman dying at Jedburgh. She had been the talk of the district because of her piety. Her minister, Dr. Young, went in to see her one day, and said, 'How are you to-day, Betty?' She said, 'I am really well enough, but I am just put about a bit in the flitting.' She was flitting from earth to heaven, and was disturbed a little. How blessed when we contemplate the change with such unconcern."

How Tom was Struck Dumb.—A Young Man said: "I rise to thank God I came to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, on the 16th day of April. I saw a Christian friend on that day and he put this question to me, 'Tom, in the event of your dying to-night, where would you spend eternity?' Well, I did not know what to think, nor what to say; I was struck dumb. When we parted he said, 'Remember what I say to you and pray for the pardon of your sins through Christ.' I did pray and the Lord Jesus Christ revealed Himself to me as my Saviour."

A Wife's Dying Charge.—Mr. Sawyer, at the same meeting, referring to the loss of his wife, said: "I have missed her more in the last few days than perhaps in all the rest of the time. One of the last things she said was this: 'Charles, I shall not be with you any longer; I am going into a better country. But I want to say to you, my dear, don't try to be successful, but try and be faithful. Be thou faithful unto death and God will give thee the crown of life.'"

Intending Disturbers.—On June 17, at a Gospel Temperance meeting held in the Circus, a young man rose and said: "Three years past last April I went into the tent without knowing exactly what I was going to do, but there was a companion with me who was much the worse for drink, as I was, and we intended to interrupt the speakers. We sat down, and he said, 'Let's make a row now, John.' I said, 'No; sit down a bit.' I heard a man speaking, and he said, 'The Spirit and the Bride say Come, and let him that heareth say Come, and let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' That word reached my heart and broke it. The Holy Spirit not only took from me my love of intoxicating drink, but gave salvation to my soul through faith in Christ. He that believeth shall be saved, and He saved me as soon as I believed that promise."

A Unitarian Wreck.—A Young Man said: "I thank God that I am now a Christian. My brother died when he was twenty-one years of age. He was a Christian, and I was at his bedside. I then thought religion was a very good thing to die with but that you could not get along with it in this life. A friend was present—a man about forty years of age, who was a Unitarian. My brother said to him, 'George, ought I to throw Christ overboard now I have to cross the dark waters of Jordan.' He said, 'No, David, stick to your faith,' and tears rolled down his cheeks. In another year this Unitarian came to die, and I was at his death-bed. He said to me, 'Peter make sure of Christ. My life has been a wreck. Had I to commence life again, I would accept Christ in the hey-day of youth.' He also told me to inform some infidel friends in Glasgow that Christ's sufferings were foretold in Isaiah, in the 53d chapter more particularly. As for myself, I was converted on Friday the 9th of May. My great difficulty was to believe on Christ. I was looking for feelings and expecting to be agitated, but light broke in upon me in this way: I was shown that Christ had suffered in our stead, and that He had completed the work of redemption, and something seemed to say, 'Can you not be satisfied?' I thank God I am now fully satisfied."

Gift of a Suit of Clothes.—Mr. Thornton said: "A man met an old friend who had gone down in circumstances. He was all in rags. He had been a drunkard. His friends said to him, 'I am very sorry to see you all in rags; come home with me, and I will give you a suit of clothes.' The man went home with him, and his friend gave him his second-best suit of clothes and told him to put them on. He did so, and when he returned into the room and stood before his benevolent friend, he said to the gentleman who had given him the clothes, 'What do you think of me now?' 'Oh,' was the reply, 'you are very respectable now.' 'No,' said the poor man, 'it is not me that is respectable, it is your clothes.' Now, when the Lord Jesus Christ meets us in our rags, the rags of our own righteousness, He strips us of them, and He gives in return—not a second-best suit of clothes, but the best robe, the robe of His righteousness; and when we are clothed with that, and ask God what He thinks of us, He will say, 'Thou art all fair, my love, there is no spot in thee.'"

A Lesson from a Stocking.—Mr. Scroggie said in the Circus on June 18th: "A dear old Scotch-woman had got it into her head that she must get salvation by her work. She was often spoken to on that subject, and a Christian friend pointed out that salvation was a gift—the gift of God is eternal life—and that she could not gain it by working, as, if she could, it would cease to be a gift. But the old lady was not to be moved from her interpretation of her favorite text, 'Work out your own salvation.' One day, when this friend called; he found the old lady knitting a stocking. He asked, 'Mrs. So-and-So, what is that you are doing?' She answered, 'I am knitting a stocking.' 'Let me see it—I should like to see it.' He got possession of the stocking, and going over to the other side of the hearth he sat down. He said, 'Now work out your stocking.' She said, 'I canna.' He said, 'Oh, yes; work it out—work it out.' She replied, 'Give me the stocking, then. I canna work it out unless you give it up.' 'But,' he said, 'you are trying to work out salvation before you get it, and you cannot even work out the stocking unless you have it.' That simple incident was the means of bringing light to her soul, and leading her to trust wholly in Christ."

A Safe Ship to Sail in.—Another Speaker said: "I have been seven times across the Atlantic, and once to the Cape of Good Hope and back, but I am still a little timid at going down to the sea in ships. So having once to go to America, I went to Mr. Allan's office and said, 'Have you any steamers going to Montreal in a week or two?' 'Yes,' he said, 'the Circassian.' 'All right,' I said, 'I will let you know in a little while.' I went outside, and had a talk to some of the sailors on the Broomielaw. I said, 'Do you know anything about this vessel, the Circassian?' I found it was a new vessel that had lately taken a trial trip, with some new-fangled apparatus about the boiler, and although it was said to be all right, I made up my mind that I would not take my passage by the vessel. Four years afterward I went to Mr. Allan's office at Montreal and asked, 'Have you any vessel going to Liverpool?' They told me, 'We have the Circassian.' I said, 'Is that the Circassian which has been sailing for four or five years past?' 'Yes.' 'Then put down my name.' I could trust it now. It had been well tried. So this way to heaven has been well tried; Christ secures eternal safety; thousands have travelled over the pathway of salvation He has opened, and we can trust it too."

A Hopeless Inebriate.—Mr. Sawyer said: "A man came into our meeting about two years ago, and told this story. He said: 'Two years ago I had lost all hope. My wife would not live with me, and my little children seemed to hate the sight of me. I made up my mind the sooner I died the better. One Saturday night I walked along Fulton Avenue, Brooklyn, trying to beg a few pennies for bread. At last I went into a corner shop and told the man I was very hungry. I said I did not deserve his kindness, but would he give me something to eat. He did give me something, and then he said, Go and hear our friend Sawyer in the Cooper meeting. I went round to the meeting and heard a number of testimonies which I thought were all for me, it seemed as if every word came straight from the throne of God for poor John White.' Some one came and spoke to him and prayed with him. He said, 'I made up my mind—if I go to the poor house I will go rejoicing; if I go to the station house, I will go rejoicing; good health or bad, sink or swim, live or die, I will have my poor soul saved.' The next Monday I went to see the friend in Fulton Avenue who had behaved so kindly to him, and said, 'I just did what you told me. I went to the meeting; but did more, I gave my heart to the Lord, and now am perfectly happy. I haven't any money, nor don't know where I am going to get it, but I tell you I have got righteousness, and joy, and peace in the Holy Ghost.' The tradesman said, 'I will give you employment, I like your straightforward way.' He has now been nearly three years in the man's service, and every month he sends a letter enclosing a dollar, and says, 'Give that to some poor man like I was.' And after such cases as these you tell me the Gospel doesn't pay!"

THE NIGHT FAR SPENT.

The Great Kingdom of Prophecy—Sleeping Christians—A Contrast but No Contradiction—The Most Marked Characteristics of the Night—The Night of Nature's Darkness—II. Of Satan's Dominion—III. Of Death's Desolation—"The Day at Hand"—What Day?—I. The Day of Creation's Deliverance—II. Of Resurrection Life—III. Of Christ's Personal Presence—Necessary Exhortation.

"KNOWING the time, that now it is high time for you to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."—Rom. 13: 11-12.

If the Christian Church were in truth—as many Christian people erroneously suppose—the great kingdom of prophecy—that "Kingdom of the Heavens" for the establishment of which on this earth we are taught continually to pray, the language of St. Paul in the above passage of Scripture would not only be emptied of its grand and glorious meaning, but we should be utterly at a loss how to interpret it. For clearly it is to his Christian brethren—i.e., to members of the Church whose truest definition is "the congregation of a faithful people," that the Apostle is here speaking. "It is high time for you to awake out of sleep"—you whose "salvation is nearer than when we first became Christian believers." And, again, "let us cast off the works of darkness and let us put on the armor of light."

Here, then, we have men who have been redeemed by the blood of Christ cleansed by the washing of regeneration and sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, spoken of as still covered by still needing to be awakened out of sleep; still uncrowned with the anticipated great salvation. In what sharp contrast with this is the language of the same Apostle, in another Epistle: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that the day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of the darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that are drunken, are drunken in the night. But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation."—1 Thess. 5: 4-8.

And yet there is no real contradiction between these two Scriptures. All that is needed in order to harmonize them is, that we understand that in the one case the night and darkness are spoken of objectively and in the other subjectively. True believers are even now "children of the light and of the day," the day-star has already arisen in their hearts; but they are still walking in what St. Paul alls "this present darkness" (Eph. 6 : 12): waiting and watching for that long-promised and radiant

"MORNING WITHOUT CLOUDS," which will only come when "the Sun of Righteousness shall arise, with healing in His wings." Let us for a few moments meditate on some of the most marked characteristics—first, of the night "whose approaching termination the great apostle so confidently predicted; and, secondly, of the glorious "day" which he so exultantly anticipated.

1. The night, then, which St. Paul even in his day regarded as far spent, is the night of nature's darkness. Its shadows fell upon the groves of the old Eden, when man's sin had dimmed its primal unshine, and its wailing winds awoke when he was driven out and heard the clang of its closing gates behind him. Since then, from the fall of the primal man and his kingdom on to the glorious manifestation of the Lord from heaven, the whole period of earth's history is regarded in Scripture as the time of night and darkness.

Since then the whole creation has been made subject to vanity; it has groaned and travailed in pain together even until now; its flowers have faded, its fruits have failed, its fields have withered. Above all, the moral night has been deep and biding; "darkness has covered the earth, and gross darkness the people." Oh! long and weary night, shall it never end? Yes; even when St. Paul wrote, four thousand years of it had passed away, and therefore it was verily true that "the night was far spent." But, if true then, how emphatically true is it now, for how much nearer are we to that blessed day when "the creation itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of

THE GLORY OF THE SONS OF GOD."

2. Again, the night to which the apostle refers is the night of Satan's dominion. In Eph. 6 : 12, we read: "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places." And our Lord Himself speaks of the evil one as "the power of darkness" (Luke 22 : 53). As long, then, as Satan rules, not only in the hearts of men and the government of the nations, as we are taught in the Book of Daniel, but in some sort over the powers of nature, the night must continue, and not till he is bound and imprisoned can the morning dawn.

This shows the folly of those who anticipate that by the advance of civilization, the more earnest and universal preaching of the Gospel, and the larger outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the dark shadows of the night will be dispersed, and the Millennial day dawn upon the world. Can civilization control the destructive elements of nature? Can the Gospel secure the world righteous government, while Satan still points to the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them and says, without rebuke, "All this is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it?" Or can even the outpouring of the Holy Spirit preserve the purity of the visible Church of Christ, while the enemy continues to sow his tares among the wheat? No; the night, though "far spent," will not be passed till the oppressive curse be removed—till Satan be bound—

TILL THE LORD HAS COME.

3. Once more, the night which is, blessed be the Lord of Life, so soon to end, is the night of death's desolation. The history of this fallen world is most emphatically the history of death. Death has reigned, not only "from Adam to Moses," and from Moses to Christ, but even from Christ to the present hour, and still the veil of its dreadful night is spread over the world. By what a natural association of ideas do we speak of "the night of death." Our Lord Himself does so when He says, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work" (John 9 : 4). "They that sleep, sleep in the night," and hence throughout Scripture death is spoken of as a sleep.

Of David it is said, that having "served his own generation by the will of God, he fell asleep and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption" (Acts 13 : 36). Concerning the beloved Lazarus Christ said, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, but I go that I may awake him out of sleep" (Luke 11 : 11). And to those who have died in the Lord is the glorious promise sure: "Them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him" (1 Thess. 4 : 14).

Oh! ye bereaved ones, believing, how may ye rejoice in the thought that the night of death is far spent! One by one we have laid the beloved ones—parents, friends, children—in the silent tomb. Year after year we have heard, as John Foster says, "the thunder of death's wings," and upon many the darkness which those awful wings create will soon be falling. But, glorious tidings!—"the night is far spent, the day is at hand." Yes, as the hymn has it—

"The night is wearing fast away,
The glorious light is dawning;
I see the streaks of coming day,
The bright Millennial morning."
"THE DAY IS AT HAND!"

What day? We have seen some of the characteristics of the far-spent night. What kind of day is it that the Apostle so joyfully looks forward to?

1. It is the day of creation's deliverance. For this the winds are sighing, as they make their sweet but melancholy music amid the leafy groves of summer; for this the wild waves cry aloud, as they dash themselves upon the rocky shore; for this the starving beasts of the forest, and the birds perishing in the cruel frost, and all the innocent, suffering creatures God has made, send up to Him their constant inarticulate prayer. "For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it, in hope, because the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. 8 : 19-22, R. V.).

It is in anticipation of that day that the Psalmist exclaims, "Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; let the field be joyful, and all that is therein: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord: for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth." "Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us" (Ps. 96 : 11-13; 67 : 6). When Adam was driven out of Paradise, and the long night of centuries fell upon the world, it was said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field: in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. 3).

But in what exquisite contrast is the picture of THE COMING MILLENNIAL DAY which Isaiah presents, when the curse is removed, and the world is, as it were, new-born: "For ye shall go out with joy—not with shame and sorrow, as Adam went forth from Eden—and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off. . . . The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. 55 : 12-13; 11 : 6-9).

Oh, blessed thought! "The day is at hand." The day when all Nature's wounds shall be healed; when her sorrowing heart shall be comforted; and when, as in a mirror from which all obscurations have been removed, she shall truly reflect the glory of her Creator.

RESURRECTION LIFE.

2. Again, the day which the Apostle declares to be at hand is the day of resurrection-life. Of the wicked it is said, in the 49th Psalm, "Like sheep, they are laid in the grave (sheol); death shall be their shepherd." But, it is added, "the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning." And what morning is this but the morning of the resurrection? when they that have slept in Jesus shall awake, and be—to use the exquisite figure of the Psalmist—as the multitudinous dew-drops shining in the brightness of the morning sun.

Oh, glorious day! when disease and death shall no more torture and destroy "this trembling house of clay;" when by the possession of nobler powers we shall be fitted for a nobler though not a more acceptable service than we have been able to render here; when that which was "sown in corruption shall be raised in incorruption, and that which was sown in weakness shall be raised in power."

Reader, are you not only looking but preparing for that day? Remember Paul's language: "Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. 3 : 20-21).

CHRIST'S PERSONAL PRESENCE.

3. Lastly, "the day" which not only inspired testimony, but many concurrent signs also assure us is even now "at hand" is the day of Christ's personal presence. As long as He is absent, the night continues, for is He not the Sun of the moral and spiritual world? Yea, even before He rises on the world as the Sun of Righteousness, He will be to His waiting and watching saints "the bright and morning star." Hence, in the parable of the Ten Virgins, the period during which the Bridegroom tarries is represented as the time of night, for it is "at midnight" that the cry is made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," and the prophetic midnight immediately precedes the dawn.

In vain do we hope that the night shall end and the shadows flee away till the Day-star shines in the eastern sky; in vain we look for the dawn of Millennial day till "the Sun of Righteousness arise, with healing in His wings." No rest for creation till Christ comes; no binding of Satan till Christ comes; no Millennium of peace till Christ comes; no resurrection-life till Christ comes; no consummation of bliss in body and soul till Christ comes; for in His presence only is the fulness of joy, and on the wings of His love and power He brings the everlasting day.

A NECESSARY EXHORTATION.

And, oh glorious assurance! that day is about to dawn. Yes, "the night is far spent, the day is at hand?" And what then? What are the solemn words which the Apostle adds? "Let us, therefore, cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." Strange and sad that such an exhortation should be needed by "the children of the day;" stranger and more sad that it should never be so much needed as now.

Woe unto us if we do not regard it. "Wherefore He saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee" (Eph. 5 : 14, R. V.). Otherwise, the light of the morning will be turned into the shadow of death, and the solemn words of the prophet will become applicable to us: "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him, or went into the house and leaned his hand upon the wall, and a serpent bit him. Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness and not light? even very dark, and no brightness in it?" (Amos 5 : 18-20).

God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all, and unless we walk in His light, and are beautiful in the beauty of holiness, we can neither receive radiance from His face now, nor have place and power in the coming Kingdom of the Day.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate made Important Amendments to the Naval Appropriation Bill on July 29th, which seriously curtail the measure which Mr. Robeson is so anxious to see passed. The Senate passed Mr. Beck's amendment prohibiting the completion of four vessels until the Naval Advisory Board shall report the cost of finishing them to the next Congress, and reduced the appropriations for finishing another ship and launching the monitors from $1,000,000 to $400,000. In the course of the debate on Mr. Beck's proposition Mr. Ingalls asserted that the five monitors provided for had cost $9,000,000 already, and that we now expected to spend $3,000,000 more on them. His information was that $5,500,000 had been spent on four vessels which were afterward sold to the contractors for $1,324,290. The accuracy of Senator Ingalls' figures was disputed by Senator Hale, but Senator Ingalls insisted that they were substantially correct.

The Assessment of the Civil Service for campaign expenses is still causing public comment. An application for an opinion on the subject was made to Secretary Folger last week, who said in reply that there was no statute to prevent any employé contributing to the fund who might feel disposed to do so, but that if he did not so desire, or was unable to give, no penalty would attach to him. President Arthur made a similar declaration. The President said in effect that no person in any one of the executive departments declining to contribute shall on that account be subject to discharge or criticism, and no attempt to injure him on this ground will be countenanced or tolerated. It would, however, have been more satisfactory if the notorious circulars signed by Mr. Jay Hubbell had been withdrawn.

The Disclosures Made by Mr. James A. Walsh in the Star Route trials last week, furnish a means of estimating the amount of which the public treasury was robbed during the administration of the department by Mr. Brady. Mr. Walsh, who was originally a Washington banker but afterward became a mail contractor, testified that when the route he had was expedited, he received an advance on his contract of $60,000 a year. In settling some private business afterward with Mr. Brady that gentleman referred to the expedition and presented a claim for $36,000 on that account. Walsh states that Brady explained it as being one-fifth of the sum paid Walsh for expedition, covering three years' payments, and said that the other contractors had paid him that proportion of their receipts. If Walsh's statement is true the contractors must have paid an enormous sum in commissions. In any case it is evident that whoever the guilty parties were, the treasury was robbed of above a million dollars. The work is now being performed at little more than one-half of the amount it cost during the administration of Mr. Hayes.

A Motion for a Court of Inquiry as to the loss of the Jeannette was made in the House on July 25th, by Mr. Washburne, of Minnesota, who was prompted thereto by Dr. Collins, a brother of one of the men whose dead body with those of his companions in De Long's party was found by Melville. The motion included an inquiry into the condition of the vessel on her departure, into her management, into the provisions made for the safety of the boats' crews on leaving the wreck, and into the general conduct of her officers and men.

Several Unexpected Votes were Cast in Favor of the amendment at the recent contest in Iowa. The Dubuque Times reports that two saloon-keepers in Des Moines voted for the amendment, and wrote their full names on the back of their tickets. One of these men was an Alderman by the name of Egan, who was arrested, tried, and convicted last winter of selling liquor without a license. The gentleman from Des Moines said that nearly all the colored voters in that city cast their ballots for the amendment, and several habitual drunkards also voted with the majority.

The Effort to Compel the Railroad Companies to fulfil their duty to the public has failed. Justice Haight, on July 28th, handed down his decision in the case refusing the mandamus requested. In the course of his decision Justice Haight said: "The conflicts that from time to time arise between capital and labor present the most serious and difficult problem that the Government at the present day has to solve. It is the duty of the Court to guard and protect to the utmost every right of the poor man who is compelled to support himself and family by manual labor, and when an opportunity presents, and in a proper case, this Court will not be slow to act in his behalf. But in this proceeding it is powerless to aid him. The Court has not the power to prescribe a scale of wages. Hitherto the amount of wages to be paid has been left to the parties to determine by contract, express or implied. If the power exists at all to change the law in this regard, such power rests in the legislative, and not in the judicial branch of the Government."

The Fatalities from the Heat in New York reached a higher figure on Thursday last than on any single day in a period of more than ten years. One hundred children and ninety-four adults succumbed under the pitiless heat. Not a breath of air was stirring, and the rays of the sun seemed like a rain of fire. The closed shutters on Fifth Avenue and other thoroughfares occupied by wealthy citizens indicated that their denizens had removed to cooler and more healthy localities, but the poorer neighborhoods were as crowded as usual. Several funds have been commenced for the benefit of the convalescent and for delicate children, with the object of enabling them to enjoy a holiday in a purer air. One of these funds—that of the New York Tribune—has already accomplished much good in this way and has doubtless saved many lives. The fact that 194 persons died from the heat in one day should prompt those who can afford it to render timely aid to the poor and the suffering.

A Raid on a Pool Room was Effectuated in New York on Monday, July 24th, by Mr. Anthony Comstock, of the Society for the Suppression of Vice. Many complaints have recently been made to the society by parents whose sons have been enticed there, and by employers who have been robbed by their employes and the proceeds taken there, and it was accordingly decided to enforce the law. There were fully two hundred persons in the place when the descent was made upon it. One solitary doorman barred the ingress of the officers. He refused them admission unless they showed a ticket, but it took only a moment to effect an entrance. Anthony Comstock and his agents were posted on the inside, and upon the arrival of the police they were in a position to point out the proprietors and attachés of the place, and thereby cause their arrest. There was a good deal of excitement among the habitués, several of whom made violent but ineffectual efforts to escape. All the paraphernalia of the place was seized. There were twenty-five books of records, twenty-eight blackboards, 180 bundles of tickets, six trays, $750 in money and fifty statement cards of the races. These were loaded on a truck and taken to Police Headquarters.

The Alumni of Yale College and the Young Men's Christian Association there are making an effort to raise $25,000 for the erection of a building at Yale College, to be used for holding the religious meetings of the college and association. The college has at present two buildings for religious worship. The Battell Chapel and the Marquand Chapel, which suffice for the regular religious exercises of the college. The object of erecting the building contemplated is mainly a desire to increase the activity of the Young Men's Association, which had its origin in Mr. Moody's revival efforts in New Haven some five or six years ago.

State Conventions of the Young Men's Christian Associations are summoned for the following places: Colorado, at Denver, September 12-14; Illinois, at Jacksonville, October 5-8; California, at San Francisco, in October; West Virginia, at Charlestown, October 12-15; Massachusetts, at Charlestown, Oct. 11-13. The British Conference will be held at Glasgow, September 6-9. The Dominion Convention will be held at Truro, Nova Scotia, August 10-12. Prominent workers in the cause will be present at all these gatherings, both from at home and abroad.

Major James H. Cole Conducted Services at Palmyra on Sunday, July 23d, which were signally blessed. The interest excited was so deep that one service continued for three hours, and the altar was surrounded by Christian people praying for more spiritual power and by seekers for salvation, of whom five decided for Christ that night. Major Cole has held many such meetings since leaving Cleveland with similar results. He says to Christian workers: "Many churches in the rural districts need a word of cheer. If the workers in the cities can go for only one meeting good can be accomplished. Instead of going to the large Christian gatherings where they are so thick as to tread continually on each others' toes, go out among the farmers. Gather them in their little churches, or if shaded by trees, as many of them are, hold the meeting under the trees. You will have a good time in body and soul."

An Historic Relic with Quaint and Curious associations is to be added shortly to the museum at the Washington Headquarters at Newburg. It is known as Queen Anne's bell, and is more than a century and a half old. It weighs about twenty-five pounds, is exceedingly sweet-toned, and was made, as a Latin inscription states, at Amsterdam in the year 1716. In 1719 it was presented by Queen Anne to the settlers of Newburg. They had no church edifice at the time, and it was lent to the Lutheran Church at New York, where it hung for some time, until in 1733, the pioneers built a church, and the bell was removed to Newburg. During the conflict of 1776 the bell was taken from its tower and hidden in a swamp, it is said, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Whigs. After the peace of 1779 it resumed duty in the church. In 1798 it was hung in the Academy and rang the village children to school, and also did duty as a court bell. From 1834 to 1873 it was used as a signal bell for the stables of one of the city hotels, and in 1874 became the property of a lady residing in Newburg, who has recently given it to the trustees of the Washington Headquarters, to be preserved with the other treasures of that historic building.

A Hundred-Dollar Gold Watch was Accidentally thrown away recently by a young lady. She went to a picnic up the Wabash River with some friends, and in the course of the evening among other amusements the party tried who could throw pieces of wood farthest into the stream. The young lady in question seized a stick to try her powers. In throwing it with all her might it caught in her watch-chain, which broke, and the watch followed the stick into the river. The young lady's chagrin can be imagined, and she learned a lesson she will probably not soon forget. That loss, however, may be made good more easily than can the losses incurred in other amusements and competitions. It would be easy to name some that are very popular in which those who engage in them heedlessly throw away their souls (Gal. 5: 21).

A Rock that Poisons the Hands of those who are scratched by it has been found in the excavations now going on in connection with the work of the West Shore Railroad near Milton. Its dangerous quality was accidentally discovered by the similarity of the sores on the hands of the men working the rock. It is said to be as poisonous as the ivy and some other vines, the slightest scratch by a piece leaving a troublesome running sore. The thing is quite a new experience to railroad men, and it renders the wounds of those injured by it all the more serious because physicians do not know its proper antidote. If there is much of this rock in the excavations there will probably be some difficulty in getting men to work it. They generally prefer to avoid handling materials that are liable to inflict physical injury, though they are less reluctant to enter occupations in which their moral nature is liable to be poisoned (Ezek. 20: 43).

A Suit Brought by a King is to be Tried shortly in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Three of the defendants are bankers in Boston and proprietors of the Union Safe Deposit Concern. A fourth defendant is a Belgian immigrant who has leased a vault in the Safe Deposit building. The plaintiff is Leopold II., King of the Belgians, who alleges that the Belgian defendant appropriated money belonging to the king and intrusted to him for specific purposes. The suit is brought to recover the money, which is believed to be stored in the vault, and an injunction has been obtained restraining the defendants from entering the vault until the suit is tried. The unusual circumstances of a regal plaintiff suing in an American court has attracted considerable attention to the case. Reflecting on the facts the thought is suggested that there are many hoards of money lying idle or being squandered on personal luxury which do not properly belong to the persons controlling them. If every Christian realized that his property has been intrusted to him for sacred purposes by the King of kings we might soon witness a marvellous change in the mode of spending money (Isa. 58: 6-8).

A Tramp's Fortune is Awaiting the Appli-cation of his heirs in Europe. One evening near the close of last June a shabby-looking tramp applied to the steward of the Westmoreland County Alms-house, Penn., for a night's lodging. The steward, seeing how filthy he was, told the man, who proved to be a German named Henry Rhemberg, that he must first submit to a scrubbing in the bath-room. Rhemberg hesitated, but at last consented. Before taking off his coat he handed Steward Gay a bag of gold, silver, and German securities amounting to nearly $21,000. The wealthy tramp was furnished with a hearty supper and retired. In the morning he complained of feeling ill. The alms-house physician pronounced his ailment typhoid fever, and having heard of his wealth advised him to make a will. The tramp declined to comply, saying he would not die. The sick man sank rapidly, and in spite of his resolve he died on July 5th, and was buried in the Lutheran Cemetery. The heirs will be looked up and acquainted with their good fortune. It is said that Rhemberg hoarded the alms received, living in almshouses and spending nothing, satisfied if the store he would not use increased. All sensible men condemn such a life as foolish if not insane, but when we see millionaires spending their days in scheming and plotting to add to their enormous fortunes by unrighteous tricks, we are forced to conclude that the old tramp was not alone in his folly (Eccles. 4: 8).

A Death Struggle in the Hollow Trunk of a tree occurred near Tusculumbia, Ala., recently. A Tusculumbia journal states that a man living near Wolf Creek hunted a ground hog, which took refuge in a log that was hollow nearly all through. He tried to reach the hog with a pole, but it was too short, so he crawled into the log to get at him. In the struggle that ensued he lost the hold he had with his feet on the end of the log, and it being on the side of the mountain with the entrance highest he slid down head foremost upon the beast. Then there was a fierce fight, but the man, though in a cramped position, succeeded in killing the animal. The next difficulty was to get out of the log, and he found himself unable to crawl out backward, his course being up hill. He would have remained there till he died had not his family become alarmed by his absence, and, guided by the dog, found him in his strange trap and extricated him. The adventure had its ludicrous side, but if assistance had not been at hand its termination would have been sad enough, for the man was utterly unable to deliver himself from the results of his own imprudence. Similarly desperate is the moral and spiritual condition of many a man whose downward course has led him into durance, from which Divine help alone can rescue him (Isa. 59: 16).

A Clergyman's Dinner was Unexpectedly provided in a strange manner recently, according to a report in a New Jersey journal. It is stated that in a sea-coast village in that State a clergyman lives who has a large family, but whose means are extremely small. The family were one day lately in a store strait, having no meat for dinner nor means of purchasing any. The clergyman's wife and daughters were in the back yard consulting about the preparation of a meal of vegetables, when a large fish fell into the yard, apparently from the sky, for no one could have thrown it there. It seemed to come so appropriately as to be a special providence and was in any case thankfully accepted. An explanation of the affair was given afterward by some one who witnessed it. A large fish hawk had been seen to swoop down to the sea and rise with a large fish in its beak. The hawk rose with difficulty, for the fish was heavy and wriggled violently. At last a vigorous twist freed the fish, which fell to the ground, happily at a point where it was very acceptable. The journal relating the incident states that its truth is vouched for by several trustworthy people. The incident is remarkable, but there are many cases well known to every Christian in which help has come in a time of difficulty quite as unexpectedly (Job 35: 16).

A Child was Lost in the Woods for Six Days two weeks ago, near Girard Manor, Schuylkill County, Pa. On July 8th Mrs. Wolfe, the wife of a farmer whose land adjoins the woods in that locality, missed her ten-year old son, and it became clear that he had wandered into the woods. Wolfe's home being situated in a wild, thinly settled district, there is a high fence surrounding the dwelling to prevent his children from going into the woods. But on that day the gate was left open, and through it the child disappeared. Mrs. Wolfe gave the alarm to her husband, and together they began the search, which the night's darkness terminated. Their neighbors were summoned, and all started next morning at daybreak, scouring the hills and valleys in vain. The mother became frantic, but no trace of the missing boy could be found until the six days had passed, when, after climbing rugged mountains and wandering through swamps, the father at last beheld his son sitting on a rock crying bitterly. He was taken home, five miles distant, and cared for. He was in a precarious condition, the result of long suffering and bites and stings of innumerable insects. The child's body presented a terrible appearance. He had appeased his hunger by eating bark from trees, a piece of which he had in his hand when found. How many a wanderer from his heavenly Father's House could tell a similar tale of heedlessness, suffering, and restoration (Jer. 2: 19).

THE STILL SMALL VOICE.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire a still small voice. And it was so, when Elijah heard it, that he wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out, and stood in the entering in of the cave. And, behold, there came a voice unto him, and said, What doest thou here, Elijah?"—1 Kings 19: 12, 13.

ELIJAH no doubt expected that after the wonderful display of God's power on Carmel the nation would give up its idols, and would turn unto the only living and true God. Had they not confessed as with a voice of thunder "Jehovah, He is the God; Jehovah, He is the God?" The prophet trusted that the heart of Ahab might perhaps be touched, and possibly through him the heart of Jezebel. If she did not become converted, at least the manifest interposition of Jehovah might check her hand from future persecution. The prophet hoped that by an influence thus established over the king and queen, the whole land would speedily glide back to its allegiance to Jehovah. Then would his stern heart have been glad before the Lord.

When he found out that it was not so his spirit fainted within him. The message from Jezebel that he would be slain the next morning was probably not so terrible to him as the discovery that came with it that his great demonstration against Baal was doomed to be a failure. The proud Sidonian queen would still rule over vacillating Ahab, and through Ahab she would still keep power over the people, and the idol gods would sit safely on their throne. The thought was gall and wormwood to the idol-hating prophet. He became so despondent that he was ready to give up the conflict, and to quit the battle-field. He cannot bear to live in the land where the people were so blindly infatuated as to honor Baal, and to dishonor Jehovah. He resolves to go right away.

before a beaten enemy! Where now is the dauntless courage which faced all Israel, one against thousands? How are the mighty fallen!

Is this my lord Elijah, crouching in a cavern? Is this the man who seemed to leap into Israel's history like a lion roaring on his prey? Is this Elijah the Tishbite who brought both fire and water from the skies? Yes, it is even he. He has become faint-hearted and weary, and therefore he has fled his Master's service. It is well for us who are always weak that we can so clearly see that the strong are only strong because God makes them so. Their occasional weakness proves that they are naturally as weak as we are; it is only by divine strength that they are made mighty, and this strength is ready to gird us, also, for the conflict. We take comfort from this, though we do not from it excuse our own infirmity. The Lord God of Elijah is our God, and as He sustained a man of like passions with ourselves, He can and will sustain us if we cry unto Him.

Observe how God dealt with His downcast servant. The Lord began with him in much tenderness by refreshing his physical frame. He permitted him to fall into a sleep, and when he was awakened there was a cake ready for him and a cruse of water. Then the Lord allowed him to sleep again, for this he greatly needed. We do not lose the time we spend in sleep when we are worn out with fatigue. It is the best economy of life to let the body have a sufficiency of "kind nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep." God gave His servant, after a second sleep, a second meal, and thus refreshed he was able to look at things in a more cheery light.

Time was when Christian people thought very little of the corporeal system; they called their physical frame a vile body, as indeed it is in some sense, but not in every sense. If they had any doubts, and fears, and tremblings our good fathers laid them all on the back of the devil, or else ascribed them to their own unbelief; when frequently their depressions arose from want of food, or of fresh air, or from a torpid liver, or a weak stomach. A thousand things can cast us down, and we ought not to despise the body through which they act upon us. Rather should we attend to natural laws, and so look to the God of those laws to help us.

If any of you here present are depressed, and in mental trouble, I would invite you to look to your health, and not to blame yourselves till first, you have seen whether your sadness arises from sickness or from sin, from a feeble body or a rebellious mind. Do not think it unspiritual to remember that you have a body, for you certainly have one, and therefore ought not to ignore its existence. If your heavenly Father thinks of

YOUR PHYSICAL FRAME.

He therein gives you a hint to do the same. If the Lord in His wisdom began with the high-spirited Elias by feeding and refreshing His mortal body, we ought to count it wisdom to look to our outward parts; it is of heretics that we read that they inculcate neglecting of the body: wise men value it as the temple of the Holy Ghost. With us it is often the case that "the spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak;" it is no small thing to get the flesh put into order; the physician is often as needful as the minister.

When the man of God had been refreshed by the great Physician, he was led of the Lord to Horeb, where he would be quite alone. The Lord knew that he needed quiet as well as sleep and food, and there among the lone crags, where utter desolation reigns undisturbed, Elias found himself somewhat at home. When the quiet had in a measure calmed his mind, the Lord began to speak with him. He bade him go forth and stand upon the mount before the Lord. No sooner had the prophet come to the mouth of the cave than a tremendous hurricane swept down the rifts of the valleys with such force that it tore the mountains and brought down great masses of granite from their lofty summits. The great and strong wind seemed to shake the mountains to their foundations, and huge columns which long had breasted ordinary storms began to rock and reel and fall about the lone observer with thundering crash.

The prophet was not at all alarmed. He was the child of the storm, a reprobator born to rule amid tempestuous scenes. It is very possible that his spirit felt exhilarated by the terrors around him. The tumult in which he had lived among the people was now imaged before him in the strife of the elements; I should not wonder if he even felt at home, joyously excited as the terrific blast swept over the mountains' brows. As he stood at the mouth of the cavern the earth gave way beneath his feet; he leaned against the mountain, and lo it shook and quivered; for now the earthquake was passing by, and it seemed as if nothing was stable around him.

Scarcely had this convulsion ceased than the fire displayed its brightness. The lightning flamed over the whole heaven, attended by peals of thunder such as the man of God had never heard before. From crag to crag leaped the live lightnings, till the whole firmament blazed with the fire of God. Yet we do not find that the prophet was in the least cowed or dismayed. His was a brave spirit; calm amid the storm. As the eagle mounts in the centre of the lightning, and rises on the wings of the storm, so did it seem with Elijah's spirit; he was aroused by the fury of the elements, but he was not afraid. And now the thunder ceased, and the lightning was gone, and the earth was still, and the wind was hushed, and there was a dead calm, and out of the midst of the still air there came what the Hebrew calls as if silence had become audible. There is nothing more terrible than an awful stillness after a dread uproar. Even the noise of the wind and of the storm which could not cow Elijah were not so terrible as the still small voice by which Jehovah called His servant near. Then the prophet covered his face, and went to the mouth of the cave and stood to listen, for the still small voice had won the solemn attention of his soul. It had done for him what all the rest could not do; for this reason, that the Lord was not in the wind, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but the Lord was in the still small voice, and Elias knew it, and he was awed, and prepared himself to hear what God the Lord would speak.

What is the lesson of this? May God the Holy Spirit help us this morning to learn it.

I. First, I call your attention to THE CHOSEN AGENCY.

Notice, at the outset, what it was not. It was not the terrible, it was not the tremendous, it was not the overwhelming, but something the reverse of all these. It was not a grand display of power, for God was in none of those great things which Elias saw and heard. That which conquered Elijah's brave heart was not whirlwind, was not earthquake, was not fire; it was the still small voice. That which effectually wins human hearts to God and to His Christ is not an extraordinary display of power.

Have you not judged that if God would send a pestilence to our thoughtless city it might, perhaps, impress the thoughtless crowd, and drive to our houses of prayer those who now habitually waste the Sabbath? Might not cholera, or war, or famine alarm the consciences of the careless and drive the ungodly to their knees? Have you not thought that perhaps the screening which God has given us in saving us from the plagues of war, and from innumerable ills, may have tended to breed in men's hearts presumption, and carelessness, and indifference?

Thanks be to infinite mercy, the Lord does not at this present choose the terrible way of action. He leaves the wind, He leaves the earthquake and the fire, and He speaks to men in the silence of their souls by a voice which, though it be as "silence audible," yet it is the power of God unto salvation. But we are hard to convince that it is so. We still cling to the idea that outward pomp of power tremendous would advance the kingdom of God. We are not so ready to dispense with the twelve legions of angels as our Master was. So far as our own action is concerned, we are poor disciples of Him of whom we read, "He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear His voice in the streets."

In our religious exercises we are too apt to rely upon carnal force and energy. We are hopeful if we can make a noise, and create excitement, stir, and agitation. The heaving of the masses under newly invented excitements we are too apt to identify with the power of God. This age of novelties would seem to have discovered spiritual power in brass bands and tambourines, and it is hoped that souls which could not be saved by a church may be reached by an army, and minds that were insensible to Gospel arguments it is supposed can be charmed by banners. Simple apostolic teaching is at a discount, and we are treated to more

SENSATIONAL METHODS.

The tendency of the time is toward bigness, parade, and show of power, as if these would surely accomplish what more regular agencies have failed to achieve. But it is not so, or else both men and God have greatly changed.

The same tendency appears in the too common saying, "At least, we must have an eloquent preacher; let us have one who can plead with choice, picked words, a master of the art of oratory; surely this we may rely upon, and fall back upon earnest pleading, and intense, arousing speech." Yet peradventure God will not choose this form of power, for still He will not have our faith to stand in the wisdom of words, but He will have us learn this lesson, "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord." Crash after crash the orator's passages succeed each other. What a tremendous passage! The hearers must surely be impressed. Wind! And the Lord is not in it.

And now everything seems to shake, while, like a second John the Baptist, the minister proclaims woe and terror, and pronounces the curse of God upon a generation of vipers! Will not this break hard hearts? No. Nothing is accomplished. It is an earthquake, but the Lord is not in the earthquake. Another form of force remains. Here comes one who pleads with vehemence; all on fire, he flashes and flames! Look at the coruscations of his sensational metaphors and anecdotes. Yes, fire; might we not say fireworks? and yet the Lord does not work by such fire. The Lord is not in the fire.

The furious energy of unbridled fanaticism the Lord does not use. He may employ great and terrible things as preliminaries to His soul-saving work, but they are only preliminaries; the work itself is done in the secret silence of the heart. As they were in Elijah's case, so are these things in the cases of others: they startle and arouse, but they cannot convince and convert. That which is to quicken, enlighten, sanctify, and really bless is the still small voice of gentle silence; the words sound like a paradox, but the sense is clear to him who knows truth by experience. The voice which is not heard without is omnipotent within.

We have sufficiently shown the negative side of it; God's work standeth not in the power of the creature. What, then, doth God use to touch the heart? Our heavenly Father generally uses that which is soft, tender, gentle, quiet, calm, peaceful—a still small voice. In the work of real conversion, of bringing the soul to decision and complete obedience to God, the calling voice is often so gentle that it is quite unperceived by others except in its results; ay, frequently so gentle that it is almost unperceived by the man who is the subject of it.

Here, then, we see the weakness of power, but we learn also the power of weakness, and how God often makes that which seems most resistible to be irresistible, and that which we would suppose to be easily waived away weaves about a man fetters from which he never can escape. Softly and gently works the Holy Spirit, even as the breath of spring which dissolves the iceberg and melts the glacier. When frost has taken every rivulet by its throat, and held it fast, spring sets all free. No noise of hammer or of file is heard at the loosing of the fetters, but the soft south wind blows, and all is life and liberty. So is it with the work of the Spirit of God in the soul when He comes actually to set the sinner free; He works effectually, but no voice is heard.

He works usually to the salvation of the soul by revealing the love of Christ, and it is so, not only at our first conversion, but afterward. All along His operations are after the same quiet and effectual kind. As we grow in sanctification it is by tender revelations of the Father's love. What has such influence over any of us as the infinite, overflowing grace of God in our Lord Jesus Christ? You know how M. Monod in his sweet hymn sets forth not only our growth in sanctification, but the gentle instrument of it.

"Yet He found me:

I beheld Him, bleeding on the accursed tree,
Heard Him pray, 'Forgive them, Father:'
And my wistful heart said fondly,
'Some of self and some of Thee.'

"Day by day His tender mercy,
Healing, helping, full, and free,
Sweet and strong, and oh, so patient,
Brought me lower, while I whispered,
'Less of self and more of Thee.'"

Still you perceive it is the operation of love upon the soul which works it all.

"Higher than the highest heavens,
Deeper than the deepest sea;
Lord, Thy love at last has conquered,
Grant me now my spirit's longing,
None of self, but all of Thee."

Thus like the silent morning light grace works upon the man. Its processes are carried on by love; there is not a touch of terror or bondage in the great reconciling deed within.

This, my dear friends (to close this first head), coming quietly home to us, to each one of us individually, without animal excitement—this it is which unites us to Jesus by faith. Elias was calm and quiet when he heard that still small voice of God. He neither fell down in horror, nor danced for joy, yet his whole nature was touched, his inmost heart was convulsed. The silence which God had caused to be heard within him thawed his soul. This is

HOW CONVERSIONS ARE WROUGHT.

When the truth comes right home to the heart, when the man perceives that the message of grace belongs to him, when he grips and grapples with that truth and that truth with him, then without help from the outside he seeks and finds eternal life. The still small voice within the conscience is God's chosen instrumentality effectually to convert and comfort the souls of men; the kingdom of God cometh not with observation, but in the secret chamber man is brought near to God.

II. Notice the choice effects of this chosen mode of working. The first effect of it upon Elijah was that the man was subdued. I have gone over this before. He who could confront the raging wind, he who was not terrified by the lightning, nor made to tremble at the earthquake, the moment he was in that stillness, and heard that gentle voice, wrapped his face in his sheepskin robe, and went outside the cave, like a child obedient to the call of his heavenly Father. And when the Spirit of God comes in His gentle power upon any of you, then you will resist no longer; you will be subdued and conquered by His soft and tender touch.

The first thing Elias did, I said, was to wrap his face in his mantle, therein imitating the angels, who cannot stand unveiled in that awful presence. He did his best to hide his face, like one ashamed—ashamed of having doubted his God, ashamed of having played the coward, ashamed of being found away from the place of his service.

It appears in reading the chapter as if the prophet did not come out of the cave until he heard that voice. He was called upon by God to come but and stand in the open before the Most High, out as I read it he had not done this until the still small voice called him, and drew him in the way of the command; so that obedience is a second blessed effect. Shamefaced on account of his errors, he is now resolved to follow his Lord's word at once, and he stands at the opening of the cave to hear what God the Lord will speak. If the Spirit of God shall work effectually upon any of us one of the first marks of it will be that while we are humbled because of sin we shall grow earnest to work righteousness.

And now that Elias has come out into the clear air, the next effect upon him is that he has personal dealings with God. The voice says to him, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" It is a home inquiry, made to himself alone. He knows that God is speaking with him, and therefore he feels the force of every word which searches him. Then he pours out the bitterness of his grief, and tells the Lord what ails him. The Spirit is surely at work with you when your converse is with the Lord alone. When you want nobody to hear what you have to say, but are glad to enter into your closet and shut to the door, and pray to your Father that seeth in secret, this is real work, the work of God. When you feel every line of the Word of God as you read it as if it were written for you, and you alone; when you think that nobody else in the world can enter so fully into it in your judgment as you now do, for the sentences seem shaped for you, and there are little words dropped into the threatening and the promise exactly adapted for you; then it is that the still small voice is executing its sacred office.

III. In the third place, let us say a little concerning the lesson which from this acted parable. He himself had taught the people by deeds rather than words, and now he is himself similarly instructed. He was taught several things which it was essential for him to know; and among them, first, that God does not always use the means which we suppose He will use. We sit down and think how a nation can be blessed, and we form our own idea of the most excellent way; but our thoughts are not the Lord's thoughts, for as the heavens are high above the earth so are His thoughts above our thoughts, and His ways above our ways. It is not ours to propose to Him what He shall do, nor how or when He shall do it, but we must leave to His sovereign will to choose and to command, and we shall yet see how wondrous He is in His workings.

Elijah's life had been

ONE CONTINUED STORM.

From the first time when he appears as the prophet of fire till he fled from Jezebel, he had always spoken out of the whirlwind, and either threatened or executed the judgments of the Lord; and it may be he relied too much upon this form of ministry. No doubt it was right in him thus to rebuke a sinful and obstinate people, but still God would let him know that Carmel, with its complete victory over Baal's priests, till its rivulets ran red with blood, was not the way by which God would vanquish His enemies. Men would not worship God aright merely because in an excited moment they had slain a band of impostors. The heart is not won to loving reverence by slaughter.

It is to be lamented that the most of professors obstinately cling to the fatal error of looking for displays of power of one kind or another. I hear that a certain church is seeking for a very clever man; she thinks that God is in the wind. I hear the deacons say, "We must look out for the best man. No matter what we give, nor what church we rob of its minister, we must get a first-class man, and then we shall have a full house, and see many converted." Nothing of the kind; it is not God's way to work by clever men, and men who aim at grandeur of speech. He may, if so He pleases, permit the house to be thronged with attentive hearers, but converts will be few when people are

RELYING UPON CLEVERNESS.

"Oh, but we must have a first-rate organization, we must work the church up by revival services." Yes, do it, and do it again, if you choose, and the result may be good if you can do the work humbly; but if you trust one iota upon the means employed, away will depart the Spirit, and you will see nothing but your own folly. That still small voice will be hushed and silent, while the boastings of your wisdom resound like a howling wind or a thunder unaccompanied by rain.

God would have Elijah know another thing, and He would have us know it, that our weakness may be our strength. Elijah did not know anything about those seven thousand converts of his who had been won by the silent voice of his devoted life. Because the success of Carmel melted like the morning mist, he thought that his career had been a failure all along, and that he had brought no one to reverence Jehovah; but he was reading with the eyes of unbelief, and his imagination was leading him rather than the facts of the case. Here are seven thousand people scattered up and down the country to whom God has blessed Elijah's testimony. If He had not blessed his big things as he had desired, yet his little things had prospered greatly.

Moreover, the Lord would have us note the strength of other people in their weakness. That lesson we do not always catch up so soon as we do the first. We are pleased to learn that when we are weak we are strong, because being generally weak we are glad to learn that we are usually strong; but we speak not thus of others, who may in some respects be our inferiors. If we see a man a little more energetic than usual we inquire petulantly, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" If some holy woman bursts out into pleading testimony, we say, "She had better be quiet. Nothing will come of her talking." A work is doing over yonder, and we do not quite approve of its methods, and therefore we cry, "Foolishness!" Ah, but brother, you have to learn the strength of other weak people as well as of yourself.

You know that there are others as weak as you; you are very glad to find that out, and go and tell it; but there are also others as strong as you whom God makes strong because they are weak, dealing with them in His tender lovingkindness just as He does with you. The Lord has still a remnant who are as faithfully serving Him as you are. Believe this and be happy, for God wants you to believe it.

He is not always with our powerful preachers, our learned canons, our reverend bishops, our great generals, and all that, but he may be with that poor young brother who stands at the corner of the streets, and speaks such broken sentences, and with that dear sister who takes a dozen or two of girls and teaches them the Saviour's love. You wonder what these can possibly have to teach, and yet the Lord is quietly and effectually speaking by their gentle voices.

IV. Lastly,

LET US LISTEN

this morning; let the listening be practised at once, most reverently. If we are too many to do it here, let us get home to our own rooms and listen there. Especially do I address myself to you who do not know the Lord; you cannot cause the still small voice to be heard; but often, by making silence and sitting still in it, you may hear that call of tender love. What does it say to you unconverted people? Does it not speak to your consciences, and say, "How is it that you have lived so long in the light and yet have never seen it? I will not speak for your conscience, but I do ask your conscience to inquire of you, why you use your best friend so ill? why you slight His bleeding love? why you postpone Him to any trifle, and are always saying, 'Go Thy way for this time; when I have a more convenient season I will send for Thee?'"

When conscience has done speaking, then let Jesus speak. And what will He say? "I have loved thee, and given myself for thee; wherefore dost thou despise Me? I have come to thee and spoken in accents of love, and I have bidden thee trust Me, and I have said I will not cast thee out if thou wilt come to Me; why dost thou not come and trust?" Let His soft voice be heard, the voice of the Babe of Bethlehem, the voice of the dying Lamb on Calvary; let Him plead with you: "Come unto Me and I will give you rest."

Finally, let me with tenderest accents ask each unconverted one the question Jehovah asked of Elijah. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" What brought you here this morning? Did you come to worship God, or to gratify curiosity, or merely because it is a proper thing to go to a place of worship on a Sunday? "What doest thou here, Elijah?" What has thou been doing all the morning? When the hymn was lifted up, didst thou praise or didst thou mock? And when prayer was offered didst thou join in it, or hast thou been sitting here insulting the Most High by offering Him the outside of devotion while thy heart has been far from Him.

"What doest thou here, Elijah?" Oh, that you would reply, "I do repent of what I have done, and of what I have not done, and I lay myself down at the Father's feet, and beseech Him for Jesus' sake to have pity upon me and forgive me my transgressions." Thou art forgiven already if thou believest in Christ Jesus. If thou dost trust thy soul with Jesus, go thy way; there is no sin in God's book against thee now; He hath blotted out thy transgressions, and will no more remember thy sins. It shall be a happy day, for the voice shall speak to you this morning, and never leave off speaking till the King shall come in His glory, and take you to His right hand. The Lord bless you, dear friends, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE FEAST OF THE MOON.

OUR picture on this page represents a ceremony which is frequently observed in different parts of India. The admiration of the heavens and the worship of the celestial bodies are characteristic of Asiatics generally, and among the Parsees of Western India, and in the Presidency of Bombay, the adoration which they more especially pay to the element of fire has given rise to the name of fire-worshippers, by which they are distinguished. Fire, as the pure and radiant source of light, heat, and vitality, is regarded by them as the most perfect symbol of the divinity.

Among other and less intelligent classes of the people, the moon, during the phase known as its first quarter, is the object of reverential awe, deepening into worship. Sometimes the observance is marked by details of much rude magnificence and gloomy grandeur. Elephants and priests, torches, tom-toms, and material for sacrifice, the clangor of deafening gongs and the shrill shriek of enthusiastic devotees, combine to make night hideous, during the hours occupied by processions to some antiquated umbrageous grove or appropriate temple.

The ceremonies are described by travellers as extremely picturesque and the apparently sincere devotion of the worshippers as very impressive. To the Christian the scene is one inexpressibly sad.

The work of Christian missionaries in India is to direct the minds of these infatuated adorers of His heavenly handiwork to Himself, as alone worthy of their praise and worship. A light has already risen upon them, brighter than any of the luminaries of the skies, and the day will come when the millions of India will walk in the brightness of the countenance of their reconciled God and Father, who has given His Son to die for them. Christians should pray for the speedy advent of that radiant morning, and by their consecrated efforts and gifts hasten it forward with all the energy and devotion of their nature. The heathen shall yet be given to Christ for "His inheritance."

and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession after His personal second advent during the next few years.

A JAPANESE HOME.

OUR illustration represents the interior of a home occupied by a middle class family in Japan. It is the time of the customary evening meal, which in Japan is usually of the lightest and most digestible kind.

The Japanese are a most interesting people, and their history goes back into the mythical and obscure ages of antiquity. The population of Japan is about thirty-four millions. They have post offices, common schools, and newspapers in all parts of Japan, much the same as in America.

For ages this country, like that of China, was entirely closed to foreigners, and consequently to missionary effort and influence. Happily, however, the last twenty years has witnessed an increasing relaxation in this attitude of exclusiveness. A desire on the part of the Japanese for Western arts and sciences has opened the door for the entrance of missionary enterprise.

American Christians were the first to avail themselves of the new opening, and in 1870 the Rev. Mr. Goble and his wife had the honor of inaugurating the earliest Christian mission there. The efforts of Mr. Goble were of the most heroic and praiseworthy character. He went out without support, relying upon the Lord for protection and provision. He went to work at whatever he found to do, to earn his living. He mended shoes, managed to get a small piece of land, engaged in building, and subsequently erected a house.

While Mr. Goble was mending shoes he had a Chinese translator sitting beside him reading translations into the Japanese language from the Chinese. In this way, during one summer, they translated the Gospel of Matthew three times. His wife having been compelled, through family trouble and personal ill-health, to return to America, her husband toiled bravely on, and though he has had to face difficulties which to many would have appeared insurmountable, the lonely missionary worked on, in the strength of his divine Master, and, according to the latest accounts, his labors are enjoying a rich measure of spiritual blessing.

Now that the partition wall is broken down, we are every year becoming better acquainted with this mysterious people. The Japanese are represented as being of middle size, well made, and robust, with complexion either brown or pale like the Chinese; but their distinctive feature is the eye, which is small, oblong or almond shaped, and deeply sunk in the head. They have the head large, the neck short, the nose large, black hair, thick and shining from the oil they rub into it.

They are divided into two religious sects, called Sinto and Budso. The former believe in a Supreme Being, who, they conceive, is too exalted to concern himself with their affairs, but they invoke divinities of an inferior order as mediators; they believe that the souls of the good inhabit luminous regions near the empire, while those of the wicked wander in the air until they have expiated their faults. The Sintos abstain from animal food, because they abhor the effusion of blood, and dare not touch a dead body. The sect of Budso is the same as Buddhism, mixed with peculiar superstitions, and the idolatry practised by the people is similar to that which is common among other pagan nations of the East. Among the more important agencies which are now in operation for the diffusion of the Gospel among the Japanese, are the Church Missionary and Baptist Missionary Societies, but practically the land is untouched, and its need and vastness remind us of the Master's admonition, "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth more laborers into His harvest."

EGYPTIAN WHIRLING DERVISHES.

THE Mahomedan dervish occupies a similar position in relation to Mahomedanism to that occupied by monks toward Roman Catholicism. For the most part they reside in richly-endowed monasteries, in which food and lodging are provided, but not clothing. There are many different orders of them, and the manner of their devotions differs according to their respective orders. Each order is under the control of a sheik or elder, who exercises over them despotic power. Some of the orders are very ancient and possess large wealth, derived principally from gifts of sultans and other potentates and officials anxious to attain a reputation for piety.

Our picture represents a group of the order called whirling or dancing dervishes, whose performance, similar to that depicted, may be frequently witnessed in the streets of Cairo, Alexandria, and other towns where there is any chance of a rich reward of bachsheesh, or alms, from peregrinating Europeans, or others who are spectators of such energetic specimens of so-called devotion.

There are two sorts of dervishes, the "whirling" and the "howling." The performances of both are described as being exceedingly offensive, but those of the "howling" dervishes are by far the worst. Their heads are thrown about with sonorous grunts and hideous howls, and the pride of these devotees, and a sign of their superior sanctity, is to continue their revolutions and howlings so long that they entirely lose their equilibrium, and fall to the ground in a state of insensibility and utter physical prostration. The whirling dervishes, such as our picture represents, skim round with uplifted arms, and pirouette with remarkable rapidity, their motions, however, skilfully timed to music, with closed eyes and lugubrious-looking faces, their ample tunics meanwhile waving in the air. The more intelligent Mahomedans condemn both classes of their co-religionists, whom they regard as heterodox.

Mahomedanism, which is the established religion of Turkey, and prevails in some parts of Africa, India, and other countries, was founded by Mahomet, at Mecca, in A.D. 608 to 622. He announced himself as a prophet sent by God; and the best of all prophets who had ever appeared on earth, and as superseding Moses, Christ, and all others. He professed to receive revelations directly from God, through the medium of the angel Gabriel, which he committed to writing, and gave out to his followers as occasion required. Out of these the Koran, or sacred book of the sect, was compiled after his death. It is a strange medley of human weakness and folly.

The religious dogmas of this strange but numerous sect, are few and simple, but their superstitious ceremonies are numerous and diversified. The first and chief article in their creed, "There is one God, and Mahomet is His prophet," is perpetually on their lips, and the knowledge of many of their votaries seems to go no farther than this. They abstain from wine and strong drink, while they practise polygamy, believe in a sensual paradise after death, and feel justified in propagating their tenets by the power of the sword.

A Prayerful Search for a Sister Lost in London was carried to a successful conclusion recently by the aid of a society established for the rescue of the fallen. A lady who is interested in rescue work in the East of London, recently gave a house in one of the suburbs for the occupancy of reclaimed and penitent fallen women, and herself works personally among the lost. She recently brought to the institution a woman of twenty-five, who was keeping a house of ill-fame in that neighborhood. The visit made a deep impression on the woman; she resolved to leave her vile way of life and go to the home, bringing three other girls with her. These were all suitably provided for, and one was married respectably a few months later on. Shortly afterward a poor little girl about twelve was taken to the institution, who driven from home by unkind treatment, had been wandering the streets of London for a month, trying to find a sister who "was a bad girl." Further conversation elicited particulars which confirmed the idea that the girl who had been married from the home might be the lost sister. The bride was sent for, and joyfully identified the little waif and took her to her own home. When a lady asked the child whether she prayed to God while wandering the streets, she replied, "No, ma'am, but I asked Him to find Fanny!" Had not the labors of Christian workers been blessed to the conversion of the elder girl the younger who sought her out in her trouble might have been another recruit for the ranks of the lost.

WEE DAVIE.

A Tale of Scottish Life. By Dr. Norman McLeod.
A Child's Influence.

"WEE DAVIE" was the only child of William Thorburn, blacksmith. He had reached the age at which he could venture, with prudence and reflection, on a journey from one chair to another: his wits kept alive by maternal warnings of "Tak' care, Davie; mind the fire, Davie." When the journey was ended in safety, and he looked over his shoulder with a crow of joy to his mother, he was rewarded, in addition to the rewards of his own brave and adventurous spirit, by such a smile as equalled only his own, and by the well-merited approval of "Weel done, Davie!"

Davie was the most powerful and influential member of the household. Neither the British fleet, nor the French army, nor the Armstrong gun, nor the British Parliament, had the power of doing what Davie did. They might as well have tried to make a primrose grow or a lark sing!

He was, for example, a wonderful stimulus to labor. The smith had been rather disposed to idleness before his son's arrival. He did not take to his work on cold mornings as he might have done, and was apt to neglect many opportunities which offered themselves, of bettering his condition; and Jeanie was easily put off by some plausible objection when she urged her husband to make an additional honest penny to keep the house.

But "the hairn" became a new motive to exertion; and the thought of leaving him and Jeanie more comfortable, in case sickness laid the smith aside, or death took him away, became like a new sinew to his powerful arm, as he wielded the hammer, and made it ring the music of hearty work on the sounding anvil. The meaning of benefit clubs, sick-societies, and penny banks, was fully explained by "wee Davie."

Davie also exercised a remarkable influence on his father's political views and social habits. The smith had been fond of debates on political questions; and no more sonorous growl of discontent than his could be heard against "the powers that be," the injustice done to the masses, or the misery which was occasioned by class legislation.

He had also made up his mind not to be happy or contented, but only to endure life as a necessity laid upon him, until the required reforms in church and state, at home and abroad, had been attained.

He was one of a very numerous class of reformers whose ideas are somewhat vague as to the direction which the needed reforms should take or how to set about them. It was easy to see that the condition of society was a long way from being perfect, and that anomalies unnumbered existed and fearful abuses flourished, but, after reading the books of his favorite radical philosophers and listening at the tavern to blatant demagogues, each with his pet nostrum, Will Thornburn came away more and more dissatisfied, but also more confused in his ideas of the best remedy to apply. As he told his Jeanie at home, they all wanted to pull down but very few knew how to build up.

But his wife, without uttering a syllable on matters which she did not even pretend to understand; by a series of acts out of Parliament; by reforms in household arrangements; by introducing good bills into her own house of commons; and by a charter, whose points were chiefly very commonplace ones—such as a comfortable meal, a tidy home, a clean fireside, a polished grate, above all, a cheerful countenance and womanly love—by these radical changes she had made her husband wonderfully fond of his home. He was, under this teaching, getting every day too contented for a patriot, and too happy for a man in an ill-governed world.

His old companions at last could not coax him out at night. He was lost as a member of one of the most philosophical clubs in the neighborhood. "His old pluck" they said, "was gone." The wife, it was alleged by the patriotic bachelors had "cowed" him, and driven all the spirit out of him. But "wee Davie" completed this revolution. I shall tell you how.

One failing of William's had hitherto resisted Jeanie's silent influence. The smith had formed the habit, before he was married, of meeting a few companions, "just in a friendly way," on pay-nights at a public-house. It was true that he was never "what might be called a drunkard"—"never lost a day's work"—"never was the worse of liquor," etc. But, nevertheless, when he entered the snuggery in Peter Wilson's whiskey-shop, with the blazing fire and comfortable atmosphere; and when, with half a dozen talkative, and to him, pleasant fellows and old companions, he sat round the fire, and the glass circulated; and the gossip of the week was discussed; and racy stories were told; and one or two songs sung, linked together by memories of old merry meetings; and current jokes were repeated with humor, of the tyrannical influence which some would presume to exercise on "innocent social enjoyment"—then would the smith's brawny chest expand, and his face beam, and his feelings become malleable, and his sixpences begin to melt, and flow out in generous sympathy into Peter Wilson's foxy hand, to be counted carefully beneath his sodden eyes. And so it was that the smith's wages were always lessened by Peter's gains.

His wife had her fears—her horrid anticipations—but did not like to hint "even to" her husband anything so dreadful as what she in her heart dreaded. She took her own way, however, to win him to the house and to good, and gently insinuated wishes rather than expressed them. The smith, no doubt, she comforted herself by thinking, was only "merry," and never ill-tempered or unkind—"yet at times"—"and then, what if—!"

Yes, Jeanie, you are right! The demon sneaks into the house by degrees, and at first may be kept out, and the door shut upon him; but let him only once take possession, then he will keep it, and shut the door against everything pure, lovely, and of good report—barring it against thee and "wee Davie," ay, and against One who is best of all—and will fill the house with sin and shame, with misery and despair! But "wee Davie," with his arm of might, drove the demon out. It happened thus.

One evening when the smith returned home so that "you could know it on him," Davie toddled to him; and his father, lifting him up, made him stand on his knee. The child began to play with the locks of the Samson, to pat him on the cheek, and to repeat with glee the name of "dad-a." The smith gazed on him intently, and with a peculiar look of love, mingled with sadness.

"Isn't he a bonnie bairn?" asked Jeanie, as she looked over her husband's shoulder at the child, nodding and smiling to him. The smith spoke not a word, but gazed intently upon his boy, while some sudden emotion was strongly working in his countenance. "It's done!" he at last said, as he put his child down.

"What's wrang! what's wrang!" exclaimed his wife as she stood before him, and put her hands round his shoulders, bending down until her face was close to his. "Everything is wrang, Jeanie!" "Willy, what is't? are ye no weel?—tell me what's wrang wi' you?—oh, tell me!" she exclaimed, in evident alarm. "It's a' richt noo!" he said, rising up and, seizing the child, lifted him to his breast, and kissed him. Looking up in silence, he said, "Davie has done it, along wi' you, Jeanie. Thank God, I am a free man!" His wife felt awed, she knew not how. "Sit doon," he said, as he took out his handkerchief, and wiped away a tear from his eye, "and I'll tell you a' about it."

Jeanie sat on a stool at his feet, with Davie on her knee. The smith seized his child's little hand with one of his own, and with the other took his wife's. "I havna been what ye may ca' a drunkard," he said, slowly, and like a man abashed, "but I hae been often as I shouldna hae been, and as, wi' God's help, I never, never will be again!"

"Oh!" exclaimed Jeanie. "Let me speak," said William; "to think, Jeanie,"—here he struggled as if something was choking him—"to think that for whiskey I might beggar you and wee Davie; tak' the claes aff your back; drive you to the workhouse; break your heart; and ruin my bonnie bairn that loves me sae weel; ay, ruin him in saul and body, for time and for eternity! God forgie me! I canna stand the thocht o't, let alane the reality!"

The strong man rose, and little accustomed as he was to show his feelings, he kissed his wife and child. "It's done, it's done!" he said; "as I'm a leevan man, it's done! But dinna greet, Jeanie. Thank God for you and Davie, my best blessings." "Except Himsel!" said Jeanie, as she hung on her husband's neck. "And noo, woman," replied the smith, "nae mair about it; it's done. Gie wee Davie a piece, and get the supper ready."

"Wee Davie" was, also, a great promoter of social intercourse; an unconscious link between man and man; and a great practical "unionist." He healed breaches, reconciled differences, and was a peacemaker between kinsfolk and neighbors.

For example: Jeanie's parents were rather opposed to her marriage with the smith. Some said it was because they belonged to the rural aristocracy of country farmers. They regretted, therefore, it was alleged—though their regret was expressed only to old friends—the day when the lame condition of one of their horses had brought Thorburn to visit their stable, and ultimately their house. Thorburn, no doubt, was admitted to be a sensible, well-to-do man; but then he was, at best, but a common smith; and Jeanie was good-looking, and "by ordinary," with expectations, too, of some "tocher."

Her mother, with the introduction, "Tho' I say it, that shouldna say it," was fond of enlarging on Jeanie's excellences, and commenting on the poor smith, with pauses of silence, and expressions of hope "that she might be mistaken," and "that it was ill to ken a body's ways," all of which remarks, from their very mystery, were more depreciatory than any direct charges. But when "wee Davie" was born, the old couple deemed it proper and due to themselves—not to speak of the respect due to their daughter, whom they sincerely loved—to come and visit her.

Her mother had been with Jeanie at an earlier period; and the house was so clean, and Thorburn so intelligent, and the child pronounced to be so like old David Armstrong, Jeanie's father, especially about the forehead, that the two families, as the smith remarked, were evidently being welded, so that a few more gentle hammerings would make them one.

"Wee Davie," as he grew up, became the fire of love which heated the hearts of good metal so as to enable favorable circumstances to give the necessary finishing stroke which would permanently unite them. These circumstances were constantly occurring; until, at last, Armstrong called every market-day to see his daughter and little grandson.

The old man played with the boy (who was his only grandson), and took him on his knee, and put a "sweetie" into his mouth, and evidently felt as if he himself was reproduced and lived again in the child. This led to closer intercourse, until David Armstrong admitted that William Thorburn was one of the most sensible men he knew; and that he would not only back him against any of his acquaintances for a knowledge of a good horse, but for wonderful information as to the state of the country generally, especially of the landed interest; and for sound views on the high rent of land. Mrs. Armstrong finally admitted that Jeanie was not so far mistaken in her choice of a husband. The good woman always assumed that the sagacity of the family was derived from her own side of the house.

But whatever doubts still lingered in their minds as to the wisdom of their daughter's marriage, were all dispelled by one look of "wee Davie." "I'm just real proud about that braw bairn o' Jeanie's," she used to say to her husband; remarking one day, with a chuckling laugh and smile, "D'ye no think yersel, gudeman, that wee Davie has a look o' auld Davie?" "Maybe, maybe," replied auld Davie; "but I aye think he's our ain bairn we lost thirty years syne." "That's been in my ain mind," said his wife, with a sigh; "but I never liked to say it." Then after a moment's silence she added, with a smile, "But he's no the waur o' being like baith."

Again:—there lived in the same common passage, and opposite to William Thorburn's door, an old soldier, a pensioner. He was a bachelor, and by no means disposed to hold much intercourse with his neighbors. He greatly disliked the noise of children, and maintained that "an hour's drill every day would alone make them tolerable." "Obedience to authority, that's the rule; right about, march! That's the only exercise for them," the corporal would say to some father of a numerous family in the "close," as he flourished his stick with a smile rather than a growl.

Jeanie pronounced him to be "a selfish body." Thorburn had more than once tried to cultivate acquaintance with him, as they were constantly brought into outward contact; but the corporal was a Tory, and more than suspected the smith of holding "Radical" sentiments. To defend things as they were, was a point of honor with the pensioner—a religion. Besides, any opposition to the government seemed a slight upon the army and therefore upon himself. Thorburn at last avoided him, and pronounced him to be proud and ignorant.

But one day "wee Davie" found his way into the corporal's house, and putting his hands on his knees as he was reading the newspaper near the window, looked up to his face. The old soldier was arrested by the beauty of the child, and took him on his knee. To his surprise, Davie did not scream; and when his mother soon followed in search of her boy, and made many apologies for his "impudence," as she called it, the corporal maintained that he was a jewel, a perfect gentleman, and dubbed him "the Captain." Next day, tapping at Thorburn's door, the corporal gracefully presented toys in the shape of a small sword and drum for his young hero.

That same night he smoked his pipe at the smith's fireside, and told such stories of his battles as fired the smith's enthusiasm, called forth his praises, and, what was more substantial, procured a most comfortable tea from Jeanie, which clinched their friendly intercourse. He and "the Captain" became constant associates, and many a loud laugh might be heard from the corporal's room as he played with the boy, and educated his genius. "He makes me young again, does the Captain!" the corporal often remarked to the mother.

Mrs. Fergusson, another neighbor, was also drawn into the same friendly net by wee Davie. She was a fussy, gossiping woman, noisy and disagreeable. Jeanie avoided her, and boasted indeed that it was her rule to "keep hersel to hersel;" instead of giving away some of her good self to her neighbor, and thus taking some of her neighbor's bad self out of her. But her youngest child became seriously ill, and Jeanie thought, "If Davie was ill I would like a neighbor to speir for him."

So she went up stairs to visit Mrs. Fergusson, "begged pardon," but "wished to know how Mary was." Mrs. Fergusson, bowed down with sorrow, thanked her, and bid her "come ben." Jeanie did so, and spoke kindly to the child—told her mother, moreover, what pleasure it would give her to nurse her baby occasionally, and invited the younger children to come down to her house and play with wee Davie, so as to keep the sick one quiet.

She helped also to cook some nourishing drinks, and got nice milk from her father for Mary, often excusing herself for apparent "meddling" by saying, "When ane has a bairn o' their ain, they canna but feel for other folk's bairns." Mrs. Fergusson's heart became subdued, softened and friendly. "We took it as extraordinar' kind," she more than once remarked, "in Mrs. Thorburn to do as she has done. It is a blessing to have sic a neighbor." But it was wee Davie who was the peacemaker!

The street in which the smith lived was as uninteresting as any could be. A description of its outs and ins would have made a "social science" meeting shudder. Beauty or even neatness it had not. Every "close" or "entry" in it looked like a sepulchre. The back courts were a huddled confusion of outhouses; strings of linen drying; stray dogs searching for food; hens and pigeons similarly employed with more apparent success and satisfaction; lean cats creeping about; crowds of children, laughing, shouting, and muddy to the eyes, acting with intense glee the great dramas of life, marriages, battles, deaths, and burials, with castle-building, extensive farming, and various commercial operations; but everywhere smoke, mud, moisture, and an utterly uncomfortable look.

And so long as we, in Scotland, have a western ocean to afford an unlimited supply of water; and western mountains to condense it as it passes in the blue air over their summits; and western winds to waft it to our cities; and so long as it will pour down, and be welcomed by smoke above, and earth below—then consequently so long we shall find it difficult to be "neat and tidy about the doors," or to transport the cleanliness of England into our streets and lanes.

But, in spite of all this, how many cheerful homes, with bright fires and nice furniture, inhabited by intelligent, sober, happy men and women, with healthy, lively children, are everywhere to be found in those very streets, which seem to the eye of those who have never penetrated further than their outside, to be "dreadful places;" and who imagine that all their inhabitants must be like pigs in pigstyes, or steeped in wretchedness and whiskey.

A happier home could hardly be found than that of William Thorburn, as he sat at the fireside, after returning from his work, reading his newspaper, or some book of weightier literature, selected from his well-filled shelves in the little back parlor; while Jeanie was sewing opposite to him, and, as it often happened, both absorbed in the rays of that bright light, "wee Davie" which filled their dwelling, and the whole world, to their eyes; or both listening to the grand concert of his happy voice, which mingled with their busy work and silent thoughts, giving harmony to all. How much was done for his sake! He was the most sensible, efficient, and thoroughly philosophical teacher of household economy and of social science in all its departments who could enter a working man's dwelling!

PRAYER AND FORGIVENESS.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 13, Mark 11: 24-33. Golden Text, Matt. 6: 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Aggregate Unanswered Prayers of the Churches—Of Individuals—Why are there few Answers?—Business in the Temple—Gehazi's Failure—Elisha's Power—Confession and Restitution Necessary—A German Wife's Forgiveness—The Dilemma of the Pharisees.

NEVER was a prayer more necessary than that of the disciples, "Lord teach us to pray" (Luke 11: 1). Let us think for a moment of the amount of so-called prayer which is manufactured every day, and of the terribly little result. Take the service of the Episcopal Church for one Sunday, and imagine the answer to all these prayers; "all who profess and call themselves Christians" would be "led into the way of truth," every one who worships would be pardoned or restored according to the promises of God, we should be kept "without sin," and "live in newness of life." Take the sum total of the prayers of the different denominations on a single Sunday, and suppose the answer received, what would be the state of the different churches? There would be life and power in every congregation. Take the prayers of any individual believer for a single year of his life; suppose them all to be answered, what a change would take place in him, in his family and his surroundings! What then hinders the answer of God?

IS THE WHOLE THING A MISTAKE, and is it a waste of time to pray? Is God hard to be persuaded, or does He not trouble Himself about us? as many are not afraid to affirm. Or is there something radically wrong about our prayers? Which is it? Surely God is not changed, He is ever the same, and His Word stands fast. "He cannot deny Himself" (2 Tim. 2: 13) and he who "shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith." But is it not rather the rule than the exception for a man to pray doubting in his heart. Are not men generally more astonished when God answers their prayers than when He does not answer? Is not prayer often like drawing a bow at a venture? How then can God answer? And these doubts in the heart, whence come they? Surely from a want of cleanness, from an impure atmosphere in the soul.

When Jesus, three days before His crucifixion, taught the people in the temple, He said unto them, "Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves." He had just cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, had overthrown "the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; and would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple." The "house of prayer" must be sacred to God, emptied of all else that it might be filled with Him. When it was first dedicated in the time of Solomon, "the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God" (2 Chron. 5: 13, 14). And just as fully is the Lord willing to fill us with His presence. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's" (1 Cor. 6: 19, 20).

Our body is, or ought to be, a house of prayer, empty of all which is not God, that intercourse with Him may be unhindered. So long as there is anything taking up God's place in us, prayer is hindered, it cannot have free flow. There is no power with God in prayer when our hearts are not clean; and unclean, they are dens of thieves, haunts of that which robs God. It is an insult to God, as well as being utterly futile in itself, to attempt a spiritual action with an unclean heart. When the prophet Elisha sent to lay his staff on the face of the Shunamite's dead child "there was neither voice nor hearing," and he was obliged to return to his master with the acknowledgment, "The child is not awaked" (2 Kings 4: 29-31). Gehazi's heart was not clean, there was in it that principle of self which led him afterward to take advantage of Naaman, to obtain garments and money by compromising his master Elisha, with the terrible result of inheriting Naaman's leprosy. But when Elisha came in contact with the dead child, how far otherwise was it! Elisha, who had accepted his vocation to follow Elijah, destroying his oxen and burning the agricultural instruments, which meant his bread, that he might have no way of return—Elisha, who withstood, not only the sons of the prophets, but even Elijah himself, and who followed out his vocation to the very letter at any cost—Elisha, whose heart's desire "a double portion of thy spirit," was fulfilled, this man, when he came in contact with death, brought with him enough of God's life to overcome it; death could not stand against him, and the child lived.

ARE OUR PRAYERS POWERLESS,

let us look to it that no unclean thing is in us. "When ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive your trespasses. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses." O how many there are who want to be right with God, while they know they are not right with man. God will always do what He has undertaken to do. He forgives if we do our part, if we repent and believe the record which He has given of His Son.

Repentance includes both confession and restitution to man, of all in which we have injured man. God cannot confess for us, nor yet believe for us, for this is our part; God cannot restore for us that which we can restore, but He can forgive, He can cleanse, He can restore us, and He waiteth to be gracious. A young man has wronged his employer, he confesses to God, seeks pardon through the blood of Jesus, gives the equivalent of that which he has taken, to some good work, or secretly puts it into the business, but he does not own it to his employer. He reasons, "If my employer knows it, he will never trust me again," and he keeps his secret. Has that man power in prayer? Of course not, something chokes the channel. A man has been injured by another, outwardly he is reconciled to him, he has asked pardon of God for any bitter feelings he may have had toward him, but he never told that man himself, that which was in his heart concerning him, and he knows that he does not feel toward that man as God feels toward sinners. Heartburnings are still there, he feels himself wronged, he looks at the matter as between him and the other, and does not recognize the hand of God in permitting it. Has that man power in prayer? Surely not. God is upright, righteous, holy. "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity" (Heb. 1: 13). He will "by no means clear the guilty" (Ex. 30: 7). God cannot ignore sin, and He never made His redemption a means by which man can sin more easily because pardon is to be obtained, or a means of settling things with Him which it is inconvenient and painful to settle with man. All things

MUST COME TO THE LIGHT,

God will never be a party to the hiding away of evil or slurring over that which ought to be confessed; and most surely when prayer is not prevailing, there is either some uncleanness in the heart, want of forgiveness, jealousy, untruth, or want of faith, a lack of holding God to be the real God He is.

A wife in Germany was cut to the heart by her husband's unfaithfulness, and setting aside anything which God might have to teach her through this deeply humbling and painful experience, she listened to the advice of so-called Christian neighbors who told her she could not be expected to forgive such sin against her, that God did not require her to forgive it, and she thought herself justified in cherishing bitter feelings against her husband. Could she prevail in prayer for the children's conversion, and for the health of her own soul? Of course not. But there was a day when the light broke upon her that God had permitted this terrible cross that she might have an opportunity to forgive as Christ had forgiven her; and she humbled herself to that husband for her bitterness, as though she had been the chief offender, without one word of reproach to him. The channel of prayer was opened, she was in another atmosphere, she had power with God and prevailed.

Our blessed Lord and His disciples "come again to Jerusalem; and as He was walking in the temple, there come to Him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, and say unto Him, By what authority doest Thou these things? and who gave Thee this authority to do these things?" O how truly is the heart of man the same in all ages and in all circumstances! None dared say that the works of Jesus were evil, there was no law broken by restoring sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, power to the lame, life to the dead; but the chief priests, elders, and scribes wished to keep in their own hands the monopoly of all intercourse between God and man; and they could not forgive Jesus for bringing men in contact with God independently of them.

The Lord Jesus in all His answering of questions such as this, took His hearers out of their depth, He never met them on their own ground. He said, "I will also ask of you one question, and answer Me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? answer Me." They reasoned with themselves; a sure sign of no hearty desire to come at the truth; why did they not inquire of the Lord? They were in a dilemma, and reasoned "If we shall say, From heaven; He will say, Why then did ye not believe on him? But if we shall say, Of men; they feared the people; for all men counted John, that he was a prophet indeed." They answered, "We cannot tell," and therefore they failed to obtain the answer which they sought. God grant us wisdom like our Lord, in answering those who question our authority.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Reports of Horrible Atrocities Committed by Egyptian troops and the mob continue to arrive. An eye-witness who arrived at Alexandria on July 23d from Tintah, a city situated between Alexandria and Cairo, gives appalling details of the massacres. Eighty-four Europeans, native Christians and Jews, including the English telegraphers, were tortured, disemboweled and torn in pieces. The women were violated before being tortured. Most of them were dragged into the principal square and murdered in the presence of the governor. Soldiers as well as the mob took part in the atrocities. Another officer, who also was at Tintah, said: "I counted not less than eighty-five corpses carried past, in groups of three and four, each procession headed by two women, carrying each a bludgeon to which dismembered arms and legs were tied. Then followed other women uttering cries of joy as at weddings, surrounding the bodies, which were dragged along by ropes tied to the legs until they became dismembered. Then the rope was shifted to other limbs. The mob with bludgeons beat the bodies until they were flattened, and afterward they caught up the viscera with sticks and threw them against the windows of the houses inhabited by Europeans, the bodies having previously been robbed."

The Dilatory Policy of the International conference in session at Constantinople appears to have exhausted the patience of the English Government. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald states that Lord Dufferin, the English Minister, has informed the Conference that should Europe refuse its sanction to the temporary occupation of Egypt by English troops, England—unless Europe positively forbids her—is prepared to send a sufficient force to Egypt to remove Arabi, to disband the Egyptian army, to restore the authority of Tewfik and to re-establish the situation that existed two years ago. The German plenipotentiary is in favor of order being restored in Egypt by England. The other plenipotentiaries, and especially the Italian, are very much opposed to such a solution. The correspondent adds: "At all events one of two things must happen. The Powers will forbid England to act, in which event a European war is more than probable, or else England, with or without France, and with Europe's sanction, will send troops to Egypt; and in this event I am firmly convinced that a holy war is inevitable."

A Letter from Arabi Pacha to Mr. Gladstone has been published. It was sent prior to the bombardment of Alexandria, but did not arrive until several days afterward. In it Arabi Pacha says: "The Koran commands us to resist if war is waged against us. Hence England may rest assured that the first gun she fires in Egypt will absolve Egyptians from all treaties. The control will cease, the property of Europeans will be confiscated, the canals will be destroyed, and the Jihad will be preached in Syria, Arabia and India. The first blow which England strikes Egypt will cause blood to flow through the breadth of Asia and Africa, the responsibility for which will be on the head of England. Egypt is still ready to be the fast friend of England and keep her road to India, but she must keep within the limits of her jurisdiction. Finally, England may rest assured that we are determined to die for our country."

Mr. John Bright has Made an Explanation in the British House of Commons of his reasons for withdrawing from the Cabinet. In the course of his speech he said: "The fact is that there was a disagreement to a large extent founded on principle, and now I may say that if I had remained in office it must have been under these circumstances—either that I must have submitted silently to many measures which I myself altogether condemned, or I must have remained in office in constant conflict with my colleagues. Therefore, it was better for them and better for me that I should retire. The House knows that for forty years at least I have endeavored to teach my countrymen an opinion and doctrine which I hold—namely, that the moral law is intended, not only for individual life, but for the life and practice of States in their dealings with one another. I think that in the present case there has been a manifest violation both of international law and of the moral law, and therefore it is impossible for me to give my support to it. I cannot repudiate what I have preached and taught during the period of a rather long political life. I asked my calm judgment and my conscience what was the part I ought to take. They pointed it out to me, as I think, with an unerring finger, and I am endeavoring to follow it." Mr. Gladstone said in reply, "This is not the occasion for arguing the point of difference which has unhappily arisen between my right honorable friend and those who were and still desire to be his colleagues. But I venture to assure him that I agree with him in thinking that the moral law is as applicable to the conduct of nations as of individuals, and that the difference between us, most painful to him and most painful to us, is a difference as to the particular application in this particular case of the divine law."

An Authoritative Explanation of the British policy in Egypt was given in the House of Commons on July 24th, by Mr. Gladstone in proposing an appropriation for the war in Egypt. The premier said: "There was not the smallest shred of evidence to support the contention that the military party was the popular party. The British Government had no desire to interfere with the legitimate authority of the Sultan. There was a universal recognition in Europe that a case had arisen wherein, in the interests of humanity, force should be employed to suppress a dictatorship. Whether England went to Egypt alone or in partnership she would not go for selfish objects. England's purpose would be to suppress tyranny in favor of law and freedom, and the government cherished the hope that they might yet give to the peace loving, laborious people of Egypt less military glory, perhaps, but more happiness even than she possessed when in a far-off and forgotten time she was the wonder of the ancient world."

A Political Crisis in France has Arisen out of the Egyptian question. The French Premier on July 29th proposed an appropriation for an expedition to protect the Suez Canal. There were signs of opposition in the Chambers, and M. de Freycinet then stated that he and his colleagues would resign if it were not granted. In spite of this threat M. de Freycinet's motion was rejected by a vote of 450 against 76, and the same evening the Cabinet placed their resignations in the hands of the President of the Republic. It is stated that the vote is received with satisfaction by the country generally, for since the promise of English intervention has been announced it has been felt that no undertaking on the part of the government could limit the perils to which France would be exposed in the action which M. de Freycinet destined her to play in connection with the Suez Canal. The old traditional jealousy and suspicion of England had a good deal to do with the decision of the Chambers.

The Bill to Relieve Irish Tenants of their Arrears of rent passed through another stage of its progress in the British Parliament on July 27th, when it was read a second time in the House of Lords. The Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservatives, from whom opposition was expected, said that he should not oppose the second reading but should try to effect changes when the separate clauses of the bill came up for discussion. He said he approved of that part of the Arrears of Rent bill relating to loans and the provisions for emigration, but he thought it would be very difficult to obtain proof of the tenant's inability to pay his rent. He also hoped the Government would make the bill optional for the landlord. There should be some inquiry as to what class of landlord it was who accumulated arrears of rent in order to evict the tenant before "this act of plunder" was committed.

Russians and Jews.—The London Pall Mall Gazette says that the first important public act of the new Russian Minister of the Interior is certain to meet with almost universal approval. One of the alleged reasons of Count Ignatieff's fall was his want of success in dealing with the anti-Jewish riots. Count Tolstoy is determined that if he himself fails to put a stop to these disgraceful barbarities, it shall at least not be for want of due severity on his part. In the circular which he has just addressed to the Governors-General the Count insists that the strongest measures be taken to repress the outrages, and intimates that in the case of failure "the whole responsibility will fall upon the governors and officials under them charged with the prevention of outrages." The penalty for failure, moreover, is to be immediate dismissal from the public service. Here, at last, is something sufficiently drastic.

A Further Search for the Missing Boat of the Jeannette expedition is to be made, in the hope of finding some relics of Lieutenant Chipp and his party. Lieutenant Berry, Mr. Gilder and another officer of the burned steamer Rodgers are to start from Irkutsk to the Lena Delta in order to follow during the winter the coast as far as the frontier of European Russia, thereby completing Engineer Melville's search to Olenok. A steamer was to start for St. Petersburg on July 25th with Engineer Melville and two sailors of the lost Arctic steamer Jeannette.

The Appeal of the Canadian Parliament to the British Government on behalf of Ireland has drawn a reproof from the Secretary of State who replied to the Canadian address. He said: "Her Majesty will always gladly receive the advice of the Parliament of Canada on all matters relating to the Dominion and the administration of its affairs; but in respect to the questions referred to in this address, her Majesty will, in accordance with the Constitution of this country, have regard to the advice of the Imperial Parliament and of the Ministers, to whom all matters relating to the affairs of the United Kingdom exclusively appertain."

Mr. Moody Commenced Services in Paisley, on July 2d. The inquirers were numerous and also deeply in earnest. Those who were present can never forget what followed; many of them, who have seen a good deal of this kind of work, remarked that it was the most solemn and the most successful meeting for anxious inquirers they ever attended. As one after another stood up and said in a subdued tone of voice, "I will trust and not be afraid," Christians bowed their heads in silent prayer and thanksgiving. This went on for about an hour, Mr. Moody and others bringing text after text to bear upon the cases before them.

Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, Mass., has Been in Japan, and in May delivered a lecture under the auspices of the Japanese Young Men's Christian Association. It is stated that as many as 2000 students were among the audience. Among the special applications which Mr. Cook made to his Japanese hearers was the following: They should heed the evidence of history as to the claims and results of Bible religion, representing as it does the "Gulf-stream of history;" and study Christianity not with the intellect only but the heart. He warned them that if Japan did not become Christian, it would not succeed in its new free development. In the eighty-four days Mr. Cook was in India and Ceylon he made forty-two addresses.

Dr. Ziemann has Been two Months in Ger-many preaching the Gospel, and the people had everywhere come eagerly to listen to the Word. He has visited Heidelberg, Goerlitz, Breslau, and other towns and cities, with congregations varying from 150 to 800. He has now invitations to nineteen different places.

ADMIRAL SIR F. B. P. SEYMOUR, K. C. B.—The Bombardment of Alexandria, on July 11.

ADMIRAL SIR BEAUCHAMP SEYMOUR, K.C.B.

Commander of the British Fleet in the Recent Engagement before Alexandria. Enters the Navy in 1834—Appointed Lieutenant in 1842—Gazetted Commander in 1847, and Captain in 1854—Services and Honors—Success of His Plans Before Alexandria.

THE British naval officer, whose portrait appears on our first page this week, and who is now in command of the fleet before Alexandria, Egypt, is the son of the late Colonel Sir H. Beauchamp Seymour, and was born in 1821. He is, therefore, now sixty-one years of age. Apart from his distinctively professional career, very little information can be gathered concerning him.

EARLY CHARACTERISTICS.

His school life was passed at Eton, and in 1834, at the early age of thirteen, he entered the Royal Navy as a midshipman. As a mere boy he was characterized by a calm intrepidity and a contempt for danger amounting almost to recklessness, and an unflinching determination to qualify himself for the duties of his position in a thorough manner. He proved himself, even while a boy, to be a hardy son of Neptune—a true child of the sea—and a worthy descendant of those naval heroes of bygone days, whose heroism has made the British navy famous throughout the world. The daring deeds of Sir Francis Drake were his favorite study, and he was animated by the same lofty principle of patriotism as that which glowed in the breast of Admiral Lord Nelson, whom he made his model, and whose devotion to duty inspired his emulation.

APPOINTMENTS AND HONORS.

In the year 1842, he obtained a lieutenancy in recognition of his merits; in 1847 was elevated to the rank of commander; in 1854, was gazetted a captain, appointed rear-admiral in 1870, and vice-admiral in 1876. He served in Burmah and New Zealand during the respective wars of 1852-3, and 1860-1, being severely wounded in the latter. He was commodore in command of the Australian station from 1860 to 1862, was appointed aide-de-camp to Queen Victoria in 1866, a Lord of the Admiralty from 1872 to 1874, and commanded the Channel Squadron from 1874 to 1877. In 1861 he was created a Commander of the Bath, and in 1874 a Knight Commander of the same Order.

THE ALBANO-MONTENEGRIN DIFFICULTY.

But though his "blushing honors" fell upon him they were everywhere recognized by the Fleet and Admiralty as being richly deserved. It is said that his skill and tact in the face of complex difficulties are only equalled by his calm courage. Not many admirals, probably, since navies were first formed, have had to perform a more delicate and difficult mission than Admiral Seymour, when entrusted with the command of the Allied Squadron which, in 1880, demonstrated in the Adriatic Sea, with regard to the Albano-Montenegrin difficulty.

The squadron was intended to be in the eyes of the Turks a symbol of the united Sovereignty of Europe, but it has been repeatedly asserted, on what appears to be sufficient and conclusive authority, that if Admiral Seymour, as Commander-in-Chief, had not exercised the most masterly address and tact, this unity would have been seriously imperilled, if not destroyed, for the crews of several of the vessels representing the different nationalities, would far sooner have engaged in hostilities with each other, than concentrate their forces for the overthrow of the Turk. It used to be said of the skippers of the old East Indiamen, a century ago, that it was far harder for them to settle questions of precedence at the cuddy-table than to sail their ships round the Cape; and a good deal of this sort of delicate arrangement fell to Admiral Seymour's share.

THE WAR CLOUD IN EGYPT

which for some months past had been growing larger and darker, was rendered still more portentous when, on July 4th, the Commanders of both the English and French Fleets demanded that the defence works at Alexandria should be stopped during the sitting of the European Conference at Constantinople. For some time past the military preparations on the Egyptian shore were carried on at the instigation and under the superintendence of Arabi Pasha, on an extensive and threatening scale, and the rebel himself arrogantly boasted that "the peculiar construction of the forts will enable me to repel the landing of 20,000 troops."

These ominous preparations, concurring as they did with the movements of suspicious-looking boats in the harbor, induced Admiral Seymour to send a polite demand to the Governor of Alexandria to discontinue the mounting of guns, as otherwise some "decisive action" might be found necessary. Assurances were at once sent from Arabi that no obstruction of the Suez Canal was intended; but on the same day that this assurance came, new guns were placed on Fort Pharos.

On July 6th the Admiral wrote to the Egyptian Commandant pointing out what was being done in spite of the assurances sent two days before, and giving notice that unless the hostile proceedings were discontinued he should give twenty-four hours notice of opening fire. The reply was a denial that any works were going on. The Egyptians, like the Turks, are adepts in the art of prevarication, and Admiral Seymour had good reason for suspecting that they were trying to deceive him. He therefore caused the apparatus for producing the electric light on board his ships to be so altered by huge reflectors as to cast a light like a bull's eye on the forts, and the night of the day on which he received assurance that the work of fortification had been stopped, he turned his light suddenly on the works. Then the lie was detected. Large bands of workmen were busily engaged mounting guns and storing ammunition. On discovering proof of the treachery intended, he telegraphed to the English Government, and on July 8th he received a message which authorized the sending of an ultimatum, that unless the fort guns were dismounted they would be fired upon. As no attention was paid to this demand, at about six o'clock on the morning of July 11, Admiral Seymour gave the signal for the British Fleet to prepare for the bombardment of the forts and earthworks commanding the harbor of Alexandria. A description of these proceedings is given below.

The Admiral had an anxious time before the action, but, in the unanimous opinion of the Fleet, he has conducted the difficult negotiations with tact, judgment, and dignified firmness, while the manner in which he arranged the action of July 11 proves his high capabilities for command. From the beginning to the end there was not a single hitch or the slightest confusion. Everything had been arranged and foreseen, and the crew of each ship knew exactly what to do and did it.

THE BOMBARDMENT AND BURNING OF ALEXANDRIA.

Terrible Scenes of Rioting and Massacre.

THE first important operation of war in which the English Fleet has been engaged since the Crimean war, more than a quarter of a century ago, and, indeed, the first occasion on which the famous British ironclads, broadside and turret ships, have been put to the test of actual fighting, was the engagement of the forts of Alexandria. During that time there have been endless debates, not in Great Britain alone, but by all the first-class European Powers as to the effect of a conflict between ironclad ships and forts on land. This encounter therefore has been regarded by both sides as a practical test of the theories of both sides of the dispute.

Eight ironclads, supported by five gunboats, represented the effective English force. The ironclads were:

Name.	Tonnage.	Armor.	Men.	Guns.
Inflexible....	11,400	16 to 24 in.	349	4,81-tons.
Alexandra... ..	9,490	8 to 12 in.	671	2,25-tons.
				10,18-tons.
Sultan.....	9,290	6 to 9 in.	400	8,18-tons.
				4,12-tons.
Superb.....	9,100	10 to 12 in.	620	4,25-tons.
Téméraire... ..	8,450	8 to 10 in.	534	4,25-tons.
				4,18-tons.
Invincible...	6,010	6 to 8 in.	450	10,12-tons.
Monarch....	8,320	8 to 10 in.	515	4,25-tons.
				2,64-tons.
Penelope....	4,470	5 to 6 in.	—	10,12-tons.

These eight powerful fighting ships were supported by the gunboats Beacon, Bittern, Cygnet, Condor, and Decoy. All the thirteen vessels were fully manned, and in addition to their heavy armaments most were fitted with

of the modern Nordenfolt and Gatling patterns. The whole fleet was under the command of Vice-Admiral Sir F. Beauchamp P. Seymour, K.C.B., the flag officer on the Mediterranean Station of the British Fleet.

Admiral Seymour's plan of attack (as shown in the sketch map on page 508) consisted of dividing his vessels so as practically to bombard simultaneously the whole of the Egyptian positions. All the vessels belonging to other nations left the harbor so as to be out of the way of the attack. Our own squadron, the Lancaster and the Quinhébang, as they steamed past the British Fleet played God Save the Queen, to which the bands on the British ships replied with the strains of Hail, Columbia.

The British men-of-war steamed into their allotted positions at five A.M. on July 11. The "Alexandra," "Sultan," and "Superb" steamed to the east, the first-named vessel opening fire on Fort Ras-el-Tin. The "Monarch," "Penelope," and "Invincible" engaged the forts guarding the Western Harbor. They went inside, and fought at close quarters, being supported by the "Téméraire" in their heavy cannonade upon Fort Meks. The "Inflexible," from the great range of her 81-ton guns, was able to assist both the eastern and the western squadrons of the British Fleet, and meantime gunboats were, on the extreme west, engaging the Adjimi Fort and Marabout Island.

An eye-witness on board the Invincible writes, "the roar of the heavy guns, the ceaseless rattle of the Gatlings and Nordenfolt machines, and the rush of rockets which the Monarch was discharging, added to the sound of our own guns, made up a deep, continuous din, which is impossible to describe and was most bewildering to hear." The great power of the naval guns, and the skilful way those guns were worked soon took effect. The "Alexandra," "Sultan," and "Superb" were continuously engaged with the forts along the northern front of the town from Fort Pharos to the Lighthouse. Fort Marsa-el-Kanat was destroyed by the fire of the "Monarch" and "Invincible" at half-past eight in the morning, and blew up with

A TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.

The correspondent previously quoted writes: "By nine o'clock our fire had silenced all the guns in Fort Meks with the exception of four heavy rifled pieces, the sound of whose conical shot was easily distinguished, even in the din of combat, from the round shot of the smooth bores. These four guns gave us great trouble. They were all placed under cover and the gunners stuck well to their work. The Téméraire was, therefore, signalled to come to the assistance of the three ships before engaged. It was difficult to hit the exact locality of the guns, seen as they were dimly and occasionally through the smoke. But by half-past ten only three maintained fire. These guns were concentrated on the Invincible, and must have been worked by some of their best gunners, for they struck us every time, often quite on the water line."

The gunboats were able to silence the Marabout forts soon after eleven o'clock. The "Téméraire" anchored in the Central Pass and aided in the direct cannonade upon Fort Meks at a distance of a mile and three-quarters. The "Téméraire" did great execution, while the "Inflexible," from a longer range, kept up a good fire, assisting the closer bombardment of the batteries by the "Monarch," "Invincible," and "Penelope." The reply from the forts was at first feeble and ill-directed, the missiles either falling short of the ships or flying above their mast-heads.

But afterward a marked improvement was witnessed in the fire; several vessels were hit with the conical shot, and if the Egyptians had fired shells it is probable that one or more ships would have been sunk. Fort Meks was unable to withstand the combined attack; for the gunboats, after silencing the Marabout guns, ran close in and shelled Meks, which was captured by a landing party and thrown to ruins. On the west the fleet had thus completely succeeded, and on the east the force assaulting Fort Ada was now strengthened by the Inflexible. This vessel brought her heavy guns bear upon the fort, the whole face of which was own away by the shot from the 81-tonners. About a quarter past one the magazine of Fort da blew up, and no further danger was to be apprehended from that part of the defences. Fort Iaros and the adjacent batteries, however, still held out, so the "Inflexible" and "Téméraire," the most powerful vessels in the fleet, turned the full force of their fire upon these positions, and by four in the afternoon

THE FORT AND BATTERIES WERE SILENT RUINS.

While the outer bombardment was still in progress, Admiral Seymour determined to destroy the shore guns to which his ship had been opposed. Volunteers were called for, and offered themselves once. Twelve were selected and sent ashore, accompanied by a Staff Officer, Major Tulloch, who is reconnoitred all the forts for several weeks past. This duty was skilfully carried out. To effect a landing the men

HAD TO SWIM THROUGH THE SURF.

They took with them charges of gun-cotton, which were laid on the guns and exploded. They lay in fragments strewn over the batteries, and the remaining forts are in ruins; the guns which Arabi persisted in mounting and pointing against the ships are shattered, and the fragments dispersed. Their ruins show the terrible meaning of war; the signs of destruction, like the men who use them, shattered in the fray.

The general result of the day's engagement seems to be that the whole of the outer defences of Alexandria were rendered useless. In fact, the fortifications protecting the approaches to the town are in ruins. Fort Napoleon occupies a strong position commanding the entrance to the inner Western harbor. This fort, which is said to mount one 80-ton gun, still stands. The English losses were

FIVE KILLED AND TWENTY-SEVEN WOUNDED.

Eleven shots burst aboard the Alexandra and twenty shots struck the ship. One man was killed and four wounded in the commander's own cabin. Another shot smashed the captain's binoculars.

Five gunboats were engaged not merely as supports to the ironclads, but actually in the serious fighting at Marabout and Meks, and yet there was not a single casualty on board any one of the five. Dynamite was used for blowing up the heavy guns at Fort Meks, the operation being performed after the silencing of the fort by a small party from the "Invincible."

Thus ended the first naval fight in which England has been engaged since the time of the Crimean war.

ON THE FOLLOWING DAY, WEDNESDAY, the British sailors and marines landed, and a large number of Europeans, chiefly Greeks and Levantines, who had hidden all day and night in town from the time of the bombardment, came running down. Some French ladies were among them, whose sad condition was very pitiable to behold. They said that the Arabs killed all the Christians they could find. These fugitives had hidden in cellars as best they could. They said the noise of the bombardment was most awful, but even more dreadful still were the cries of the many wounded Arabs and soldiers who ran through the streets cursing, screaming, and vociferating vengeance. Then in post-haste came tearing along a posse of the Khédive's servants to announce that the Khédive himself was coming up the road from Ramleh, attended by Dervish Pasha, in a carriage, seeking shelter on board one of her Majesty's ships. His highness was put aboard of the little steamer, and conveyed round to the harbor. Arabi had gone to Ceft-el-Dewar, a place about an hour from Alexandria, where he was reported to be entrenching his troops, and had blown up the railway between himself and Alexandria.

Just before the bombardment the Khédive and Dervish Pasha had both quitted Ras-el-Tin for the palace at Ramleh. There they had stayed all day, the Khédive being terribly anxious and despondent, as well he may be if he knows anything of history. Potentates whom a foreign Power supports are never popular with their people. Even if his enemies are vanquished he is still in danger from England, who has a bad habit of using those she has helped for her own selfish ends.

The morning after the bombardment Arabi suddenly ordered a detachment of soldiers to surround the palace where the Khédive and Dervish were awaiting the issue of events, with full intent to kill them both. Thereupon Raghib Pasha went to Arabi, and demanded sternly what this manoeuvre meant. Arabi replied that it meant no particular harm, but that the troops only wished to keep the Khédive. He, however, promised to order the soldiery away, but did not keep his word, and at the last moment he actually told his men to kill the Khédive. The soldiers, however, by that time heard the English were coming, and were bribed by the Khédive to remain loyal to him. But his life was in considerable danger. His Highness sent word to tell the English where he was, asking how he could come off safely; whereupon the Admiral quickly arranged everything, and got him on board an Egyptian steamship, from whence he has now returned to Ras-el-Tin.

Alexandria is practically destroyed. The European quarter is nearly all burnt to the ground, and all the best houses in the Arab quarter looted. The Bedouins, hearing that there were no soldiers or police to preserve order, entered the city and commenced the work of robbery and destruction. Then the convicts were released from the prisons, and an awful scene ensued. Fires were lighted in the stores with petroleum and spread with terrible rapidity. There has befallen a vast destruction of property everywhere.

A HEROIC EXPLOIT.

On board the Alexandra a most gallant deed was done by a gunner. A lighted shell came through upon the main deck, and the brave gunner picked it up and immersed the burning fuse in a bucket of water to extinguish it. It is described as a wonderful piece of devotion, more gallant than anything of the sort ever before chronicled. This fearless man will be recommended for the Victoria Cross.

If the Admiral had only had at his command as many as 1000 or 1200 troops, this magnificent emporium of commerce might have been saved, but the imbecility of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues left him with only 300 men that could be spared from the ships. Afterward when in the House of Commons Mr. Gladstone was charged with the responsibility for the loss of life and property, he had the audacity to say that the Government could not foresee what had occurred. The unblushing falsehood was apparent, for it is notorious that the Government had been explicitly warned that such scenes would follow the bombardment if a sufficient force to keep order was not landed. As events show the greater part of the city is destroyed. The English church is a mass of smoking ruins; so are almost all the other English buildings. The destruction of property has been enormous. As many as 2000 Egyptians must have perished by shots, shells, and explosions.

One of the foreign correspondents relates: Alexandria presented

A TERRIBLE SIGHT.

A vast conflagration was raging in the European quarter, and flames were ascending from other parts of the city. The mob were plundering and burning the city. It was terrible, with the great sheets of flame and the clouds of smoke lit up by innumerable sparks and flakes of fire.

Arabi, before he left with the troops, had the prisons opened, and the convicts, joined by the lower class of the town and by some of the Bedouins, who have been hovering round for some days, proceeded to sack the city, to kill every Christian they could find, and to set the European quarter on fire. Scores of wretched fugitives were cut down or cruelly beaten to death, and hundreds must have been massacred.

Eye-witnesses describe how they saw parties of soldiers with their officers pillaging shops; and when they had wrecked everything, and seized as much as they could carry off, they would tear the paper wrappings from pieces of manufactured goods, make a heap of them, and set it on fire.

The Ras-el-Tin forts are as they were left by their defenders—a complete ruin. Signs of the presence of Europeans are manifest. French newspapers lying about, some unopened, some read—European clothing, and other circumstances go to prove the truth of the report that the gunners were directed by French and Italian artillerists.

ROCKS AHEAD.

Commenting upon the significance and probable results of the bombardment of Alexandria, the Standard says: "Apart from any and every question as to the policy which has led up to this result, we may point out what may possibly lie beyond the events of to-day. Whatever further intervention there may be must in all probability be carried out by British troops alone. It is impossible to see the end of the course which will thus be entered upon. There is no knowing what echoes a gun fired by Britain in the East may awake. It may roll through the whole of the Arab countries as through Alpine summits, and bring down avalanches. There is at this moment an unusual ferment in the Mahomedan world. According to an ancient tradition, the year which begins in November is to witness great changes in the East, resulting in the political overthrow of the Ottoman Empire, and the establishment of a universal Caliphate. The Sultan himself cherishes the dream of reviving in his own person the spiritual authority vainly asserted by his predecessors, but once actually exercised by the Caliphs of Bagdad. There might, perhaps, be a chance for such a policy if resistance to English interference with Egypt should be made the occasion of a holy war against the infidels. Even apart from this danger, the nature and extent of which it is impossible to estimate, there is the proverbial uncertainty as to where a conflagration once begun will end."

Gospel Work in Portugal Appears to be making very slow progress. At the Mildmay Park Conference recently held in London, Mr. Rozas described the religious condition of Portugal, remarking that while the French had got rid of the Jesuits, Portugal had the misfortune to have taken them in. Wherever there are Jesuits they are certain to be known, and already the workers in the mission were made aware of their existence in the country. Portugal had not religious liberty to the full, for speakers of the truth might be mobbed and stoned. They were not the people to start schools or to care about them unless they were gratuitous. One of their great difficulties, which they had experienced for years, was the coldness and the opposition of business men in the place. The Portuguese did not understand a word of anything said to them about the necessity of the new nature. In Portugal he was sorry to say the people appeared to have no sense of sin, and they did not understand what was meant by substitution. These two problems always came up. The people did not feel sin as sin, and they knew nothing of the preciousness of the Atonement.

Luxuries Relinquished for Christ's Sake.—

A letter recently received by a Christian worker in London contains the following passage: "I enclose you a cheque for £38 12s. ($196), the proceeds of the sale of cigars which I have been moved to part with by the testimony of Miss Macpherson at the noon prayer-meeting a few weeks ago. I asked God then what He would have me do; I was unmistakably moved to get rid of my cigars, and I feel that the money should go to Mr. Fegan's new Southwark Home for Boys. I am disposing of my wine also, which I hope will fetch $486, that also I intend giving to the Lord's cause, and anything else He may direct me to part with. I am pleased to give testimony that I have, by grace, surrendered myself wholly to Jesus, and I want Him to use me for His glory. I feel my weakness, and I require my Lord's sustaining grace. Will you ask believers to pray for me? To Him be all the glory forever." This letter was sent anonymously, but the writer is one of many instances constantly coming to light of the valid and permanent results of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's London campaign.

THE ROCKS OF TROUBLE.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"There was a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side."—I. Sam. 14:4.

A Wasted Life and an Unilluminated Eternity—Come up from Between the Rocks.

THE cruel army of the Philistines must be taken and scattered. There is just one man accompanied by his body-guard to do that thing. Jonathan is the hero of the scene. I know that David cracked the skull of the giant with a pebble well slung, and that three hundred Gideonites scattered ten thousand Amalekites by the crash of broken crockery; but here is a more wonderful conflict. Yonder are the Philistines on the rocks. Here is Jonathan with his body-guard in the valley.

On the one side is a rock called Bozez; on the other side is a rock called Seneh. These two rocks were as famous in olden times as in modern times are Plymouth Rock and Gibraltar. They were precipitous, unscalable and sharp. Between these two rocks Jonathan must make his ascent. The day comes for the scaling of the height. Jonathan on his hands and feet begins the ascent. With strain, and slip, and bruise I suppose, but still on and up, first goes Jonathan and then goes his body-guard; Bozez on the one side, Seneh on the other side.

After a sharp tug and push and clinging I see the head of Jonathan above the hole in the mountain, and then I see the head of the body-guard above the hole in the mountain and there is a challenge and a fight and a supernatural consternation. These two men, Jonathan and his body-guard, drive back and drive down the Philistines over the rocks and open a campaign which demolishes the enemies of Israel. I suppose that the overhanging and overshadowing rocks on either side did not balk or dishearten Jonathan or his body-guard, but only roused and filled them with enthusiasm as they went up. "There was a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side."

My friends, you have been, or are now, some of you in of the text. If a man meet one trouble he can go through it. He gathers all his energies, concentrates them upon one point, and in the strength of God, or by his own natural determination goes through it. But the man who has trouble to the right of him and trouble to the left of him is to be pitied. Did either trouble come alone he might endure it, but two troubles, two disasters, two overshadowing misfortunes, are Bozez and Seneh. God pity him. There is a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side.

I. In this crisis of the text is that man whose FORTUNE AND HEALTH fail at the same time. Nine-tenths of all our merchants capsize in business before they come to forty-five years of age. There is some collision in commercial circles and they stop payment. It seems as if every man must put his name on the back of a note before he learns what a fool a man is who risks all his own property on the prospect that some man will tell the truth. It seems as if a man must have a large amount of unsalable goods on his own shelf before he learns how much easier it is to buy than to sell. It seems as if every man must be completely burned out before he learns the importance of always keeping fully insured. It seems as if every man must be wrecked in a financial tempest before he learns to keep things snug in case of a sudden euroclydon.

When the calamity does come it is awful. The man goes home in despair and he tells his family "We'll have to go to the poor house." He takes a dolorous view of everything. It seems as if he never could rise. But a little time passes and he says: "Why, I am not so badly off after all; I have my family left." Before the Lord turned Adam out of Paradise he gave him Eve, so that when he lost Paradise he could stand it.

Permit one who has never read but three or four novels in all his life and who has not a great deal of romance in his composition to say that if when a man's fortunes fail he has a good wife, a good Christian wife, he ought not to be despondent. "Oh," you say, "that only increases the embarrassment since you have her also to take care of." You are an ingrate, for the woman as often supports the man as the man supports the woman. The man may bring all the dollars, but the woman generally brings the courage and the faith in God.

Well, this man of whom I am speaking looks around and he finds his family is left, and he rallies, and the light comes to his eyes and the smile to his face and the courage to his heart. In two years he is quite over it. He makes his financial calamity the first chapter in a new era of prosperity. He met that one trouble—conquered it. He sat down for a little while under the grim shadow of the rock Bozez, yet he soon rose and began, like Jonathan, to climb.

But how often it is that physical ailment comes with financial embarrassment. When the fortune failed it broke the man's spirit. His nerves were shattered, his brain was stunted. I can show you hundreds of men in New York whose fortune and health failed at the same time. They came prematurely to the staff. Their hand trembled with incipient paralysis. They never saw a well day since the hour when they called their creditors together for a compromise. If such men are impatient and peculiar and irritable, excuse them. They had two troubles, either one of which they could have met successfully.

If, when the health went, the fortune had been retained it would not have been so bad. The man could have bought the very best medical advice and he could have had the very best medical attendance, and a long line of carriages would have stopped at the front door to inquire as to his welfare. But poverty on the one side and sickness on the other are Bozez and Seneh, and they interlock their shadows and drop them on the poor man's way. God help him! "There is a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side."

Now, what is such a man to do? In the name of Almighty God I will tell him what to do. Do as Jonathan did—into the sunlight of God's favor and consolation. I can go through the churches and show you the men who lost fortune and health at the same time, and yet who sing all day and dream of heaven all night. If you have any idea that sound digestion and steady nerves and clear eyesight and good hearing and plenty of friends are necessary to make a man happy you have miscalculated. I suppose that these overhanging rocks only made Jonathan scramble the harder and the faster to get up and out into the sunlight, and this combined shadow of invalidism and financial embarrassment has often sent a man up the quicker into the sunlight of God's favor and the noonday of His glorious promises.

It is a difficult thing for a man to feel his dependence upon God with ten thousand dollars in the bank and fifty thousand dollars in government securities, and a block of stores and three ships. "Well," the man says to himself, "it is silly for me to pray, 'Give me this day my daily bread' when my pantry is full and the canals from the West are crowded with breadstuffs destined for my storehouses." O, my friends, if the combined misfortunes and disasters of life have made you climb up into the arms of a sympathetic and compassionate God, through all eternity you will bless Him that in this world there was a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side.

II. Again, that man is in the crisis of the text who has

HOME TROUBLES AND OUTSIDE PERSECUTION at the same time. The world treats a man well just as long as it pays best to treat him well. As long as it can manufacture success out of his bone and brain and muscle it favors him. The world fattens the horse it wants to drive. But let a man see it his duty to cross the track of the world, the every bush is full of horns and tusks thrust at him. They will belittle him. They will caricature him. They will call his generosity self-aggrandizement and they will call his piety sanctimoniousness. The very worst persecution will sometime come upon him from those who profess to be Christians.

John Milton, great and good John Milton, so I got himself as to pray in so many words that enemies might be eternally thrown down into darkest and deepest gulf of hell, and be the undmost and most dejected and the lowest down vials of perdition! And Martin Luther so far I got himself as to say in regard to his theological opponents: "Put them in whatever sauce you please, roasted or fried or baked or stewed or boiled or hashed, they are nothing but asses!" My friends, if John Milton and Martin Luther come down to such scurrility, what may you expect from less elevated opponents?

Now, the world sometimes takes after them, newspapers take after them, public opinion takes after them, and the unfortunate man is lied about until all the dictionary of Billingsgate is exhausted on him. You often see a man whom you know to be good and pure and honest set upon by the world and mauled by whole communities, while vicious men take on a supercilious air in condemnation of him; as though Lord Jeffrey should write an essay on gentleness, or Henry VIII. talk about purity, Herod take to blessing little children.

Now, a certain amount of persecution rouses a man's defiance, stirs his blood for magnificent battle, and makes him fifty times more a man than would have been without the persecution. So was with the great reformer when he said: "I will not be put down, I will be heard." And so it was with Millard, the preacher, in the time of Louis XI. When Louis XI. sent word to him that unless he stopped preaching in that style he would throw him into the river, he replied, "Tell me that I will reach heaven sooner by water than he will reach it by fast horses." A certain amount of persecution is a tonic and an inspiration, but too much of it and too long-continued becomes a rock of Bozez, throwing a dark shadow over a man's life. What is he to do then?

GO HOME,

you say. Good advice that. That is just the place for a man to go when the world abuses him. Go home. Blessed be God for our quiet and sympathetic homes.

But there is many a man who has the reputation of having a home when he has none. Through unthinkingness or precipitation there are many matches made that ought never to have been made. An officiating priest cannot alone unite a couple. The Lord Almighty must proclaim banns. There is many a home in which there is no sympathy and no happiness and no good cheer. The clamor of the battle may not have been heard outside, but God knows, notwithstanding all the plaudits of the "Wedding March" and all the odor of the orange blossoms and the benediction of the officiating pastor, there has been no marriage.

Sometimes men have awakened to find on one side of them the rock of persecution and on the other side the rock of domestic infelicity. What shall such a one do? Do as Jonathan did—climb. Get up into the heights of God's consolation, from which he may look down in triumph upon outside persecution and home trouble. While good as great John Wesley was being silenced by the magistrates and having his name written on the board fences of London in doggerel, at that very time his wife was making him as miserable as she could—acting as though she were possessed with the devil, as I suppose she was; never doing him a kindness until the day she ran away, so that I wrote in his diary these words: "I did not forsake her; I have not dismissed her; I will not recall her."

Planting one foot, John Wesley did, upon outside persecution and the other foot upon home trouble he climbed up into the heights of Christian joy, and after preaching forty thousand sermons and traveling two hundred and seventy-six thousand miles, reached the heights of heaven though in the world he had it hard enough—"a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

III. Again, that woman stands in the crisis of the text who has

at the same time. Without mentioning names I speak from observation. Ah, it is a hard thing for a woman to make an honest living even when her heart is not troubled, and she has a fair cheek and a magnetism of an exquisite presence. But now her husband or the father is dead. The expenses of the obsequies have absorbed all that was left in the savings bank; and woe and wretchedness with weeping and watching she goes forth—a grave, a corpse, a coffin behind her—to contend for her existence and the existence of her children.

When I see such a battle as that open I shut my eyes at the ghastliness of the spectacle. Men sit with embroidered slippers and write heartless letters about women's wages; but that question is made up of tears and blood and there is more blood in their tears. Oh, give women free access to all the alms where she can get a livelihood, from the telegraph office to the pulpit. Let men's wages be cut down before hers are cut down. Men have power in their souls and can stand it. Make the way easy to her of the broken heart. May God put in my hand the cold, bitter cup of privation and give me nothing but a windowless hut for shelter for many years, rather than that after I am dead there should go out from my home into the pitiless world a woman's arm to fight the Gettysburg, the Waterloo, the Waterloo of life for bread.

And yet how many women there are seated between the rock of bereavement on the one side and the rock of destitution on the other, Bozez and the interlocking their shadow and dropping them upon her miserable way. "There is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side." What are such to do? Somehow let them climb up into

"Leave thy fatherless children; I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me." Or climb up into the heights of that other glorious promise: "The Lord preserveth the stranger and reveleth the widow and the fatherless." O ye sewing women on starving wages! O ye widows turned out from a once beautiful home! O ye female teachers kept on niggardly stipend! O ye despairing women seeking in vain for work, wandering along the docks and thinking to throw yourself into the river at night. O ye women of aching sides and weak nerves and short breath and broken heart! You need something more than human sympathy. You need the sympathy of God. Climb up into His arms; He knows it all and He loves you more than father or mother or husband ever could or ever did; and instead of sitting down wringing your hands in despair you had better begin to climb. There are heights of consolation for you, though now "there is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

IV. Again that man is in the crisis of the text who has on the one side and an unilluminated eternity on the other. Though a man may all his life have culled deliberation and self-poise, if he gets into that position all his self-possession is gone. There are all the wrong thoughts of his existence, all the wrong words, all the wrong deeds—strata above strata, gigantic, ponderous, overshadowing. That rock I call Bozez. On the other side are all the tribulations of the future, the thrones of judgment, the eternal ages, angry with his long defiance, piled up, concentrated, accumulated wrath. That rock I call Seneh.

Between these two rocks Lord Byron perished and Alcibiades perished, and Herod perished, and ten thousand times ten thousand have perished. A man immortal, man redeemed, man blood-bought, climb up out of those shadows! Climb up by the way of the cross! Have your wasted life forgiven; have your eternal life secured. This morning just take one look to the past and see what it has been and take one look to the future and see what it threatens to be. You can afford to lose your health, you can afford to lose your property, you can afford to lose your reputation, but you cannot afford to lose your soul. That bright, gleaming, glorious, precious, eternal possession you must carry aloft in the day when the earth burns up and the heavens burst. O God, help that man to save his soul!

You see from my subject that when a man goes into the safety and he does not demean himself. There is nothing in religion that leads to manliness or unmanliness. The Gospel of Jesus Christ only asks you to climb as Jonathan did—climb toward God, climb toward heaven, climb into the sunshine of God's favor. To become a Christian is not to go meanly down; it is to come gloriously up—up into the communion of saints, up into the peace that passeth all understanding, up into the companionship of angels. He lives up; he dies up.

Oh, then, accept the wholesale invitation which I make to all people! Come up from between your invalidism and financial embarrassments. Come up from between your home trouble and your outside persecution. Come up from between your bereavements and your destitution. Come up from between a wasted life and an unilluminated eternity. Like Jonathan climb with all your might instead of sitting down to wring your hands in the shadow and in the darkness—"a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

RACHEL ELLIS'S PERIL.

A MERRY picnic party of young people from the city settled down on a rock-bound shore for a day's enjoyment one sultry day in July. None know so well how to enjoy the sea breeze and the view of the open sea, as those whose days are spent in stores and warehouses and their nights in small bedrooms in the most densely populated localities. Such were most of the party, and all were prepared to enjoy the trip to the utmost.

Among the ladies present were two sisters, Ada and Rachel Ellis, both young and attractive girls, whose high spirits and merry laughter added to the general merriment. Rachel especially was in a joyful mood, for one of the party was Edgar Milverton, a young man to whom she was engaged to be married, and whom she loved with all a woman's devotedness. In fact, Edgar was loved too well and far better than he deserved. Had Rachel Ellis given to her God the love she lavished on this man, her whole life would have been revolutionized. But young men and maidens rarely realize that God claims and should receive a love beyond even that which they give to each other.

All went well with the party until the evening. That is to say with the bulk of the party. Individually, perhaps, there might have been worries and heartburnings of which each knew its own bitterness. Early in the day Rachel and Edgar had separated themselves from the party and wandered off alone. There was a little good-humored raillery about "lovers' society," and then they were forgotten. Later in the day Edgar rejoined the party, but Rachel was not with him. No inquiries were made about her for each was intent on their own enjoyment, and Rachel was sure to turn up in time to return. So all went on with the amusements on hand, bent on enjoying the last few minutes of sunlight.

The tide was rising fast and the time for return approached when the whole party was startled by a shrill cry. It came from Ada Ellis, who had several times cast an anxious glance around for her sister, and had at last descried her as she stood, waving her handkerchief, far out at sea, upon a small piece of rock completely surrounded by the boiling waves. This was what had happened; Rachel and Edgar when they strolled off by themselves had a lovers' quarrel. Edgar showed himself in his own character, which he had concealed before, but which he thought he might reveal now that the poor girl had shown by word and manner how deeply she loved him. But he was not an honest man, and his meanness and wickedness disgusted Rachel. With indignant words she dismissed him, and then sat down on the rock to weep. Before she knew it, the tide came in, and when she turned to go to her friends she saw that her way was cut off by the billows.

When Ada saw her sister she went straight to Edgar and demanded to know why he had left her in so a critical a position, and pointing to her begged him to rescue her. But Edgar was not of the heroic sort, and with his hands in his pockets, and a face as indifferent as he could make it, he said, "It is Rachel's own fault, and I am not mad enough to go to certain death out there; I cannot swim."

An old man behind him pointed out to him a path he might safely take, but Edgar would not venture, and then with a frantic cry Ada turned to her companions and two of them started out to find a boat. It would, however, have been useless had not help come from another source. A brave fisherman who had seen from the rocks the girl's peril plunged into the water, and was swimming to her rescue before even Ada had seen her. By the time the boat was found and launched Rachel was halfway to the shore clinging to her preserver's neck, and when he was almost exhausted they had the pleasure of receiving both into the boat. It was an hour of peril Rachel never forgot; but she said afterward that even that danger was not so terrible as the one which threatened her in her love for Edgar. From both dangers God delivered her, and it has been her aim since that event to show by a life of Christian work and service how sincere is her gratitude to Him.

An Atheist Lecturer Saved.—At a Recent meeting in London, Mr. Henry Thorne, of the Y. M.C.A., spoke of the great blessing which had lately rested upon the work of the Association in Yorkshire. He said: "In the town of Barnsley there was a man who had been for many years an Atheist, and a lecturer upon Atheism and Secularism, who had taken part frequently in open-air debates. When spoken to one night about the Lord Jesus Christ, he replied, 'Christ is not worth a thought;' but on the following night he came, and as I was going into the hall, he held out his hand as if to shake hands. I thought he was coming with fresh argument, which I was not going to meet, for I find the best argument to put before Atheists is the simple Gospel. But he took hold of my hand and said, 'Mr. Thorne, I have received the Lord Jesus Christ as my Saviour.' On the following Sunday evening, in the presence of a large audience, he said, 'Last Tuesday night I told Mr. Thorne I had received the Lord Jesus Christ as my Saviour, and to-night I want to tell you that I am rejoicing in Him.' Tears were streaming down his face as he said it. 'Last week,' he continued, 'I did not believe there was a God, but now I know that the Lord Jesus Christ has pardoned all my sins.'"

A Discovery of a Prodigal in a Fish Market

by a Y.M.C.A. worker was described at the recent Mildmay Park Conference in London by Vice-Chancellor Blake, of Toronto. He said: "A young man went to the Southern States of America, a distance of 2000 miles from Toronto, and the Secretary of the Association there wrote and said, 'You will find So-and-so in your city; look him up, and see if anything can be done for him.' He was so low down that, although the son of wealthy parents, he was found in one of the fish-markets cleaning fish. 'Young man' said the delegate who had found him, 'you have got pretty near to the husks.' 'Yes,' said he, 'I have; it was painted very bright as I entered, but I find it a very dark and miserable place where I have got to.' 'Do you want to leave it?' 'I do.' 'Are you determined to make a struggle?' 'Yes.' 'Then come to my warehouse and I will give you a place. I will expect you at my Bible-meeting every afternoon, and you will come and take a seat in my pew at church.' 'I will,' he said. At our great Sunday-school Convention last year in the city, where we had delegates by the hundred, that young man came as one of the delegates sent up from that town in the United States. He is an earnest Christian."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Barnum's Challenge.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting in Glasgow, on Sunday, July 2d, Mr. Sawyer said: "The great American showman, Mr. Barnum, at a temperance meeting in Philadelphia, asked any one in the hall, employer or employé, who had not felt the curse of strong drink, directly or indirectly, to stand up. Not one person did so."

Holding up Father's Hand.—Mr. Sawyer said that at one of the Gospel temperance meetings in New York, a man came in to hear the "Old, Old Story," with a vague hope that he might be delivered from the burden of his degraded appetite. His heart was touched. A request was made toward the end of the meeting, that those who desired to be prayed for would hold up their right hand. Being near the platform the poor besotted drunkard felt ashamed to do so; his little girl, however, lifted his arm and held it up against his will, and that night his heart was softened and opened by the Holy Spirit, and feeling himself to be a great sinner he received Christ.

A Kiss Instead of Whiskey.—A Man of about forty years of age said: "I thank God that since attending the Circus on the 14th of this month I have been delivered from the curse of strong drink. If I had not found Christ as my Saviour and experienced His mighty power to save, I should never have been cured; for the loving prayers of my wife, a Good Templar's card, and my own resolutions were unable to keep me from indulgence in strong drink. Since that Friday night, however, my wife, on my return home from business, at night, instead of saying 'You have been drinking again,' comes and gives me a kiss, and says, 'There is no whiskey now.' No, thank God! the consciousness of Christ's love has destroyed the longing I once had for that sort of thing."

"The Happiest Week of my Life."—A Man said: "I was going home from work at six o'clock one evening, recently, when a Christian friend put a ticket in my hand and said, 'We are going to hear Mr. Moody preach; would you like to go?' I said, 'Yes, I should.' And we went to the church in Cowcaddens. The sermon did not move me much; but I went to the after-meeting, and when the hymn was sung 'Take me as I am,' I said, 'I am going to Christ as I am to ask for forgiveness of my sins.' I found Christ willing to save, and obtained His pardoning grace. I wish I had heard Mr. Moody years ago, for it has been the happiest week of my life. I afterward felt that God had given me work to do, and last Sabbath night I fetched a friend from Govan to attend the meeting in Buchanan Street, and there his soul was saved."

A Minister's Fallen Daughter Reclaimed.—On June 21st Mr. Simpson was called to speak to an inquirer sitting near the door of the church in Glasgow. When he reached her he found a woman dressed in filthy rags and with all the usual appearances of being a debased drunkard. After a little conversation he recognized her as a minister's daughter who had been, to his own personal knowledge, a burning and shining light in her father's church twenty-three years ago, but through an insatiable craving for intoxicating drink was now a byword among the lowest in the city. But the power of God has happily restored her, and she is now full of happiness. Her life for the last few days is such a complete contrast to that which she has led for so many years that she is a moving testimony to Christ's redeeming power as she goes through the streets of Glasgow, though as yet she has not opened her lips to speak for Him.

Taking off the Colors.—Just as the Church was being closed on Sunday, 2d July, the attention of a worker was called to a man who had crept in quietly, and was standing in a depressed-looking way at the inner door. When spoken to he explained that in the month of June last, being then a hard drinker, he went to the Circus out of curiosity on hearing that drunkards were being saved. Staying to the after-meeting, he was constrained to take the pledge. On the following Saturday he noticed that his blue ribbon and medal were being soiled, and to protect them he put them into his pocket, instead of leaving them outside his coat. His mates took this as a sign that, being "pay Saturday," he intended to break the pledge and go back to his old habits. They teased and jeered at, and finally half-forced, him into a public-house, where he got helplessly drunk, only reaching home some time on Sunday morning. When he came to himself in the evening, and fully realized what he had done, his grief was intensely bitter. He hurried off to the meeting, dressed just as he was when he fell, with his blue ribbon and medal still in his pocket, to ask some one to guide him back. He humbly confessed his sin to God, and asked for grace that he might stand firm in the future. Some members of the "Mizpah Band" are to look after him.

A Girl Graduate Converted.—At the Noon-day meeting at Glasgow, on July 3d, a minister said that he once gave some Bible readings at Wellesley College, in America, where about three hundred young ladies were being educated. The principal of the college asked him to give them to two of the students who were confined to their room by sickness. On being introduced to them, he inquired if they were Christians. One replied, "I hope so;" the other answered, "Sometimes I think I am, and sometimes I think I am not." The minister said: "If I met your father in Boston and told him that I had met a young lady at Wellesley who said that she thought that you were her father, what would he think?" The tears streamed over her cheeks as she replied, "Do you mean to say that it is our privilege to call God our Father in the same way as our earthly father?" This circumstance was the means of leading her to Christ.

"Thank God for the Blood."—A Partick man said: "Down in Partick, where I live, there was an old man lying on his death-bed. He had sunk very low and was very degraded through strong drink. I went to see him. The Roman Catholic priest had been there shortly before me. I said, 'You seem to be very near the end of the journey?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I am—very near.' I asked, 'Where do you think of going to spend eternity?' 'Ah, man,' said he, 'I don't know that; it is all dark—it is all dark.' I said, 'I have got good news from God for you,' and I quoted him this precious Scripture from 1 John 1:7, 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin.' I quoted it again. I said, 'How many sins is that?' 'All,' he said; 'but I never saw it in that light before.' 'Now,' I went on, 'if the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin, how much is left for good works to do?' He said, 'Thank God for the blood; thank God for the blood; thank God for the blood.' Then beckoning his wife he said, 'Wife, won't you trust the blood of Jesus, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin, and meet me in heaven?' She was speechless, but since then she has been led to trust in the blood, and through its efficacy to once more meet with her husband."

A Tarnished Husband Brightened up.—Mr. Sawyer related the following incident. "At a New York meeting an abandoned drunkard, named William Cale Smith, was sitting in the front seat. He had sunk to the lowest depths of degradation a man can fathom, entirely through his own insensate folly and persistent wickedness. He was prevailed upon to accept Christ that evening, and promised to surrender everything to God and to trust Him implicitly for the help he needed. Next morning he did not know where to turn for bread to satisfy his hunger. It suddenly occurred to him that work might be had from a firm at Brooklyn whose business it was to discharge ships, but he had not got the two cents to cross the ferry. While puzzling himself as to the means of raising the money, he thought of his sister, whom by his spendthrift habits he had ruined, and decided to apply to her. He obtained it from her, but when he was near the landing-stage, the promise made on the previous night, that he would trust entirely in God and not in man, flashed into his mind. Turning round to take back the money, he saw a wagon breakdown, the owner of which called out to him: 'Come, help me to put this right, and I will pay you.' Smith ran joyfully to do so, and when the work was finished received a dollar for his assistance. Hrying back to his sister he, to her surprise, repaid the two cents, and showing her the dollar, promised not to trouble her again. At the meeting that night he told how God had helped him, and at the meeting a gentleman interviewed him saying 'I know your old employers and will speak to them about you.' The next morning they heard the story, and gladly took him back into their warehouse. Smith's only regret now was that his wife and child, who had been forced most unwillingly to leave him, would not believe in the reality of conversion. One evening Mr. Sawyer suddenly called upon him to testify to the power of the Grace of God. The audience was moved to tears. Unknown to him his wife and child were sitting in the hall, they now came forward with full hearts, Mr. Smith declaring that her husband was indeed a new man, and as bright as when she married him."

Lydia the Governess.—A Clergyman said: "I remember in the early part of my ministry a young girl came out expecting to secure a situation as teacher in a public school. After spending some time till all her money was gone, she reluctantly took a situation as governess and a sort of up-servant combined. In a little while she lost the governess part, then the 'upper' part went, and she became a kitchen maid. I was a young minister at the time, about her own age, and was quite incompetent to guide Lydia, but the Word came at the right time. When I saw her she spoke bitterly of her 'fate,' that she, an educated New England girl, able to mix with any society, should be compelled to do this disgusting work. I urged her to take Jesus into the work, whatever it was, and said that no matter how offensive it might seem to be, He would glorify it. The sequel was that she went to work to sweep, brush, dust, and clean pots and pans with great vigor and cheerfulness. The lady she worked for asked her, 'What is the matter? Yesterday you went about as irritated and disagreeable as you could be; now you are singing over your work. It is a pleasure to you.' Lydia told her story, and it was the means of guiding her mistress and the whole family to Christ, and the lady became a great worker in the Lord's cause."

THE DOOM OF ANTICHRIST, AND HIS FAMILY AND ALLIES.

By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Rise and Fall of Antichrist.

The Sentence to be Pronounced on Antichrist—His First Attempts to Subjugate the World—Opposition Aroused—His Ultimate Success—One of His Heads Slain—His Wounds—What Period He Receives Them—His Entrance into Hades—Who Will Antichrist Be—He Will Have Delegated to Him the Power of Satan—A Publicly-Acknowledged Compact—The Worship of the Dragon—The Initial Steps Already Taken—Men Waiting for a Miracle—Antichrist to Become King—Revived Rome—The Nations Infatuated.

WHEN Jesus as Judge of all men, adjudicated and sentenced the impenitent at doomsday, it will not be like a Russian autocrat, who does what he pleases, simply because he pleases, irrespective of merit or demerit. This is such a primitive and fundamental truth, that it was recognized so long ago as the time of Abraham. Hence he said, when interceding for Sodom (Gen. 17:25): "Shall I the Judge of all the earth do right?" or, rather, what is just? We may therefore infer that, when the Books of Life and of Works are opened at the Great Assize, the individual penalty inflicted will be governed by and correspond, not only with the turpitude of the sin, but with the amount of light vouchsafed to the lost.

This principle will, doubtless not be ignored when the sentence on Antichrist is pronounced. The very uniqueness of the penalty—"cast alive into the lake of fire," as he will be, will serve to show to men and angels that, of all sinners, and his ecclesiastical agent will have been the most daring. For, not content with (Ps. 94:2) "framing mischief by law," Antichrist will confront our Lord, and contend with Him for universal mastery.

EGYPT AND SYRO-PERSIA WILL AT FIRST OPPOSE ANTICHRIST, BUT FINALLY SUCCUMB.

The most cursory glance at Daniel 11: 26-29 will show, when Antichrist first attempts to subjugate the world, that at least two of the five toes, or nations, which will spring from the eastern foot of the revived Roman Empire—namely, Egypt and Syro-Persia—will oppose his pretensions. Such opposition, if at first only diplomatic, will finally close on the battlefield. At first aided by Great Britain with its ironclads (Dan. 11: 29-30) they will be successful in the conflict, but ultimately they will succumb through his combined military skill, treachery, and Satanic might.

In the course of his conflicts it would seem that ANTICHRIST WILL BE SLAIN.

For we read (Rev. 13: 8), "I saw one of his heads as it were slain (margin) to death." As if to leave no doubt as to the literalness of this incident the very weapon whereby his death-blow is inflicted is recorded. For when his marvellous resurrection from Hades becomes the foundation of the edict for his universal worship (Rev. 13: 14) we read that He "had the wound by a sword and did live." As the original word employed (uaxaipac), means not only a poniard but a large knife, it is possible that he may not die on the battle-field, but owe his death to assassination—or the mode whereby tyrants have been usually killed. So long ago as the time of Job, the Edomite, Eliphaz foresaw this fate of Antichrist, for he thus wrote (Job 15: 20-22) of the "wicked man," "a sound of fear (margin) is in his ear—he believeth not that he shall return out of darkness; and he is waited for of the sword."

HIS WOUNDS INDICATED.

Not only is the weapon of his destruction pre-ordained, but the very wounds of which Antichrist dies are indicated, as if to prove that his death is literal, and not allegorical, as some suppose. Then we read (Zech. 11: 17) that the sword shall be upon his right arm, and upon his right eye; his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened, or blinded. We are warranted, then, in inferring that, in addition to a paralyzed arm, the sword will pierce his brain, through his right eye, and hence that Antichrist will die of a brain-wound. And thus he who only used his eyes and his strength for selfish purposes will find, that his very punishment was only the shadow of his sin.

THE PERIOD OF HIS DEATH-WOUND.

At what period in his eventful history this death-wound will be inflicted is not definitely indicated in prophecy. But as Antichrist will make a treaty with the rulers of the Jews to protect those who have reached the Holy Land (Comp. Isa. 28: 14-15; Ps. 55: 20-21; and Dan. 9: 27, and ib., 11: 30-31) for seven years, and as that period will apparently be uninterrupted by any event until he makes his covenant when only three years and a half of the hebdomad have expired—we may conclude that he will receive his death-wound prior to his seven years protectorate of the Jews. Such assassination will possibly spring, not from religious, but political motives; for it is improbable that the communists, who will then dominate—suspicious as they will be of the principles and activities of this modern Bonaparte—will permit him to attain the object of his ambition—namely, universal rule, without first contesting his pretensions.

HIS ENTRANCE INTO HADES.

But, whatsoever be the period of time, or how, and from what motive Antichrist will be slain, the result of his untimely death will be that he will enter Hades, or the prison of lost souls, till the day of judgment, as contra-distinguished from Paradise, the abode of the saved, till the rapture of the Church. To Job, if not before, the fact was revealed that there is an awful prison where the souls of godless heroes and others await in mental agony their final judgment. Hence, to quote Boothroyd's version of Job 24: 5, "The mighty dead [nephaim] and those dwelling with them, die in anguish beneath the waters," or in the interior of the earth. Such temporary incarceration of Antichrist in Hades does not rest on mere supposition, but is intimated in unmistakable terms; for, in connection with the slaughter of the Two Witnesses, we learn that Antichrist will be their murderer. Thus we find him designated as (Rev. 11: 7) "the Therion that ascendeth out of the abyss." Subsequently, too, when his evil doings are fully reported, he is thus described (Rev. 13: 8) "the Therion who shall ascend out of the bottomless pit" or abyss.

WHO WILL HE BE?

Probably up to the time of his descent into Hades, Antichrist will merely be one of those Godless, ambitious military adventurers, who, like Napoleon I. and III., "Wade through slaughter to a throne." But from his insight into Antichrist's principles and moral character, as well as from his daring defiance of God, Satan will discern that at length the personage has been born of whom the Spirit of God wrote, when He said, by Ezekiel (33: 16-17), "Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old times by the hands of my (margin) servants, the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years that I would bring thee against them in the latter days." A test will then be presented whereby it will be known to what extent his ambition reaches, and Satan will proffer to Antichrist the very temptation which our Lord resisted (Matt. 4: 8-9) when he was shown, as in a moving panorama, "all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them." For Satan will say, "All these things I will give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

As it is the very thought of Antichrist how (Hab. 2: 5) "to gather unto him all nations, and heap unto him all people," he will readily swallow the tempting bait. For, unscrupulous as he is, what cares he how power is obtained, so that he is universally hailed as and his insatiable ambition is thereby gratified.

The fact that Antichrist will have the power of Satan in this world delegated unto him, was first foreseen by Daniel, who declared that (Dan. 8: 24) "his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power." What is thus stated in somewhat indefinite terms is interpreted by John, who says (Rev. 8: 3) "the Dragon [or Satan] will give him his power and his throne (literal) and great authority. It is there seen that in all his future career, Antichrist will become the agent, if not the very incarnation of Satan." Nor is this the first time that Satan incorporated himself with a man, in order to carry out his defiance of God, as we learn from the analogous case of Judas. Up to a certain period, he was simply a covetous man; but on the eve of the Passover (Luke 22: 2) "Satan entered into Judas Iscariot," and, as a result, he betrayed Jesus for that money which was his idol.

A PUBLICLY-ACKNOWLEDGED COMPACT.

That the compact with Satan on the part of Antichrist will not only be a voluntary, but a publicly-acknowledged one, we gather from Hab. 1: 11, which states that "he will impute (or ascribe) his power unto his God." It is probable, from Daniel 11: 37, which intimates that he will not "regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of woman (Christ), nor regard any God," that up to the time of his descent into Hades, he will be an avowed atheist or autolator. But, after his compact with Satan he will not be without an object of worship. For we read (Dan. 11: 38-39) "As for the Almighty God, in his seat [or room] he shall honor, yea, he shall honor a (margin) God of forces [or protector]; and a God whom his fathers knew not shall he honor with gold and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things: thus shall he do in the fortresses (margin) with a strange God, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory."

WORSHIP OF THE DRAGON.

Nor will such worship of Satan be confined to Antichrist; for, of the vast majority of the Gentiles we learn (Rev. 13: 4) that they will "worship the Dragon [or Satan] who gave power unto the Therion," such worship of the Evil One will be given externally to the miraculously-endowed image of Antichrist which will be located on the battlement of the rebuilt temple of Jerusalem (Comp. Dan. 11: 31; Hab. 2: 18-19; Matt. 24: 15; and Rev. 13: 15). We infer, too, from Dan. 11: 38, where we learn that God's protector will be universally worshipped, that copies of this idol will be made and distributed throughout the ten last Gentile kingdoms for worship. Nor need we be surprised at such idolatry in an age which boasts of its freedom from superstition and general enlightenment. For never did Mariolatry so prevail in Popish countries. The initial steps of such demon-worship, in the endeavor of spirit-rappers to obtain oracular responses from the unseen world, and that not only by human medium but by means of planchette and other material agencies; and thus men, already men of the highest scientific and philosophical celebrity, are found practically (Rev. 9: 20) "worshipping demons and idols, of gold and silver, and brass and stone." Well, then, might the apocalyptic seer say, when he foresaw the prevalence of sorcery in the last days, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols!"

MEN WAITING FOR A MIRACLE.

Scientists, evolutionists, and agnostics as well as neologians, indicate that, if they saw a miracle they would believe in the possibility of the suspension of the natural physical laws. Hence, when they see such a miracle wrought in the person of Antichrist—namely, in his resurrection from the dead, and his speaking death-dealing effigy—there will be no room left for further scepticism, and they will at once render Divine homage to the man of sin or lawless one. Nor is such man-worship improbable in the face of the prevalent pantheism. For, in what Thomas Carlyle called "Hero-worship," and in what the Comtists call "the worship of humanity"—we may trace the genius of that man-worship, which will be one of the worst signs of the last times.

SUPREME KING OF REVIVED ROME.

Prior to, or in consequence of this universal worship of Satan in the person of Antichrist, he will become supreme king of revived Rome. To this dignity he will be elevated by the ten kings of eastern and western Rome; for we read what never yet universally occurred in sacred or profane history—that (Rev. 17: 13) "these have one mind, and will give their power and strength (or armies) unto the Therion." In thus electing Antichrist as Emperor of the world, the ten Gentile kings will doubtless think that they are acting as free men. But two factors in the career of Antichrist negative this impression: First, we learn from Daniel 11: 21, that he will "obtain the kingdom by flatteries." Secondly, such election of Antichrist will be but the outcome of a Divine penalty, since we read that (Rev. 17: 17) "God will put it into their hearts to fulfil His will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the Beast, until the words of God are fulfilled." So that while they boast themselves to be supremely free, the ten Gentile kings will be the veritable slaves of the God that they have sought to dethrone!

THE NATIONS INFATUATED.

Whether the masses will at first concur in such election or not is somewhat doubtful; but as the Republicans will have been slaughtered, like as in the case of his prototypes, the two Napoleons—the residue of the infatuated nations, stunned as they will be by his military successes (Rev. 13: 3-4) will wonder after the Beast, and say, Who is like unto the Beast, and who is able to make war with him? and so will render him the very homage denied to the Most High.

ANTICHRIST OPPOSED.

But opposition to the pretensions of Antichrist will not be altogether, nor even chiefly political. Myriads will reject his claims to the godhead as the result of angelic preaching (see Rev. 14: 6-9). Refusing to worship either himself or his effigy, they will be guillotined wholesale (comp. Rev. 13: 15 and Ib. 20: 4) for their loyalty to God. Happily for mankind, God has never left Himself without witnesses in this world, and so it will be in the final crisis of this dispensation. Hence we read (Rev. 7: 9-17), that "a great multitude whom no man could number out of (literal) all nations and kindreds, and peoples and tongues, shall come out of the tribulation, the great one, and stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands." And thus, though he does not intend it, will Antichrist add mighty hosts to the redeemed in glory.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Principal Amendments to the Naval Appropriation Bill made in the Senate were concurred in by the House on August 1st, when Mr. Robeson agreed to the amendment restricting the cost of completing the four monitors to $400,000 and postponing work upon the vessels until the approval of an advisory board is given. Of the 71 amendments from the Senate 29 were agreed to by the House, the majority of them being simple verbal changes or unimportant reductions of sums appropriated for minor matters in bulk. The Conference Committee then agreed to the only clauses in controversy, which were in regard to the closing of navy yards. The Senate conferees receded from their disagreement, and, as agreed upon, the bill leaves the closing of navy yards to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. The bill as agreed to in conference was passed by both houses, engrossed, signed, and sent to the President. This issue has occasioned some surprise, few people supposing that Mr. Robeson would have consented to forego so favorable an opportunity for controlling the expenditure of a large sum of public money in the channels with which he is so familiar.

The President sent to the House of Representatives on August 1st a message vetoing the River and Harbor Bill by which about twenty million dollars were appropriated. The bill was promptly passed over his veto by both branches of the Legislature, but there are evidences both in the press and in the country that the President's course was approved rather than that of the Senate and the House. In his message vetoing the bill, President Arthur said: "My principal objection to the bill is that it contains appropriations for purposes not for the common defence or general welfare, and which do not promote commerce among the States. These provisions, on the contrary, are entirely for the benefit of the particular localities in which it is proposed to make the improvements. I regard such appropriation of the public money as beyond the powers given by the Constitution to Congress and the President. I feel the more bound to withhold my signature from the bill because of the peculiar evils which manifestly result from this infraction of the Constitution. Appropriations of this nature to be devoted purely to local objects tend to an increase in number and in amount. As the citizens of one State find that money—to raise which they in common with the whole country are taxed—is to be expended for local improvements in another State they demand similar benefits for themselves, and it is not unnatural that they should seek to indemnify themselves for such use of the public funds by securing appropriations for similar improvements in their own neighborhood. Thus, as the bill becomes more objectionable, it secures more support." Another evil of which the President considered the bill an example he pointed out as follows: "The extravagant expenditure of public money is an evil not to be measured by the value of the money to the people who are taxed for it. They sustain a greater injury in the demoralizing effect produced upon those who are intrusted with official duty through all the ramifications of government." Both these evils are serious, though, as the President observed, one is greater than the other. Congress has now for a long time appeared oblivious of both.

The Passage of the River and Harbor Bill over the President's veto was accomplished by a departure from the customary practice of pairing. Senator Logan called attention to this fact in the Senate. He said that he wanted it to go on the record that the bill had been passed because of the peculiar method of pairing adopted. It had always been the custom, because it was the only fair way to pair, to demand two affirmatives for one negative vote where a two-third vote was required. That custom had been departed from in this instance. For that reason the veto had not been sustained, and he wanted it to so appear on the record. The analysis of the vote by which the bill was passed over the veto shows that in the House 64 Republicans, 53 Democrats, and 5 Greenbackers voted for the bill: 28 Republicans, 30 Democrats, and 1 Greenbacker against it. In the Senate 18 Republicans and 23 Democrats voted to pass the bill over the veto, and 12 Republicans, 3 Democrats, and 1 Independent against it. Journals of all parties have emphatically condemned this bill, and not a few have denounced those who voted for it as wilfully abetting a swindle. However that may be, the fact is clear that this Congress has refused to relieve the people of their heavy burdens, and has been energetic and united only when there has been a project to spend public money wastefully or otherwise. Messages have been sent to the President from New York, Chicago, and other cities, signed by bankers, merchants, and the most prominent citizens, irrespective of party, thanking him for his veto. We shall soon have an opportunity of seeing whether these citizens will give practical force to their words by refusing to renominate the men who voted to set the veto aside.

The Report of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on the Peruvian scandal leaves the case in the same unsatisfactory condition in which it was originally. While denouncing Mr. Shipperd, the committee say, with reference to the other parties involved, that "public officials cannot guard too scrupulously against engaging in enterprises where their private interests are, or may be, brought in direct conflict with their public duties." This general expression of opinion is rather a tame and trite conclusion to the inquiry, but as Mr. Blaine is removed from the State Department the committee probably thought there was no need to speak more directly or decidedly in the matter. Mr. Perry Belmont, though concurring in the report, appends to it a brief history of the Landreau claim and of "Mr. Blaine's improper efforts in its behalf," which are described as "alike disgraceful to our government and injurious to the welfare of Peru."

An Important Resolution was Adopted by the National Civil Service Reform Association at Newport, R. I., on August 2d. Resolutions were passed recommending the policy of forcing candidates for Congress of both parties to explicitly define their position on the question of Civil Service Reform. The association then passed the following resolution as a practical issue to its labors: Whereas, the practice of raising party campaign funds by assessments upon officers and employees of the government is demoralizing in its effect and has of late been carried on with unprecedented shamelessness, in defiance of the spirit and in some cases also of the letter of the law, it is recommended that whenever an officer or employee of the government be found to have violated the law that respects civil service reform, the association within whose constituency the case may have occurred shall take measures the most efficient in its power to prosecute the offender; and it is further recommended that the counsel of the National Civil Service Reform League take such steps as they may think proper for testing the legality of the so-called Hubbell circular, by bringing the matter to judicial determination.

An Outbreak of Yellow Fever is Reported from Texas. A despatch from Austin, Tex., says: "The Mayor of Rio Grande City on August 2d telegraphed to the Governor that yellow fever had broken out in a town on the Mexican side of the river and that a panic existed, Rio Grande City being overrun with refugees. He wanted quarantine established, and the Governor had instructed him to use his discretion, unless the health officers of the State have arrived." Dr. Robinson, Lazaretto physician, reported on the same day to the Philadelphia Board of Health that he had detained the bark Parametta, from Havana, laden with sugar. The bark had three or more cases of yellow fever, and one death, namely, the mate, in the Port of Havana. The others of the crew are at present all well. One hundred cases of yellow fever were reported on August 1st at Laredo, Tex., but they were afterward stated to be at Matamoras, and not at Laredo. There were on August 5th about fifty cases of yellow fever at Brownsville, and the disease is spreading rapidly. One death has occurred, that of a German named Quast, recently arrived in this country. Reports are conflicting as to the existence of the fever at other points in the State.

A Repetition of the Shameful Spectacle Witnessed recently at Madison Garden, New York, has been declared illegal by the Assistant Corporation Counsel of the city, to whom Mayor Grace applied for advice. Glove-fights, says the counsel, are a clear violation of the law against prize-fighting, and the police have ample powers to prevent it. It is reported that an effort will be made to overcome this decision by obtaining a mandamus, but it may be hoped that no justice of the Supreme Court will consent to issue one. Its legality would be at best but doubtful, while it would be a direct encouragement to a most immoral, disgraceful and brutal exhibition.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey is Paying a brief visit to America. One evening last week he visited Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission, which was crowded by an audience such as Jerry nightly gathers there. When Mr. Sankey entered he was immediately recognized and the hall was filled with applause. He was pleased, he said, to look once more upon friends in New York, and was glad that even on so warm a night such a throng was willing to rally to hear the Gospel songs. "My visit to America," he said, "is to be only temporary. I must return to my work across the sea. You have not heard so much of that work as of our campaign eight years ago, but the fruits are twice as great. I return in September, and with Mr. Moody will go through the towns in the south of England, ending in Liverpool next April, when we hope to come back to this city again and revive the old times which so thrilled us in the Hippodrome and Cooper Union." Mr. Sankey followed these words with the songs, "The crowning day is coming," "Say, are you ready?" "Oh, what shall I do to be saved?" and "Beyond the smiling and the weeping." Of the last song he said: "It was written by the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar. I sang it in his presence, and told him that it was the favorite of our lamented Garfield. The gray-haired poet bowed his head, listened in silence, and finally declared with unusual enthusiasm that until that time he had never fully appreciated it." Mr. Sankey later in the evening sang "I am waiting for the Master," "The Palace of the King," "Memories of Galilee," and "Gathering in the Sheaves."

Two Gold Watches have been Presented Respectively to Misses Hattie S. and Lillie H. Rice, two young ladies of Brownville, Jefferson County, N. Y., who, in January last, by prompt action, extinguished a fire which threatened to destroy the Empire Mills in that village. The watches were presented by insurance companies which had large risks upon the building. The owner of the mill made them substantial gifts just after the occurrence. The fire was extinguished by these two ladies in its early stage; had they not promptly taken action a company of firemen might not have succeeded in putting it out. It is so in all danger, individual and social. Bad habits, pernicious enterprises and social evils may at the outset be easily checked, even by slight and weak means, but later on, all the strongest resources in existence may fail (James 3 : 5).

An Ingenious Explanation of the Unsatisfactory state of the crops in some districts of New England is given by an observant farmer in New Hampshire. He says that the earlier part of the season being very wet, the roots of crops kept near the surface of the earth, and consequently when the later sudden heat came there was a quick scorching of vegetation. Some weeks ago a farmer owned one of the finest fields of wheat in the vicinity; now the stalk has turned yellow a foot from the ground, while the kernel is only just filling. It is possible that the unsatisfactory state of some of our churches might be explained on the same principle. Religion if not too pronounced and aggressive is fashionable, and Christians "not righteous over much" are popular; there has been no persecution forcing converts to seek earnestly for spiritual nourishment and so they fade and wither before they bear fruit (Matt. 13 : 6).

A Timely Warning against Poisonous Leaves is given in a scientific journal, which says: "Some of our most admired flowers, which we should least willingly banish from cultivation, are associated with green leaves of a very poisonous character. The narrow long leaves of the daffodil act as an irritant poison; the delicate compound leaves of laburnum have a narcotic and acrid juice which causes vomiting, and has not unfrequently led to death. The narrow leaves of the meadow saffron, or autumn crocus, give rise to the utmost irritation of the throat, thirst, dilated pupils, with vomiting and purging. The dangerous character of aconite, or monkshood, leaves, is doubtless well known, but each generation of children requires instruction to avoid above all things those large, palm-shaped leaves, dark green on the upper surface. Leaves of coarse weeds provide an abundant quota of danger, but frequently their strong scent and bitter or nauseous taste give warning against their being consumed." It is in nature as in the moral world, warning is not needed so much against the coarser forms of sin as against evil attractive in appearance but deadly in its effects (Prov. 1 : 17).

Two Man-Eating Sharks were Captured last week at the Fulton Ferry, New York, by Captain Patrick Owens. The male fish is 11 feet in length from the tip of the tail to the end of the nose, and weighs 500 pounds. The female is 7 feet long, and weighs 400 pounds. Each of these monsters of the deep is provided with four rows of teeth in the lower jaw and two in the upper. The teeth are small and sharp-pointed, and arranged closely together in such a manner that when the huge mouth is closed they act like a saw, and are capable of taking a man's leg off in a twinkling. From the inside of the male an old boot and a soda-water bottle were taken when the autopsy was made. Captain Owens says that the East River is swarming with sharks now, and he accounts for their appearance at this particular season of the year by the fact that fishing smacks are continually coming up the rivers with live fish. A shark, he says, will follow the smell of live lobsters or blue-fish wherever it leads him, and numbers of the monsters have been enticed up the Bay in this way. They very seldom enter the slips, but hover on the outside, waiting to pick up whatever may float out to them. This piece of news will probably suffice to prevent bathing in the river more effectually than the river police are able to do, for the prospect of encountering such a monster in the water is enough to scare the boldest swimmer. People do not expose their bodies lightly to the risk of mutilation or destruction, though they go readily enough into theatres, gambling-saloons, and other places where Satan waits to make their souls a prey (Prov. 14 : 2).

A Coffin has been Made and Richly Decorated by a citizen of Ohio for himself in readiness for his death. The wood of which it is made was grown on his own farm and it has been polished and beautified with great care. It is made of white pine. The sides and the bottom are painted red, white, and blue, and the lid is covered with American flags. Near the head, covered with a small American flag, is a picture of the man who expects to be buried in it, taken when he was in the prime of life. The picture is a very good photograph of him as he was some fifty years ago, though it bears little resemblance to him now, for he has reached the advanced age of ninety-three years. It is seldom that we hear of a preparation for death so eccentric as this, though there is this to be said for the old gentleman's whim, that he has spent his labor on something that he is certain to need some day, which is more than can be said of the pursuits of all men. It may be hoped that in taking these measures for the care of his body which must perish he has not forgotten his soul which must live for ever. Otherwise his conduct is miserable folly (Psa. 49 : 12-15).

The Discovery of a Child Stolen by Gypsies fifteen years ago has gladdened a home in Michigan. It seems that in the year 1867 Mr. J. J. Bowers resided at Sandusky, Ohio. He had a well-loved daughter, Lilla, then three years old, who was suddenly lost. A thorough search was made for her, but without avail. Subsequently the family removed to Hudson, Mich., but inquiries continued to be made for the missing child, the father refusing to abandon hope until convinced of his daughter's death. Very recently he heard casually that a young woman about eighteen years of age was working at a farmhouse near Genoa, Ohio, having been placed there by the town authorities, who rescued her from a band of gypsies, who were suspected of having stolen her. Mrs. Bowers had no difficulty in identifying her child, though grown into a comely girl of eighteen, and she was taken home, to the delight of the whole family. How many whom Satan has lured away from God's family have come home through Him who came to seek and to save the lost, and have received a glad welcome, eternity alone will reveal. But as in this case the return results from the efforts of others, not of the victim (Luke 15 : 7).

Four Elephants were at Large at Midnight on August 3d in Troy, N. Y., and caused no little consternation in the city. After the exhibition of Barnum's show on Thursday the elephant "Emperor" broke away, and followed by three other elephants he went on an expedition through the city. Attracted by the bright lights burning in the Rensselaer Rail Mill he made his way to that building. The other elephants followed. Emperor entered, and as he roamed through the mill he stepped into the hot blooms and his forefeet were terribly burned. Goaded to madness with pain, the elephant rushed from the mill, and, reaching Jefferson Street, took the sidewalk. He was by this time furious with the pain in his feet and attacked several citizens whom he met, flinging them from his path with his trunk, breaking the ribs of some and crushing others against walls. A peddler's wagon in his way Emperor reduced to kindling wood in a few minutes. Finally he made his way into a cemetery, where he exercised himself in tearing up the headstones, and there he was captured and secured. The other elephants with him did little damage. Happily not many citizens were abroad at that hour or the loss of life would probably have been large. Those who were in that locality were amazed to see four huge elephants in mad career down the peaceful streets, and ran for their lives. There are curses in all our great cities more to be dreaded than the elephants were that night in Troy, and they do mischief far more irreparable, but men do not fly from them, because they do not realize their danger as they will do in the light of the last great day (1 Pet. 5 : 8).

TEACHING FOR THE OUTER AND INNER CIRCLES.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And with many such parables spake He the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. But without a parable spake He not unto them: and when they were alone, He expounded all things to His disciples."—Mark 4 : 33, 34.

Christ's Two Great Objects—Preaching to the Masses—Training Disciples—The Double Work of the Church—I. The Outside Gatherings—Preaching the Word—A Special Message—Simply Spoken—Modern Workmen with their Apparatus—A Man Whose Mind Needed Raising—Bullying Methods Futile—II. The Inner Circle—Christ Always Ready to Teach—Pentagonal Lozenges—Volumes that will not Match—The Arab's Magic Ointment—Christ the Ultimate Interpreter—The Way to Usefulness.

OUR blessed Lord had two great objects before Him in His ministry. The first was to preach the word to the outlying masses, that out of them He might gather a people to Himself who should be His disciples. This part of His work He carried on with great assiduity and perseverance, traversing the Holy Land from end to end and finding here one and there another, but never ceasing to preach the Gospel to the crowds that flocked to Him. His second object was to train those who became His disciples, that having gathered them to Himself He might educate them in the truth. He taught them concerning the Father and His love; concerning Himself, His work, His death, and His resurrection; and concerning the divine Comforter and His indwelling, and all else that would make for their progress and profit.

While our Lord was here He gathered the men together who should carry on the work after He was gone. He did not think it enough to make converts; He wished to make disciples. He did not think it enough even to make beginners in discipleship; but He would have them advance in knowledge and in holiness, learning till they were able to teach others also. To this day this same double work is carried on by the divine Spirit through the ministers and servants of God. We are to preach to the multitude who make up the outer ring; for our Lord has said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." That being done, however, the minister's work is only begun; for he is now to go on to expound the mystery, to open up the higher doctrine, to lead the disciplined ones into the deep things of God, that there may be in the church fathers, instructors, and leaders, and that the church may in all the generations yet to come, until the Lord Himself appeareth, carry out the glorious purposes of God for the upbuilding of a spiritual house and the conquest of the world.

I want this morning to call your special attention to the way in which the Lord spake to the outside gathering, and then afterward to the way in which He spake to the inner circle of His own disciples. From His conduct we may learn our own. Soul-winners and soul-helpers may here see their double work set before them in pattern.

I. First, let us study our Lord's conduct toward

THE OUTSIDE GATHERINGS.

Kindly read these verses: "And with many such parables spake He the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. But without a parable spake He not unto them." First, when our divine Lord preached to the outside multitude, He evermore spake "the word" to them. You see here what He preached: He spake "the word" unto them. This is a very short description, but it is intensely full of meaning; it has much more of fullness in it than I can show to you just now. He always spake "the word,"—that is to say, whatever sort of congregation gathered to Jesus He had only one grand system of truth to set before them.

It was a special message; not a word, but the word—the special speech of the Father. Jesus had received one weighty, all-important message from God, and this He delivered whenever He had opportunity. It was never His object when He was addressing the people to speak to them upon subjects of merely temporal interest; He preached the eternal word. He did not come to instruct them in geology, or astronomy, or jurisprudence, or politics; His one business was to win their souls by proclaiming the love and mercy of the Father. He did not even come to open up a fresh system of morals, though of necessity a system of morals grew out of His central teaching. He came to preach the Gospel, and He preached nothing else. He spoke it in various ways, yet He always spoke the one thing: "the word."

"He spake the word unto them," to publicans and harlots, or to Pharisees and Sadducees. He declares to the blinded Jews, "I speak that which I have seen with My Father." "He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God." What a lesson this is to all of us who try to do good in the world by teaching. We have only to preach "the word." Some fancy that they have to preach the thought, the deep thought, the wonderful thought of modern times. I have heard that expression, "modern thought," till I am sick of it; it is smelling strongly of self-conceit. There is no command given in Scripture for us to go and preach our own thoughts, but we are always commanded to preach "Christ," and to publish His word.

Our Lord's mind was thoughtful, His genius profound, and yet He kept to "the word," even as He said, "He that sent Me is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of Him." If He had pleased He might have told us many things hidden from before the foundation of the world; He might have opened up deep mysteries and profound secrets which He knew as the Son of God; for He is the wisdom of God; but instead of that He concentrated His ministry upon that which God had revealed, and He preached only "the word."

"The word" is an utterance from the mouth of God, and Jesus was God's mouth to men; all His teaching was the Father's word in one way or other. He confessed, "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself." He said also, "As My Father hath taught Me, I speak these things." "The word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent Me." Originality of doctrine finds no sanction in the Saviour's ministry; true ministers repeat what they are told, they do not fabricate for themselves; they are not spiders to spin a web out of their own bowels. Now, beloved brethren, let us remember this whenever we are trying to win a soul for Christ. Souls are won by "the word." It is the word of God that is "quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword;" it is "the word" which is "the living and incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth for ever." Therefore we must stick to "the word."

"Oh," say some, "there are many that have been sitting under the old-fashioned Gospel for years, and they are not converted." What do you propose to do? Do you propose to preach another Gospel? Look you, sir; if they were not saved by the truth they will not be saved by a lie. It seems practically to be conceded that during revivals you may get a little beyond the Gospel; when there is an excitement upon the people you may say things which are not strictly accurate, and you may set yourself right afterward, when the desirable effect has been produced. This will never do. Not so the Saviour; He spake "the word" unto them, whoever they might be, and He never altered that word.

We have not to excogitate from our own brain a salvation that will fit this sinner or that; God has given us already the salvation, and the doctrine, and the truth which will suit all sinners who will accept it. Your judgment and your careful thought will be wanted to select the fitting portion of truth; your heart will be wanted to pray over that portion that God may bless it; your responsibilities are still great; but happily you are delivered from the more tremendous task of

MANUFACTURING A GOSPEL.

I see the modern-thought workmen with their bellows full of wind, and their fire of very small coal. They are puffing away at a great rate. And now they take to hammering! See how the sparks fly; they are fashioning they know not what, neither do their people know what next they may forge upon the anvil. As for us, we invent nothing, but testify what we have seen and tasted and handled of the good word of God. God has promised that His word shall not return unto Him void, and therefore we feel sure of a happy issue.

Notice next, that our Saviour having no difficulty about His matter, but always speaking "the word," spake it simply. He never affected profundity or obscurity. Our Lord has said many things so deep that they are lower than the abyss, and He has spoken truths so high that they are higher than the highest heaven; but still He aimed at being understood. Some divines are like the cuttle-fish, which, when it descends into the sea, often opens its ink-bags, darkens the water, and hides itself from all observers. It cannot see itself amid the clouds which it purposely creates. Too many preachers are endowed with these darkening ink-bags. When they have simple truth to preach they surround it with an atmosphere of blackness, darkening counsel, and involving simplicity in mystery.

See how your children will read the parables of Jesus and remember them.

WHAT IS THE BEST BOOK

to put before a child when it is learning to read? Why, the New Testament; for if there be difficulties in the sense there are none in the words. What a multitude of monosyllables we have in John's Gospel! The Lord Jesus did not carry a gold pencil-case with Him, that whenever He met with a word of twelve syllables He might figure it down, and say, "That goes into next Sunday's sermon, and so the people will know what a superior person I am." No; but He looked about to find homely similes and instructive emblems, by which to make the truth plain as a pikestaff to those who wished to understand it. Of course the brightest light is lost on blind eyes; but Jesus never withheld that light. Let us learn from our Lord's example, and remember that we must do the work for those whom we would bless; we must make attention an easy matter for them by clearly setting forth the truth.

Dear brethren and sisters, when you are teaching others, take care that you yourself understand that which you would communicate. Whenever a man preaches so that you cannot understand him, the secret of it is that he does not understand himself; for if he knew what he meant to say he would, probably, be able to say it, and you would know what he meant by it; but he who is not clear in teaching in all probability does not know what he means. Therein full often lies his pretended wisdom; you, perhaps, look up and wonder at this superior man, when in fact he is an inferior man swollen out with pretence. It must be so. If he were better taught he would teach better. When a man has studied the subject so that he get a grip of it he is able to set it out to others; but when it passes over his head like a bird of the air, he has not seen it and cannot describe it, neither can any others learn from his language. Our Lord and Master taught in plainest words, and if His Gospel was hid, it was hidden only to the blind in heart.

I heard a gentleman once say that he found it very difficult to bring his mind down to the capacity of children; but the fact was that he had no mind of any consequence. He thought himself great, but this was

A CLEAR SIGN OF LITTLENESS.

He had something which he mistook for a mind, but it was an error on his part to talk of bringing it down; it needed raising up. Those who clearly know the truth of God will find children to be a congenial auditory. They will pick up similes as pigeons pick up seeds, and their little eyes sparkle as they catch your meaning. Therefore, "many such parables" let us speak unto them. If they do not always care for the moral, they are in this like the people to whom our Lord addressed Himself; but He put the truth in such a form that even if they did not care for it they cared for the picture in which He set it forth, and listened earnestly to His words, and so the truth was introduced to their minds.

Dear friends, notice again that our Lord spake considerately. "With many such parables spake He the word unto them, as they were able to hear it." What wisdom there is here: "As they were able to hear it." Some of us are not so considerate as we ought to be, and drench those to whom we would give drink. Our Lord was not too long in his discourses; He never wearied the people by a sermon till midnight, as Paul did. It is always better to send a congregation away longing than loathing. Our Lord knew that earnest attention involves effort, and tends to exhaustion. True hearing lays a strain upon the mind which cannot be over-long endured. None of us have more than a certain quantity of attention, and when we have used up that certain quantity, for us to hear more. He moderated the quantity, so that they might not be oppressed with too much.

He taught "as they were able to hear it;" that is to say, He did not puzzle them with deep doctrine when He wished to save them; for it is poor work to confound a man when you want to convert him. This Master Teacher gave forth such a quantity of truth as His auditors' hearts could take in, and the matter was so chosen as to be on the level of their comprehension.

As for His style, it was so pleasing that they who did not believe in Him nevertheless confessed that "Never man spake like this man." Oh, dear friends, if you want to be useful be careful to speak considerately. If you go into a sick chamber and the person says, "Would you read me the twenty-third Psalm?" do not bawl it out, but read in gentle tones suitable to the poor pained ear and weary brain. If you have to speak a word for Christ, let it drop like the gentle dew from heaven, and do not hurl it out like a hard driving hailstorm. You cannot bully a man to Christ; you will be wise never to attempt it. Load the camel as he is able to carry, and the mind as it is able to bear. Hearts are drawn not driven. We are not to teach as we are able to speak, but as the people are able to hear. We must not exhaust the hearer by our attempt to exhaust the subject. Never overdo a good thing, lest it be spoiled and rendered of none effect.

To conclude this matter: our Lord's address to the outside world was such that if they did not receive the truth the fault lay with themselves. It is true the mass of His hearers never saw beneath the surface, for they had no heart toward the truth, and so the parable did tend to their blindness; yet this was not the natural effect of His parable, but the misuse of it by slothful and carnal minds. Their foolish hearts were darkened. Jesus made truth so clear that their blear-eyes could not bear the light. The difficulty with them was that there were so few difficulties; the truth was hard because they were proud. Had they been taught of the Father they would have come to Jesus and delighted in the condescension which made all so plain; but their pride blinded them, even as He said, "How can ye believe that receive honor one of another?"

Oh that every worker here might say, "I have striven to commend the truth to every man's conscience in the sight of God." Let it be so plain that he may run that readeth it. It is better to speak five words which are understood than a thousand which merely dazzle the eye of the mind. Use earnest, hearty, entreating words. You cannot chill a man into grace. I do not believe that anybody ever rode to Christ on an iceberg; frost and winter play but little part in opening the flowers in the King's garden. If icicles hang from our lips we shall not melt men's hearts. Cold hearts must be thawed by the warm, genial influence of a sunlit soul. May heaven's light of love rest upon us. It will if we are taught of the Saviour.

And now, you that are outsiders, see what trouble the Saviour takes with you; for what He did for men of His age He does for men of every age: He longs that you should come to Him; He puts the truth so that you may see it, and He preaches it persuasively and affectionately. Alas, that men should require such trouble to be taken with them! If any one were giving away gold and silver he would not need to go down on his knees and entreat men to accept the precious metals;

but when we have to preach "the word," how must we entreat, implore, beseech men to come, or else they will not come at all; nor even when we have implored and besought will they lend a listening ear and a believing heart unless the arm of the Lord be revealed. See you this, ye outsiders; let the reflection of this make you ashamed, and cause you to resolve that now henceforth, having ears to hear, you will hear, and when Jesus pleads you will bow to Him.

II. Secondly, let us see how Jesus dealt with THE INNER CIRCLE when He addressed Himself to His own disciples: "And when they were alone, He expounded all things to His disciples."

Notice, first, then, that the Lord Jesus Christ opened up to them the inner meaning of the word. Never yet did a man desire to learn of Jesus whom Jesus refused to teach. When men did not want to learn He drew back, and did not force Himself on them. He kept the exposition of His own teaching for those who were prepared to receive it, and who really thirsted to obtain it: "When they were alone, He expounded all things to His disciples." Come now, dear friends, do we not wish to learn? If you desire to have all things expounded, note well that those to whom Christ expounded all things were His own disciples. You must become a disciple of Christ if you are to know Christ's truth. A disciple of Christ is one who accepts Christ as his teacher, and himself becomes a learner. A disciple, however, is more than that; he is one who receives Christ as his leader and Lord. If we are to be His disciples, we must do what He bids us, as well as believe what He tells us. Except we are willing to tread in His footsteps and follow His example we cannot be His disciples; and until we are such He will not expound all things unto us.

Do you want to understand the Scriptures? Do you long to understand the deep things of God, and the high mysteries of the Word? Then first become Christ's disciples. "If any man shall do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." The teaching of Christ is spirit and life. The rabbis taught the letter, but Christ teaches the life; and if we submit ourselves to Him to receive His life, and to make Him our way, He will then be to us the truth; but if we refuse Him, if we will not yield to Him, we shall remain in darkness with all the rest of the outer circle; hearing, we shall hear and not understand; seeing, we shall see and not perceive. Oh, my hearer, instead of trying to untie all knots and unravel all difficulties, yield thyself to Christ first of all. If thou wouldest know, believe and obey.

If we claim to be His disciples we must cultivate a desire to learn. No man in holy lore learns more than he is willing to be taught. Certain who call themselves disciples of Christ have no wish to learn, but they have a great wish to teach before they have learned anything. See the many who run away half-hatched, with the shell on their heads, and yet they try to crow. They cannot teach, and they will not learn. If they would wait a little, and be instructed, their time might come; but they are so hasty to fight that they will neither put on armor nor gird on a sword. Eager to give drink to the thirsty, they cannot spare time to fill the cup.

Observe how our Lord Jesus prompts His disciples to learn. When He has given them a parable He says,

"HAVE YE UNDERSTOOD all these things?" He comes near to them when the crowd has dispersed, and He says to them privately, "Have ye understood all these things? The crowd know nothing, but they are gone. They have been pleased with My parables, but they have not entered into the soul of My teaching. Have ye understood all these things?" Now, at the end of a discourse that is full of Christ, this is exactly what Jesus says to you and to me: "Have ye understood all these things?" Have ye entered into the essential truth, and not been content to lie sleeping on the doorstep of the mere letter of it? The Saviour wishes us to be inquisitive, searching into the meaning of "the word."

We are to be His disciples, and anxious to learn;

it follows in consequence that we must confess that we do not know. Many a man might have known if he had but been aware that he did not know. A sense of ignorance is the doorstep of the palace of wisdom. These men that needed to be instructed by Christ, and to have all things to be expounded to them, were the very pick of the saints; out of them came the apostles and the seventy disciples, and these formed the first course of living stones laid upon the foundation to build up a spiritual house; and yet these admirable persons needed that they should be alone with Jesus to have all things expounded to them.

Oh, brothers and sisters, let us not be so wickedly self-conceited as to fancy that we know everything. Are there not some who think that they carry the Gospel and all the doctrines of it in their pockets as if it were a five-sided lozenge? They have condensed the infinite into a pentagon. If any one knows more than they know he is denounced as a heretic, hopelessly unsound. Let it not be so with us, for we dare not boast of such perfect knowledge. What do we know, my brethren? If what we do know and what we do not know were put together there would be such a difference in the size of the volumes that they could not be bound to match.

I beg you to observe carefully that these folk whom Christ instructed in the inner sense had to be separated from the multitude. "When they were alone." When they had got together as birds of a feather should; when like sheep they were penned in the fold, then the Great Shepherd fed them, and not till then. Come ye out from the world if ye would learn the deep things of God. The more conformity to the world the more shall we abide in darkness. It is wonderful what light will come to a man when he learns to walk the separated path. There is a way which is narrow as a razor's edge, along which none can walk but those whom Christ upholds; but if they are willing to walk there in strict integrity, keeping themselves from the temptations of the world, and rising above the customs of society, then shall they know the mind of God. More than this, I will go beyond my text; if you and I wish to know the heart of our holy religion, we must get alone, even from the church, with Christ. This is the pith of it—they were alone with Christ. If they had been alone, and Jesus had not been there, they would have learned nothing; but they were alone with Him. Oh, brothers and sisters, let us practise more meditation. We are none of us as much alone as we ought to be in these busy days.

of the dervish who crossed his eyes with a magic ointment, and straightway, instead of the common house in which he lived, he saw a palace sparkling with diamonds, radiant with rubies, adorned with emeralds and gold. After such manner the Lord opens up to us a passage of Scripture, by anointing our eyes with eye-salve that we may see. What sights have we beheld in the word! We have been lost in wonder, love, and praise! But the Lord does this to us when we are alone with Him. "When they were alone, He expounded all things unto His disciples."

Now, brethren, I leave this part of the subject, and conclude when I notice that, in order to get this precious exposition from Christ, we must regard Him as being

THE ULTIMATE INTERPRETER.

"He expounded all things to His disciples." Those men had settled it in their hearts that they would believe whatever He said; His ipse dixit was to stand to them instead of argument; He Himself was to them the Word of God, the revelation of the Most High, the mystic glass into which they looked and saw truth in all its glory. When they were willing to have it so, they were instructed. The key of Scripture is Christ. The only infallible interpreter of "the word" is Jesus the word. Him we may follow in every case with the utmost safety.

I have heard of a wise man of whom they said in his biography, that to be acquainted with him was a liberal education; that if you went and stayed with him you might put all your books away, for he was a walking cyclopædia. I can hardly think that of any mere man, but I am sure it is true of Jesus. Communion with Him is illumination. He is that choicest book in the Christian's library which hath more teaching in it than all besides. The hem of Christ's garment is better than all the robes of philosophy. There is more to be learned from His footprints than from the profoundest reasoning of the most learned men. I commend to you, brethren, and to myself also, that we do continually sit at Jesus' feet.

Many defences of the Gospel have now been prepared, and we are thankful for them; but if you get to Christ Himself you do not need such protections. It is to me a work of supererogation when I read defences of inspiration and of the Gospel. Confirmed believers do not require them. I know the Gospel to be true. I am assured of it in my inmost soul. If anybody were to write a book about the excellences of my mother, and ask me to be a subscriber, I should say, "I know more about it than you do; I do not need to read, or listen to argument, I am quite beyond it, for I know her loving care for me." The love of Christ shed abroad in the heart is its own evidence.

Let us be earnest to get heavenly instruction from Christ, for then we shall be useful; and that is the end we aim at. If you do not know the inner truth what good can you do? Here you live in this world among blind men, and they say, "Lead us!" but if the blind lead the blind they shall both fall into the ditch. No, no; you must get your own eyes opened, and must know Christ and be known of Him, and then you can help the poor blind sinner, and you can guide him to Jesus. No one knows of what usefulness you will be capable when you have been taught of the Lord. God do so unto you, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

An Undergraduate's Surprise at a Christian companion's unconcern was described by a speaker at the recent Conference at Mildmay Park, London, by Mr. Stanley P. Smith, who, speaking of opportunities of Christian influence, said: "I shall never forget an instance that occurred to Mr. Stuart, who is with us to-day. He had a fellow-student at the University of Cambridge, in his own boat, that he could never bring himself to speak to, because he seemed so set against Christ and all thoughts of religion. Years afterward he met this man as a clergyman; he came up and said: 'Stuart, I could never make out how it was you would never speak to me about my soul.' Mr. Stuart told us what a lesson this was to him, how this man, was thinking all the time, 'Why does not Stuart speak to me about my soul?' I am quite sure we have all felt this; the glorious opportunities we have of speaking to men, and the small use we make of them."

An American Naval Officer Converted in London.—Mr. E. Trotter, speaking of the value of the Evangelistic meetings conducted in Exeter Hall, London, said at a recent meeting: "I met a fine-looking man in the Strand, and asked him in. He had been drinking heavily. He was an American officer of a ship. I said to him, 'Do come in.' He said, 'What is it?' I said, 'Come and see.' He entered and sat through the meeting, and I afterward went and spoke to him. 'Well,' he said, 'I will come again to-morrow night.' My heart was greatly drawn out to that man. I went out into the Strand with him, but very soon he was caught hold of and dragged away to sin. He told me afterward that that night he got worse than he ever was before. He went and drank again heavily. But he came the next night, though he said his promise was nothing to him, but the power of God brought him a second time. That man went back to Liverpool, where his ship was, and he wrote, 'When you first spoke to me you didn't know what a poor drunkard I was. I thought Jesus could not save me from the torrent of oaths that came out of my mouth.' He had said to me, 'You don't know what a temper I have got. I would knock a man down as soon as look at him.' I said, 'The Lord can keep you from that.' In his letters he says, 'It is quite true that the Lord has done that. He has filled my heart with joy.'"

ALEXANDRIA.

THE city destroyed by the combined exertions of the British fleet and the incendiaries of the Egyptian army was a very ancient city. Historians tell us that it was founded by Alexander the Great 332 years before the birth of Christ. Struck by the excellent situation of the land near Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, the Greek warrior summoned Dynocrates, the architect, and ordered him to build a city which should rival Tyre. In a few years the city was built and thickly peopled. Eight years after, Alexander had laid its foundation with pompous ceremonies, his embalmed body was brought from Asia in which was drawn through the principal streets, and a few days afterward the hero's remains were interred in splendid style by Ptolemy Lagos.

A description of this chariot presents a fair picture of ancient Alexandria in its glory, when its broad streets were filled with splendid pageants of soldiers; sumpter horses caparisoned in gold and scarlet cloths; elephants, camels and wild animals seized by hunters in the adjoining deserts. Alexander's funeral car rested on four massive wheels, all thickly gilded, and each hub bore the design of a lion's head worked in solid gold. Sixteen mules pulled the vehicle. Each wore a crown of gold, golden bells tinkled around their ears and from their caparisons; and the collars of the gaudy brutes were bejewelled with precious stones.

Reared high above the body of the chariot rose a gilded dome, the interior of which was decorated with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and lapis lazuli. In front of the chamber stood a peristyle with four Ionic pillars, and within the chamber were four pictures representing events of the dead hero's career. They portrayed him with his Macedonian guards, his trains of elephants and camels, his cavalry charging the Tartar hordes of Baetria or preparing to meet King Porus on the banks of the Indus, "The Father of Waters," and his war galleys preparing to annihilate the fleets of Persia. These pictures looked down upon an empty throne of gold, from the dome there hung a massive crown of gold, and beneath this symbol of power lay the Greek warrior embalmed in spices in a coffin of solid beaten gold. The sarcophagus said to have been used for Alexander found its way into the British Museum.

The city was shorn of much of its ancient beauty by Julius Cæsar, who destroyed the Egyptian fleet in the harbor, and the flames from the burning ships spread to the city, consuming many magnificent temples and palaces. At a later date another scene of destruction was witnessed in the city. The Roman Emperor Caracalla in A.D. 213 went to Alexandria, and there, for no apparent reason, issued general orders for

of the Egyptians. He sat on a throne in the temple of Serapis, whence he directed the slaughter of many thousand citizens. He cared nothing for the sacredness of any individual. He wanted to amuse himself by an indiscriminate slaughter. The streets of Alexandria ran with blood, and the tyrant in the temple of Serapis was delighted but not sated in his fury.

Eighty-three years later the Romans besieged the city, and destroyed the aqueducts which conveyed the water from the Nile to the inhabitants. This siege lasted eight months, and its surrender was followed by a massacre of the starving citizens, many thousands of whom were put to the edge of the sword.

When the Christian religion began to spread throughout the Roman Empire, many martyrs to the faith laid down their lives in Alexandria.

The Mohammedans were the next great scourge of Alexandria. Prominent among them was Amrou, the General of the Caliph Omar, who besieged the city and captured it after a siege of fourteen months, in which their losses reached an aggregate of 23,000 men. The magnificence of the city at that period may be learned from the letter in which Amrou described his conquest to his Caliph: "It contains," he wrote, "4000 palaces, 4000 baths, 400 theatres or places of amusement, 12,000 shops for the sale of vegetable food and 40,000 tributary Jews."

Amrou dismantled parts of the walls and towers but spared the people, and a mosque was erected on the spot where he had stayed the fury of his troops.

DESTRUCTION OF THE LIBRARY.

The most lamentable calamity which befel Alexandria during her occupation by the Caliph's viceroy was the barbaric destruction of her last remaining library, the greatest then in the world.

Philoponus, a Christian, whose conversation used to amuse Amrou in his leisure hours, asked for the library as a gift. Amrou was willing, but referred the matter to the bigoted Caliph, who ordered the library to be destroyed, on the comprehensive ground that "if these writings of the Greeks agree with the book of God they are useless and need not be preserved; if they disagree they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed." This doomed the library. Its books and manuscripts were given by Amrou to the flames, and it is said that it took the 4000 public baths of the city six months before they could consume them all in their furnaces. Omar's fiat struck a blow not only to the Alexandrians but to the whole world.

The next thrilling scene in the history of the city was its occupation by Napoleon. In 1798 Napoleon determined to land at Alexandria and thus balk Admiral Nelson, who was trying to find him. The French, numbering 4000, arrived at Alexandria at daybreak. Upon the sandy beach they met a few Arabs, who fired their matchlocks and then bolted into the city. Napoleon determined to follow their example. The Arabs and Turks could not resist the French attack. They were disposed to make a desperate resistance in the tortuous streets, when a Turkish captain mediated effectually and the fighting ceased. Napoleon now contemplated forming an administration in Alexandria in accordance with the manners and customs of the country. In the month of July he resolved to strike a blow at Cairo, and marched, after leaving 3000 men to look after Alexandria in his absence. But the French fleet was attacked and routed in the harbor by Lord Nelson, and Napoleon's career in Egypt abruptly terminated. Since that time the history of Alexandria has been dull and uninteresting. It has now again been brought into prominence by the thunder of the British guns.

A Gift Worth Fifteen Thousand Dollars was received recently in answer to prayer by Dr. Barnardo, the friend of the London street-wards. The expenses of the institutions under his charge in which the boys are cared for and educated cost as much as $500 a day, and a few weeks ago the contributions by which they are supported sank through some unexplained cause to $100 a day. Firmly convinced as Dr. Barnardo was that God would not suffer the boys to starve or the work to cease for want of means he could not watch the gradual draining of the treasury without concern, reflecting, as he did, that he was responsible for the food of the boys. The difficulty was made the subject of special prayer, and Dr. Barnardo thus describes the result: "A lady called on me, and said, 'I bring you some money because your doors are never closed to any poor child. Go on with your blessed work! God will surely help you!' and, to my astonishment, she placed in my hand a bank note worth $5000. I had heard of such things, but never before had an incident of this kind befallen me; I fairly gasped for breath, while wonder and gratitude struggled for expression. My visitor gave me, however, fresh cause for such feelings, as she added, 'And I rejoice to know that your children are kept free from the work-house badge or taint, and that you seek to bring them up in the fear of the Lord;' and then another note for $5000 was placed in my hand. I could only feel, though I dare not say it aloud then, 'O Lord, how wonderful are Thy ways!' and certainly this feeling was increased, to my utter bewilderment, when my visitor slowly took a third note for $5000 from her bag, and placed it in my hands! Declining to give her name or to accept a receipt, but assuring me that she was familiar with every detail of our work, my visitor, who was deeply moved while bestowing her generous help upon our work, turned quickly from me, and was gone before I was aware."

WEE DAVIE.

The Lesson of the Rod.

MY heart is sore as I write it; but wee Davie got ill. He began to refuse food, and nothing would please him. He became peevish and cross, so that he would hardly go to his father, except to kiss him with tearful cheeks, and then to stretch out his hands with a cry for his mother. His mother nursed him on her knee, rocked him, walked with him, and sang to him her own household lullabies.

What lessons of self-sacrificing love was she thus unconsciously taught by her little sufferer! Such lessons, indeed, as earth alone can afford—and so far it is a glorious school; for there are no sickbeds to watch, no sufferers to soothe, nor mourners to comfort, among the many mansions of our Father's house.

The physician, who was at last called in, pronounced it "a bad case—a very serious case." I forget the specific nature of the illness. The idea of danger to Davie had never entered the minds of his parents. The day on which William realized it, he was, as his fellow-workmen expressed it, "clean stupid." They saw him make mistakes he had never made before, and knew it could not be from "drink," yet could not guess the cause. "I maun gang hame!" was his only explanation, when, at three o'clock, he put on his coat and stalked out of the smithy, like one utterly indifferent as to what the consequences might be to ploughs or harrows, wheels or horse-shoes.

Taking an old fellow-workman aside, he whispered to him. "For auld friendship sake, Tam, tak charge this day o' my wark." He said no more. "What ails Willy?" asked his fellow-workmen in vain, as they all paused for a moment at their work and looked perplexed.

It was on the afternoon of the next day that "the minister" called. It must here be confessed that William was a rare attender of any church. The fact was, he had been hitherto rather sceptical in his tendencies; not that his doubts had ever assumed a systematic form, or were ever expressed in any determined or dogmatic manner; but he had read Tom Paine, associated the political rights of man with rebellion against old authorities, all of whom Thorburn thought had tyrannically denied them; and he had imbibed the idea at the old "philosophical" club, that ministers were the enemies of all progress, had no sympathy with the working classes, were slaves to the aristocracy, preached as a mere profession and only for their pay, and had, moreover, a large share of hypocrisy and humbug in them. The visit of Dr. Mc Gavin was, therefore, very unexpected.

When the doctor entered the house, after a courteous request to be allowed to do so—as it was always his principle that the poorest man was entitled to the same respect as the man of rank or riches—he said, "I have just heard from some of your neighbors, whom I have been visiting, that your child is seriously unwell, and I thought you would excuse my calling upon you to inquire for him."

William made him welcome and begged him to be seated. The call was specially acceptable to Jeanie. Old David, I should have mentioned, was "an elder" in a most worthy dissenting congregation, and his strong religious convictions and church views formed in his mind a chief objection to the marriage of his daughter with a man "who was not," as he said, "even a member of any kirk." Jeanie had often wished her husband to be more decided in what she herself cordially acknowledged to be a duty, and felt to be a comfort and a privilege. The visit of the doctor, whose character was well known and much esteemed, was therefore peculiarly welcome to her.

In a little while the doctor was standing beside the little bed of the sufferer, who was asleep, and gently touching wee Davie's hand, he said, in a quiet voice, to the smith, "My friend, I sincerely feel for you! I am myself a father, and have suffered losses in my family." At the word losses, William winced, and moved from his place as if he felt uneasy. The doctor quickly perceived it, and said, "I do not, of course, mean to express so rash and unkind an opinion as that you are to lose this very beautiful and interesting boy, but only to assure you how I am enabled from experience to understand your anxiety, and to sympathize with you and your wife." And noiselessly walking to the arm-chair near the fire, he there sat down, while William and Jeanie sat near him.

After hearing with patience and attention the account from Jeanie of the beginning and progress of the child's disease, he said, "Whatever happens, it is a comfort to know that our Father is acquainted with all you suffer, all you fear, and all you wish; and that Jesus Christ, our Brother, has a fellow-feeling with us in all our infirmities and trials."

"The Deity must know all," said William, with a softened voice, "He is infinitely great and incomprehensible."

"Yes," replied the minister; "God is so great, that He can attend to our smallest concerns; yet not so incomprehensible but that a father's heart can truly feel after Him, so as at least to find Him through His Son. Oh! what a comfort and strength the thought is to all men," continued the doctor "and ought to be to working men, and to you parents, especially with your dear child in sickness, that He who marks a sparrow fall, smitten by winter's cold, and who feeds the wild beasts, is acquainted with us, with our most secret affairs, so that even the hairs of our heads are numbered; that He who is the Father, almighty Maker of the heavens and the earth, knows the things which we need; that He has in us, individually, an interest which is incomprehensible, only because His love to us is so in its depth, for He so loved us that He spared not His own Son, but gave Him up to death for us all! It is this God who considers each of us, and weighs all His dealings toward us with a carefulness as great as if we alone existed in His universe, so that, as a father pitieth his children, He pitieth us, knowing our frames, and remembering that we are dust."

William bent his head, and was silent, while Jeanie listened with her whole soul. "It is not easy, minister," he at last said, "for hard-wrought and tired men to believe that."

"Nor for any man," replied the doctor. "I find it very difficult to believe it myself as a real thing, yet I know it to be true; and," he continued, in a low and affectionate voice, "perhaps we never could have known it or believed it at all, unless God had taught it to us by the life of His own Son, who came to reveal a father. But as I see Him taking up little children into His loving arms, when others would keep them away who did not understand what perfect love was, and as I see in such doings how love cannot but come down and meet the wants of its smallest and weakest object; and when I see all this love at last expressed in the giving up of His life for sinners, oh! it is then I learn in what consists the real greatness of God, 'whose name is Love!'"

"I believe wi' my heart," remarked the smith, "that no man ever loved as Jesus Christ did."

"But," said the doctor, "I see in this love of Christ more than the love of a good man merely; I see revealed in it the loving tenderness toward us and ours of that God whom no eye hath seen or can see, but whom the eye of the spirit, when taught of God, can perceive; for, as Jesus said, 'He who seeth Me, seeth the Father'."

"I believe a' ye say, doctor," said Jeanie, meekly. "I wadna like to keep my bairn frae Him, nor to rebel against His will, for it's aye richt; but, O sir, I hope, I hope, He will lift him up, and help us now as He did many distressed ones while on earth, by sparing ane that's just like a pair o' our ain hearts!"

"I hope," said the minister, "God will spare your boy. But you must trust Him, sincerely ask Him so to do, and commit your child into His hands without fear, and acquiesce in His doing toward you and your boy as He pleases."

"That is hard," remarked William.

"Hard!" mildly replied the doctor. "What would you choose else, had you the power of doing so, rather than acquiesce in the will of God? Would you trust your own heart, for instance, more than the heart of God? or, tell me, would you rather have your child's fate decided by any other on earth than by yourself?"

"No, for I know how to love the boy," was Jeanie's reply.

"But God loves him much more than you do; for he belongs to God, and was made by Him and for Him."

"I ken I am a waik woman, doctor, but I frankly say that I canna, no, I canna, thole the thocht o' parting wi' him!" said Jeanie, clasping her hands tightly.

"May God spare him to you, my friends!" replied the minister, "if it be for your good and his. But," he added, "there are worse things than death."

This remark, made in almost an under-voice, was followed by silence for a few moments. The minister's eyes were cast down as if in meditation or prayer.

"Death is hard enough!" said the smith.

"But hard chiefly as a sign of something worse," continued the doctor. "Pardon me for asking you such questions as these: What if your child grew up an enemy to you? What if he never returned your love? What if he never would trust you? What if he never would speak to you? What if he always disobeyed you? Would this not bring down your gray hairs with sorrow to the grave?"

"Eh! sir," said Jeanie, "that would be waur than death!"

"But excuse me, doctor, for just remarking," interrupted William, "that I never knew any child with a good parent, who would so act. I really don't think it possible that our ain wee Davie, even with our poor bringing up, would ever come to that. It would be so unnatural."

"God alone knows how that might be, Thorburn," said the doctor. "But there are many things more unnatural and dreadful even than that in this world. Listen to me kindly; for I sincerely thank you for having allowed one who is a stranger to speak so frankly to you, and for having heard me with such considerate patience."

"Oh, gang on, gang on, sir, I like to hear you," said Jeanie.

"Certainly," added the smith.

"Well then," said the minister, "I have no wish even to appear to find any fault with you at such a time. I am more disposed, believe me, to weep with you in your sorrow than to search your heart or life for sin. But I feel at such solemn times as these, most solemn to you and to your wife, that the voice of a Father is speaking to you in the rod, and it ought to be heard; that His hand is ministering discipline to you, and that you ought to give Him reverence, and be in subjection to the Father of our spirits that you may live; in order, therefore, that you may receive more strength and comfort in the end, let me beseech of you to consider candidly, after I leave you, whether you have perhaps not been acting toward your Father in heaven in the very way in which, did your child grow up and act toward you, would be reckoned by you both as a sorrow worse than death?"

"How could that be?" asked Jeanie, with a timid and inquiring look.

"You may discover how, my friends, if you honestly ask yourselves, Whether you have loved God your Father who has so loved you? Has there been cordial friendship, or the reverse, toward him? Confidence, or distrust? Disobedience, or rebellion? Communion in frank, believing, and affectionate prayer, or distant silence? I do not wish any reply to such questions now; but I desire you and myself, as loving fathers of our children, to ask whether we have felt and acted toward the best and most loving of Fathers, as we wish our children to feel and act toward ourselves?"

The doctor paused for a moment. Jeanie shook her head slowly, and the smith stared with her at the fire.

"By the grace of God," said Jeanie, in a whisper, "I hope I have."

"I hope so too," replied the minister, "but it does not come naturally to us."

"It's a fact," ejaculated the smith, thrusting his hands vehemently into his pockets; "it does not come naturally, in whatever way it comes, and yet it's desperate unnatural the want o't."

"Yes, Thorburn," replied the doctor, "it is very dreadful, but yet we have all sinned, and this is our sin of sins, that we have not known nor loved our Father, but have been forgetful of Him, strange, shy to Him; we have every one of us been cold, heartless, prodigal, disobedient children!"

Another short pause, and he then spoke on in the same quiet and loving voice:

"But whatever we are or have been, let us hope in God through Jesus Christ, or we perish! Every sinner is righteously doomed, but no man is doomed to be a sinner. God is our Father still, for He is in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses; and just as you both have nourished and cherished your dear boy, and have been loving him when he knew it not, nor could understand that great love in your hearts, which, sure am I, will never grow cold but in the grave, so has it been with God toward us. Open your hearts to His love, as you would open your eyes to the light which has been ever shining. Believe it as the grand reality, as you would have your boy open his heart to and believe in your own love, when he awakens from his sleep."

"Your love, as I have said, is deep, real to your boy, irrespective of his knowledge or return of it. But what is this to the love of God! 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and gave His Son to be a propitiation for our sins.' Let us, my friends, never rest till we are enabled in some degree to see and to appreciate such marvellous goodness, and to say, 'We have known and believed the love which God has to us.'"

"Dr. McGavin," said William, "you have spoken to me as no man ever did before, and you will believe me, I am sure, when I say that I respect you and myself too much to flatter you. But there is surely a meaning in my love to that boy which I never saw before! It begins to glimmer on me."

"Thank God if it does! But I do not speak to you, and this you must give me credit for, as if it were my profession only; I speak to you as a man, a father, and a brother, wishing you to share the good which God has given to me, and wishes you and all men to share. So I repeat it, that if we would only cherish toward God that simple confidence and hearty love—and seek to enjoy with Him that frank, cheerful communion which we wish our children to possess in relation to ourselves, we would experience a true regeneration, the important change from an estranged heart to a child's love."

"That would, indeed, be a Christianity worth having," said William.

"It would be," continued the doctor, "to share Christ's life; for what was the whole life of Jesus Christ save a life of this blessed, confiding, obedient, child-like sonship? Oh that we would learn of Him, and grow up in likeness to Him! But this ignorance of God is itself death. For if knowledge be life, spiritual ignorance is death."

"My good friends, I have been led to give you a regular sermon!" said the doctor, smiling; "but I really cannot help it. To use common, everyday language, I think our treatment of God has been shameful, unjust, and disgraceful on the part of men with reason, conscience, and heart! I do not express myself half so strongly as I feel. I am ashamed and disgusted with myself, and all the members of the human family, for what we feel, and for what we feel not, to such a Father. If it were not for what the one elder Brother was and did, the whole family would have been disgraced and ruined most righteously. But His is the name, and there is no other whereby we can be saved!"

"Doctor," said William, with a trembling voice, "the mind is dark, and the heart is hard!"

"The Spirit of God who is given with Christ can enlighten and soften both, my brother,"

"Thank ye, thank ye, from my heart," replied the smith. "I confess I have been very careless in going to the church, but—"

"We may talk of that again, if you allow me to return to-morrow. Yet," said the doctor, pointing to the child, "God in His mercy never leaves Himself without a witness. Look at your child, and listen to your own heart, and remember all I have said, and you will perhaps discover that though you tried it you could not fly from the Word of the Lord, should you even have fled from the Bible. A father's voice by a child has been preaching to you. Yes, Thorburn! when in love God gave you that child, He sent an eloquent missionary to your house to preach the Gospel of what our Father is to us, and what we as children ought to be to Him. Only listen to that sermon, and you will soon be prepared to listen to others."

THE WICKED HUSBANDMEN.

S. S. Lesson for August 20. Mark 12: 1-12. Golden Text, Ps. 118: 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Parables Used in Mercy—The Sorrow of God—The Degenerate Vine—A Trusted People—A Parallel Case—A Common Mistake—How to Become a Blessing to Others—God's Messengers—How are They Treated?—To whom does the Cause Belong?—The Lord and the Life of the Vineyard—Rationalism and Worldliness in League—The Falling of the Stone.

OUR Lord's last day of public ministry was come, and "He began to speak unto them by parables." This had frequently been His custom since the time when the scribes had said "He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth He out devils" (Mark 3: 22). When the disciples had said unto Him, "Why speakest Thou unto them in parables?" He had answered and said unto them, "Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath" (Matt. 13: 10-12). Jesus would not add to the condemnation of those who rejected Him, and in mercy He thus clothed His words, lest the wilful sin against the Holy Ghost should be repeated, and its fearful, irremediable consequence should come upon His hearers.

He said, "A certain man planted a vineyard, and set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the winefat, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country." Let us fill out the picture from another Scripture: "My wellbeloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: and He fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a winepress therein: and He looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes" (Isa. 5: 1, 2). O how touching is the sorrow of the heart of God when He mourns over Israel, "I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed; how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto Me?" (Jer. 2: 21.)

with His commission to be separated unto Him, "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. 7: 6; 14: 2). Therefore Israel was called upon to keep from idols, to make no unjust marriages (Deut. 7: 3-5); to eat no unclean things (Deut. 14: 3-21); to refrain from touching the dead (Num. 19: 11-13), to wear no garments of mixed materials (Lev. 19: 19), that there might be an outward witness of being set apart for God, to setting Him alone before their eyes, of eating for Him, drinking for Him, dressing for Him, consulting His will, not their own; in all these things; of being really cut off from all which was not of Him. He called for, looked for fruit of this vineyard, so fenced in, and so cared for, but only wild grapes were forthcoming. He had set husbandmen (the priests and Levites) over His vineyard, that they might render to Him the fruit which He expected, but they only ill-treated His messengers. When "they dwelt in their own land, they defiled it by their own way, and by their doings." Then God "scattered them among the heathen, and they were dispersed through the countries;" and what was the fruit which they then bore? "When they entered into the heathen whither they went, they profaned My holy name" (Ez. 37: 19, 20). "Israel is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself" (Hos. 10: 1).

Is there no parallel between their history and ours? Has not God called His people in the present day to be "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of Him who hath called you out of darkness into His marvellous light" (1 Pet. 2: 9)? Do the majority of believers answer to this description? There was in the early Christians a marked unlikeness to other people, their whole aim and therefore their habits of life, were different. That which the world lived for, i.e., temporal possessions, they did not even call their own; the disputes and differences which so much obtain in our day, were unknown to them, for they were "of one heart and of one soul" (Acts. 4: 31, 32). With them, eating and drinking was not for gluttony, but for the glory of God (1 Cor. 10: 31), with "gladness and singleness of heart" (Acis 2: 46). And that which was becoming in them is also becoming in us, and any other kind of life most unbecoming. God's promise to Abraham was, "I will bless thee . . ."

AND THOU SHALT BE A BLESSING"

(Gen. 12: 2). It was the design of God that through Abraham and his seed all the nations of the earth should be blest, but through unfaithfulness Israel became a curse, and not a blessing among the nations. God blesses us, that we may be channels of blessing to others, and all His dealings with us are as much with a view to others as to ourselves.

It is a common mistake that we are blest to others in proportion as we are bold in speaking to them; truly when it is done in obedience to the Holy Ghost it is an untold means of blessing, yet, when it is not done distinctly in the power of the Spirit it is unavailing. But the best way of becoming a blessing to others is to be fully blest ourselves. As we live in the very presence and in the power of God, others are, unconsciously to themselves and often unconsciously to us, brought nigh unto Him. "I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto Me" (John 12: 32). If we lift up ourselves, we may draw men unto us, but not unto God, but if we are full of Christ men will soon find it out and our contact with them will most surely bring them nigh to Him.

God has intended that His dealings with the house of Israel shall be a lesson of instruction to the whole world, for as He dealt with Israel in the past, so He deals now with all His children. The Lord continued, "And at the season He sent to the husbandmen a servant, that He might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard." God has servants as well as husbandmen, prophets as well as priests, evangelists as well as pastors and lecturers. The prophet comes direct from the presence of God, charged with His message, and he says to those who are in office: "Where is the fruit of the Lord's vineyard? I am come to gather it and bring it unto Him."

Nothing so proves what manner of spirit the pastor of a congregation has. A man starts up, who has never studied theology, never been ordained, possessing few credentials from man, but God is with him; he rouses the neighborhood, God gives him many souls. How stands the vicar or the minister of a large Nonconformist congregation to this work? Does he humble himself, and recognizing the Spirit of God at work, does he work with the evangelist, himself learning from him, at the same time giving useful hints? Or does he let jealousy take possession of him; does he try to hinder his people from being drawn away from him, without stopping to ask, "Has God sent this man to require fruit from His vineyard, which I have been too unfaithful to yield Him?" The husbandmen of the parable caught the Lord's servant, beat him, and sent him away empty.

Men who are specially sent of God to do a special work, and one which humbles and exasperates those who are unfaithful in office, are they who come in most largely for the blessing of persecution. "Again he sent unto them another servant; and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled. And again he sent another; and him they killed, and many others: beating some, and killing some." The Lord has not been weary, "All day long," He says, "I have stretched out My hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. 10: 21). "Having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours."

We wonder at the Jews, who could slay the Lord Jesus, even after all the proof of His Messiahship in the works which He had done among them; but self was their darling idol, they wanted the inheritance to be theirs. Are we free from this sin? When the elders of the Jews and the scribes sought to find fault with Jesus, and asked Him by what authority He did these things, it was as much as to say the prerogative of doing these works was theirs, and that He was usurping their right. And every particle of jealousy which exists between rival sects, churches, missions, individuals, is just the same thing. All party spirit says, "Get Christ out of the way, this is

'OUR CAUSE.'

God sends unto us His Son. To make room for Him, every "cause" must disappear but His cause. With Him there is but one church, His body, one spirit, His Spirit, and every breath of self is a usurpation of His inheritance. We have heard of a certain mission where a voluntary lady helper was rebuked for visiting a poor sick man, needing spiritual succor, and who much wished to see her, because she was not authorized distinctly to visit that individual case by the lady at the head of the mission. This is as much as to say, "This is our mission, not Christ's; we will not have the Spirit of God here, because where He is there is liberty, and here we must have everything proceeding from us, not from Christ." When the heart is surrendered to Jesus, there is no more mine or thine, all is His.

What awful robbery of God it is for us to claim as ours that which is really God's property; to take His vineyard, the souls He bought, and act as though we had any right except to serve them in the humblest way as His instruments. How was the son treated? "They took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard" The vineyard without the Vine, what an anomaly! and yet this is what we see, churches without Christ, ministers teaching souls which are not saved. "I am the true Vine and My Father is the husbandman" (John 15: 1). Jesus is both the Lord and the Life of the vineyard, and

JESUS IS CAST OUT!

"What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do? He will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others." These words have been fulfilled, the branches of the olive tree have been broken off, the kingdom of God is taken from the Jews, and given to them who shall yield the fruits thereof (Matt. 21: 43). But the times of the Gentiles are nearly fulfilled, the Jews are rising into prominence again, they will soon look upon Him whom they have pierced, and even now God is requiring of the Gentile Church the fruit of His vineyard. And it is in this very day that men are casting out the Son; the rationalism, the superstition, the worldlings of our times all join to cast out the Son of God, to make men think they can be independent of Him.

But God has still a word to say: "Have ye not read this Scripture; The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner: this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?" In the Gospel of Matthew He added, "And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder" (Matt. 21: 44). Men may reject Jesus, but He is nevertheless the foundation of all God's building, whether in the church or in the individual. Man has no power to keep Him out. Blessed are they who fall on this stone and are broken, whose heart, and will, and self are broken; but O how terrible for those on whom Jesus shall fall in judgment, "it will grind him to powder." They are terrible words and, whatever they mean, certain destruction is implied by them. God teach us the great lesson of this parable, as stewards of God, to give God His place, to give God His rights; in our family, our church, our work, or in the world, yielding up ourselves to Him, that He may work out His will in us, and by us, in His own way, as full and complete proprietor.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Lull in the War Operations in Egypt has occurred. The British are awaiting reinforcements and Arabi Pacha is apparently determined to act on the defensive. Several reconnoissances of Arabi's position have been made from the British ranks, but without discovering the number of the troops he has at command. Unimportant skirmishing goes on from day to day, in which Arabi's troops display coolness and courage. Arabi is said to be still parleying with the Khédive, who has informed him that no terms will be acceptable except unconditional surrender. Midshipman De Chair, of the iron-clad Alexandria, who was sent to Ramleh on July 29th on horseback with a message, did not return. He strayed beyond the lines and was taken prisoner by Arabi's troops, who fired on a detachment sent to search for him. It was afterward learned from an official telegram that the midshipman was taken before Arabi Pacha, who ordered him to be sent to Cairo and to be well treated, comfortably lodged, and allowed to write to his relatives. The Khédive despatched a native emissary to the camp of Arabi Pacha for the purpose of procuring the release of Midshipman De Chair, but he did not return. In a reconnoissance made on August 5th the British lost six killed and 51 wounded; among the former was Lieutenant Vyse, an able officer much lamented. The British withdrew in good order after the engagement without accomplishing anything. There are troops enough in Alexandria to hold the city against an attack by Arabi Pacha, though not enough to drive him back to Cairo. Arabi has organized a committee of five officers in Cairo to prepare for the national defence, and he has arrested peaceful natives who have been charged with lukewarmness in his cause.

The Occupation of Suez by the British Forces took place on August 1st. At the same time British ironclads took up strong positions on the canal at Port Said, at Ismailia and at Suez. All Europeans have left Suez, and all the French men-of-war except four left Egyptian waters. M. de Lesseps, who has made himself an amateur guardian of the canal and who works in conjunction with Arabi, telegraphed to Paris that he had made no protest against the entrance of British men-of-war into the Suez Canal, but had notified the Sultan of Turkey of Admiral Seymour's action. He declares that it is in no danger from Arabi Pacha, who, he says, has already given numerous proofs of humanity. M. de Lesseps does not mention the burning and pillage of Alexandria as one of those proofs. He contends that British occupation of the canal will only compromise it by affording Arabi Pacha an example for violation of its neutrality.

Diplomatic Complications of a Serious Nature have arisen at the international conference at Constantinople owing to Russia assuming an attitude hostile to England in the Egyptian embroglio. A correspondent of the New York Herald at St. Petersburg says that "there is no longer any doubt that a divergence of views exists between England and Russia, which is exercising a very prejudicial influence upon all attempts to harmonize English action in Egypt with the legitimate rights and wishes of the Powers. It is not unlikely that this divergence will lead to a break up of the conference at an early date without any tangible result." Russia is evidently under the impression that England intends to take possession of Egypt, and is determined to oppose any such scheme unless she secures for herself an equivalent in European Turkey; she is therefore encouraging Turkey to resist the British advance in Egypt. Turkey under Russian tutelage proclaims herself ready to despatch troops to Egypt, but England insists that before doing so she shall take a decided stand toward Arabi by declaring him a rebel; or it may happen that when Turkish troops land they will join Arabi's forces and fight against England. The Porte, replying to the demand of England, states that such a proclamation can only be issued according to the exigencies of the situation and after the arrival of Ottoman troops in Egypt. Orders have therefore been given to Admiral Seymour to oppose the landing of Turkish troops, and to conduct the Turkish ships back to Constantinople should they appear in Egyptian waters before the Sultan has declared his hostility to Arabi. The English Government have been led to this decision by the discovery of documentary proofs of Turkish complicity with Arabi since the burning of Alexandria. Should a conflict between England and Turkey occur through Russia's instigation, the disappearance of Turkey as a European Power would be only a question of a few weeks. Turkey owes its existence only to Russia's fear of England, which once allayed, Turkey would soon fall into the clutch of the Bear.

The Important Alterations Made by the British House of Lords in the bill for the relief of the Irish tenants from their arrears of rent have caused the Cabinet some embarrassment. When the amended bill was sent back to the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone moved that the consideration of the Peers' amendments should be deferred, as he did not wish to do anything precipitately before arriving at what might be a momentous decision. British journals are not sanguine of harmonious action between the two Houses. The Daily News says: "It is stated in conservative circles that the House of Lords will receive the full support of the conservatives in the House of Commons in maintaining the amendments to the Arrears Bill." The Standard believes that the Cabinet ministers decided to advise the House of Commons to reject both the amendments to the Arrears Bill adopted by the House of Lords. In Parliamentary circles the prospect of a settlement of the difference between the two houses is regarded as hopeless.

Discouraging Reports of the Agricultural prospects in Ireland are received. It will be a most serious circumstance if the present political situation, with its accompanying disturbances, is complicated by a failure of the harvest. The London Times correspondent in Ireland considers the outlook as being far from reassuring, for speaking of the probable failure of the harvest in Ireland he says: "It is to be hoped that these fears will not be realized, as the recurrence of another bad season in the present demoralized and lawless state of many parts of the country, with troubles and complications at home and abroad, of which full advantage would be taken to intensify discontent and disaffection, would be far more calamitous than at the commencement of the revolutionary movement."

The New Law for the Repression of Crime in Ireland is now in operation. The first arrest under its provisions was made on July 16th, when a young man named John Sullivan, a laborer, was arrested at Tralee. He was heard threatening a farmer that if he did not give him money he would have him settled. He was at once lodged in jail. Several arrests have also been made under the clause which enables the police to arrest suspicious persons who are out after sunset. Under another clause two criminal cases were on July 18th removed from Galway to Dublin for trial. Indeed the act, according to the Dublin correspondent of the London Times, is being administered with severity and vigor. The lord-lieutenant has taken care to obtain the services of the most energetic officers in every department. The appointment of special magistrates has created considerable jealousy among the resident magistrates, several of whom have resigned their offices. Efforts are being made to induce law-abiding people to submit cheerfully to the irritating restrictions of the act, which, though directed against criminals, curtails also the liberty of peaceable citizens.

A Financial Crisis in Odessa has been Caused by the Jewish persecution. In consequence of the alarming development of the anti-Jewish disturbances this year, says the Jewish World, the well-known bank of Ignace Ephrussi & Co., of Odessa, has terminated its financial operations in Russia. At the end of last month its doors were closed, Messrs. Ephrussi announcing their intention to transfer their business to Vienna and Paris. This is the most serious economical injury resulting from the anti-Jewish movement yet chronicled. Messrs. Ephrussi were the Rothschilds of South Russia, and since 1832 have been the principal factors in the trade and welfare of that region. Their banking establishment was the oldest and most important in Odessa, and their transaction involved annually several hundreds of millions of roubles. The immediate result of the retirement of Messrs. Ephrussi was a crisis in the discount market. It is just now the practice in South Russia to discount a large number of short bills for farmers in view of the approaching harvest; the withdrawal of Messrs. Ephrussi's capital all but paralyzed such operations.

Cetewayo, the Captive King of the Zulus, has been permitted to visit England, where his rival has caused a social sensation. Cetewayo, who seems to have kept himself posted on the affairs of Zululand, expresses confident hopes that the troubles now agitating that country will lead to his restoration.

The Cabinet to Succeed that of M. de Freycinet in France has not yet been formed. The political situation is so complicated, owing to the radical division of parties, that the formation of a strong ministry appears hopeless. During the debate on the policy of France in Egypt which ended in the overthrow of the De Freycinet cabinet, an important speech was made by M. Clemenceau who made a fierce onslaught on the tactics of the comptrollers. He said French influence should be maintained by merchants, professors, doctors, even lawyers, not by placemen whose enormous salaries are a scandal. That influence, moreover, was much greater when Frenchmen were far less numerous and had not seized on the government of the country. The interests of the bondholder were not worth one drop of blood. The Egyptian financial system was thoroughly bad, for under the Europeans paid no taxes, the fellah bearing the whole burden of them. In speaking of the Khédive's loans and of the mode in which they were issued and spent he professed his sympathy with the Egyptians, who protest against a yearly expenditure of $1,900,000 on European "dominators."

The Wesleyan Methodists of Great Britain commenced their annual conference on Tuesday, July 18th. Dr. Warren attended as the delegate from the Methodist Episcopal churches of America. Rev. C. Garrett is the newly elected president of the conference. He is fifty-seven years of age and has been a total abstainer since he was fifteen. In his inaugural address to the conference Mr. Garrett said that the past year had been a great spiritual success without sensational means, and hoped that the coming year would be still more successful. He considered that the Ecumenical Conference had done good in drawing the different Methodist denominations nearer together, and it would be his endeavor to promote such union and friendly feeling.

Another Arrest of Nihilists has Taken Place in Russia in consequence of revelations made by the imprisoned Nihilist Kyrilloff, who has disclosed a long list of newly planned crimes against the Emperor and certain high officials. Immediately after his revelations the imperial prosecutor accompanied Count Tolstoi, the Minister of the Interior to the imperial palace of Peterhoff, where a long council was held in the presence of the Czar, in consequence of which the prisoners are better treated.

Rev. ERNEST R. WILBERFORCE, D.D.—Scene at his Consecration as Bishop of Newcastle, Eng.

REV. DR. E. R. WILBERFORCE, THE BISHOP OF NEWCASTLE, ENG.

THE appointment of bishops in the Episcopal Church of England is nominally vested in the Queen, as the head of that church, but as she follows the advice of the Premier for the time being, to that statesman belongs the actual responsibility of selecting from among the clergymen of the church a suitable man to occupy a vacant seat on the Episcopal bench. In bygone years some of these selections were very unhappy. The statesman did not always select a clergyman on account of his suitability for episcopal work, but rather because he had a friend in the church to whom a snug sinecure would be welcome, or because he wanted a man in the House of Lords who would be an active supporter of his party. As most of the bishoprics give the occupant the right to sit and vote in the House of Lords, the political opinions of aspirants for the position were of greater consequence than their piety or learning. Latterly, however, a welcome change has come in these matters. A bishopric is no longer regarded as a sinecure; and appointments have been made for other than political or personal motives. This was particularly noteworthy in the case of Lord Beaconsfield, who it might have been expected would have made many mistakes in this important duty. But his appointments commanded the approval of the public and the church. Mr. Gladstone has not been so wise in his selections, but in appointing Dr. Wilberforce to the newly created See of Newcastle he has shown more wisdom than is usual with him.

Fifty years ago the Bishopric of Durham was considered the wealthiest and best endowed Episcopal See in England, and its occupant a sort of Prince Bishop. The occupant of the position held a social rank and political influence second among English bishops, immediately following the Bishop of London, and preceding the Bishop of Winchester. But owing to the recent division of the great Northern diocese, the income, which used to be $175,000, has been reduced to $40,000 per annum, and the county of Northumberland has been formed into a new diocese, with Newcastle-on-Tyne as the cathedral city, and St. Nicholas Church, an ancient edifice which was erected five hundred and fifty years ago, is to be the new cathedral. It occupies a site on which for nearly a thousand years a Christian church has stood, and when the building upon it has been destroyed by fire or social disturbance another church has been built in the same place. The Rev. Dr. Ernest Roland Wilberforce was consecrated in Durham Cathedral, on July 25th, as the first bishop of the new diocese. (Our frontispiece depicts the ceremony.)

Ernest Roland, the second surviving son of the late estimable Bishop Wilberforce, who was Bishop of Oxford and afterward Bishop of Winchester, and younger brother of Canon Basil Wilberforce, of Southampton, the eminent total abstinence advocate, was born at Brightstone, in the Isle of Wight, on January 22d, 1840. Having received his ordinary preliminary education at Harrow, he was transferred to Exeter College, Oxford University, where he graduated M.A., in 1865. Having determined to enter the ministry of the Church of England, he was ordained deacon by his father in 1864, and priest a year later, and lived with him in the episcopal palace of Cuddesdon as his domestic chaplain. He was also for about four years curate of Cuddesdon, where his ministry was most useful.

In 1863 he married Frances, third daughter of Sir C. Anderson, and three years afterward he became rector of Middleton Stony in Oxfordshire; but in 1870 he resigned the living, where he had been both useful and happy, in consequence of the death of his wife, and subsequently devoted himself wholly to his father, rendering great aid to him in the administration of the See of Winchester, until the death of the amiable Bishop in 1873.

HIS WORK IN THE NORTH.

In the autumn of 1873 he was instituted to the vicarage of Seaforth, a large, populous town parish near Liverpool, with a small endowment, accepting the charge in deference to the cordially-expressed wishes of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, who, as private patron, was most desirous of securing his services. More than one other valuable preferment was offered to him about the same time in various districts of London; but he had determined in the unfailing might of his Divine Lord to throw himself into his work at Seaforth, although it was a difficult field, which seemed outwardly to have nothing to recommend it.

The previous incumbent had been vicar for fifty-four years, and was not very popular with a certain section of the parishioners. Some prejudice was felt toward him on account of the name he bore, but little by little prejudice melted away, as people discovered he was not the man they had made up their minds he was to be, for they found him a large-hearted, earnest, uncompromising Churchman, who would not disagree with any one if he could help it, a genuine man, utterly devoid of eccentricities and littlenesses, which so often foment strife and hinder usefulness among the followers of Christ.

THE SUCCESS OF HIS UNDERTAKINGS.

As soon as he was understood, Mr. Wilberforce was warmly appreciated, and a host of friends surrounded him, who, with open-handed liberality were prepared to support him in whatever he wished to undertake for the good of the people. A new machinery for parochial organization, of an elaborate and comprehensive character, sprang up immediately, and prospered. The church as it stood was restored internally, and subsequently it was enlarged to meet the growing necessities. One landowner, who had been won by the genial manliness and moderation of the new vicar, built some splendid new schools, which were much needed, at a cost of $30,000.

After Mr. Wilberforce had resided about a year at Seaforth, he married Emily, only daughter of the Rev. George Connor, Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen; and when he brought home his bride the reception they met with from all classes showed how firmly he had established himself in the affections of his parishioners. In this year of most useful work embracing the confessed advocates of moderation as well as total abstainers, to which latter section he himself conscientiously and tenaciously belonged; and ever since that day he has been known throughout the land as one of the ablest speakers on that great question; not, however, unwisely exalting total abstinence into a religion for the people, or otherwise provoking the hostility of non-abstaining Christians. He was also mainly instrumental in forming a Diocesan Temperance Society, which is now one of the largest in England.

HE FOUNDED A TEMPERANCE SOCIETY,

About the same time also he originated a Clerical Society for the study of the Greek Testament, and for discussing subjects of practical interest to the parochial clergy—giving ample proof, in this instance likewise, of sound judgment, and of a conciliatory and charitable spirit.

NUMEROUS PUBLIC ENGAGEMENTS.

The marvel was that he got through such a vast amount of absorbing and distracting work. Diligent as the minister of his own parish, he yet found time to take a leading part in the great movements of the time—speaking in large towns and at Church Congresses, and preaching in many of the Cathedrals in England, as well as in those of Edinburgh and Dublin. In 1877, by invitation of the Archbishop, he preached in St. Paul's London, on the occasion of the anniversary of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy; and the sermon, which was afterward published, was described at the customary Mansion House banquet by the Prime as "magnificent." In Westminster Abbey, as well as in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, he preached to vast congregations, bringing back each occasion to the remembrance of his spellbound hearers a striking resemblance to the eloquence his distinguished father. He has also frequently preached at the request of Queen Victoria in Private Chapel, at Windsor, where the royal fan and the troop of German visitors the Queen entertains attend when at Windsor.

But the inevitable time drew near when he was to be removed from Seaforth, where he had gained much valuable experience, and had perfected his self in the difficult art of winning the confidence of hard-headed men of business, and of conciliating opponents without surrender of principle. Great was the consternation when tidings reached parishioners that their vicar was really about to leave them—for to many of their souls he had proved the instrumentality of blessing. Testimonials and other tokens of unfeigned regard were lavishly poured in upon him and Mrs. Wilberforce who had done so much to help him in his ministerial work.

APPOINTED CANON IN WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

In October, 1878, he was appointed to a canonry in Winchester Cathedral, in which his father had also held a stall when he was Archdeacon of Sarum. The offer of this promotion must have come upon Mr. Wilberforce quite unexpectedly after long a severance from the diocese, but circumstances seemed to point to him as eminently fitted to fill the vacant office. His name, his power of preaching, his remarkable energy, his special aptitude for work among those who were alienated from the church, recommended him to the Bishop of Winchester, who at the moment was inaugurating a scheme of home-missions to the seaport and garrison towns in Hampshire. The canonry was accepted on the condition that he should not only be allowed to superintend the work, but that he should also himself take an active part in the labors of several missions. Into this movement he threw his whole heart—preaching on its behalf continually and going down from time to time into the midst of the neglected masses, and speaking to those who hardly knew the face of a minister of the Gospel with singular power and success.

THE NEW BISHOPRIC.

The announcement that Canon E. R. Wilberforce was to be the first Bishop of Newcastle-on-Tyne, which was made a few weeks ago, seems to have caused general surprise in England, popular conjecture having in this case fastened upon every name but the right one. But considering the fact that he is already to be ranked with the most distinguished of the clergy as a preacher and public speaker, and that there are few to surpass him in force of character and in his love of hard work in the service of Christ, his elevation can only be the subject of the sincerest congratulation, combined with hearty gratitude and prayerful hope. His duties of his new diocese will try his powers to the utmost, and perhaps, may give him an opportunity of doing a nobler work than any to which he has yet been called. From the peaceful comfort of a quiet cathedral city in the south, to the rough, strong colliers of the north, will be an immense change; but the Wilberforce family have always shown themselves ready and able to endure hardship in a good cause, and have not yielded to the seductions of ease and luxury.

At Seaforth, Canon Wilberforce won the affection and sympathy of those employed in commerce; at Winchester his quiet strength and general charity have won golden opinions. For his future work in the great northern diocese it will be of inestimable advantage that he has not spent his entire life in a college, or in a cathedral city, but acted for many years as his father's chaplain and secretary; from him, if from any one, the new bishop should have learned the secret of successful organization and administrative work. Among the pitmen of Northumberland he may do great things if they are rough, but when their confidence is won their loyalty and enthusiasm are boundless. To win them he must go as a Christian man and brother more than as a bishop.

A journal published in the locality in which Dr. Wilberforce has long labored, commenting on the appointment, says: "Canon Wilberforce has been recognized as a living power amongst us, and his place will not be easily filled when he is taken from us. But those who have had the best opportunities of knowing him thoroughly will be the first to acknowledge the wisdom of those who are in authority in making this selection. For the new Bishop of Newcastle is not to be called to a life of easy dignity, nor is it every learned theologian or every gifted preacher who would discharge the duties of that bishopric satisfactorily. A man is wanted there in the full burst of manhood, ready to endure hardship and to give himself, mind and body, to genuine toil among the rougher elements of our social system, and we are much mistaken if this is not the main purpose in the heart of Canon Wilberforce in accepting this arduous post. He leaves the comparative comfort of the stall at Winchester, with all its pleasant surroundings, for a real life Mission, for a higher work than ever his has been."

THE JEWS IN JERUSALEM.

From a Narrative of a Journey to the Holy Land furnished to the Christian Herald by Sir Moses Montefiore, Bart.

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE, the eminent Jewish philanthropist, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 9th, 1882, has sent us a copy of a portion of his journal describing his last visit to Jerusalem in 1875. He undertook this journey on hearing of the deplorable condition of the Jews who had settled in the land of their fathers.

Sir Moses commenced his journey on June 15th, 1875, travelling by easy stages which his advanced age (ninety-one years), rendered necessary. He arrived at Jaffa on July 13th and thence proceeded to Jerusalem, inspecting on his way the progress of various enterprises he and other philanthropists had previously inaugurated.

"At five o'clock in the morning of July 23d," says Sir Moses, "we were already saluted by friends who had anticipated our approach, and, half an hour afterward, we halted at the spot whence a full view might be had of the Holy City."

"As we now continued moving toward Jerusalem, I did nothing but look right and left to see the number of new houses; some of them very large buildings, and the mouths of friends did not rest from telling us, 'This is a house belonging to one of us;' 'That piece of ground has been bought by one of our community;' and as we still further proceeded, there was no necessity any more to inform us of the name of any proprietor, as the whole family of the occupants came out of their houses, and I had the happiness of myself seeing hundreds of our brethren lining the fronts of their dwellings."

"Proceeding a little farther on the road, a new synagogue was shown to me, it was surrounded by a number of houses, occupied, I was told, by fifty families. Again, a plot of ground was pointed out to me belonging to a party intending to build thereon sixty houses. And when coming near the Upper Gikhon pool, not far from the windmill which I caused to be built eighteen years ago, my attention was directed to two other windmills recently built, which, I was told, gave a good profit to the Greeks who owned them."

"Great was my delight when I considered that but a few years had passed since the time when not one Jewish family was living outside the gate of Jerusalem—not a single house to be seen, and now I beheld almost a new Jerusalem springing up, with buildings some of them as fine as any in Europe. 'Surely,' I exclaimed, 'we are approaching the time to witness the realization of God's hallowed promises unto Zion: "I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations" (Isa. 60 : 15).'

"When my carriage reached the Jaffa Gate I was obliged to alight. Neither the streets nor the pavements in Jerusalem, the driver observed, are yet prepared for carriages. Not having given any information of the time of my intended arrival, my friends did not order a sedan chair to be in readiness for me, so it was rather a difficult and somewhat painful task to walk along the streets to the house prepared for my reception. I had still to ascend a number of steps before I reached the terrace, but only a few minutes were required to take me into my apartments."

"I had some conversation on the subject of general drainage in Jerusalem with a gentleman of authority; he told me that all the refuse of the city is now carried into the pool of Bethesda, which, strange to say, I was informed is close to the house intended for the barracks, and the soldiers living therein appear not to experience the least inconvenience on account of its vicinity. If arrangements were to be made to clear that pool entirely, to admit pure water only, and to dig special pools for the purpose of conducting there the city drains Jerusalem might become free from any threatening epidemic. All the doctors in Jerusalem assured me that the Holy City might be reckoned, on account of the purity of the atmosphere, as one of the healthiest places."

"I then proceeded to the synagogue, and was there most agreeably surprised with the magnificent appearance of that noble edifice. Its style of architecture is somewhat similar to that of the German synagogue, 'Beth Yaacob.' It is one hundred feet high from the floor to the cupola; contains a number of communal offices, a college for the study of the Holy Law, and in an adjoining building also a public bath."

"I was received on entering the synagogue by the representatives of the congregation and their President, Mr. Nissan Bak, and met there many esteemed friends, the Rev. Haham Bashi, the Rev. Meyer Auerbach, and the Rev. Samuel Salaub. The synagogue was brilliantly illuminated, presenting a most pleasing sight of the circular gallery under the cupola occupied by a number of ladies in their best holiday attire, and a crowded community of devout brethren in every part of the building. Hymns and psalms, the former specially composed for the occasion, were beautifully recited; and the Rev. Elia Sarahson delivered an excellent discourse. Prayers were then offered up for the Turkish, English and Austrian sovereigns; for the spiritual heads of the congregations in London and Jerusalem; for the speedy restoration to health of the Baroness Meyer de Rothschild and Sir Anthony de Rothschild."

"I was told that the whole of the noble edifice had been built by the hands of Jews; every kind of work, it was further observed, a glazier or an embroiderer, a goldsmith or an engraver, all had been done by the Jews in Jerusalem. I noticed some beautiful silver ornaments for the Sepharin, specially a large massive silver crown, and when I inquired where it had been made, the man himself who had done the work was introduced to me. The synagogue was full in every corner, but owing to the proper arrangements no inconvenience had been felt. On leaving the synagogue we entered a small room, where refreshments were handed round, and we drank to the prosperity of Jerusalem."

"Friday (13th August), I proceeded to the Western Wall to offer up the customary prayers. The road leading to that hallowed spot, and the houses in its vicinity are still in a state of ruin, causing man and horse to stumble over detached fragments of ancient structures, and remind the pilgrim that a great deal of work has yet to be done before the paths of Zion will be even and smooth."

"When I visited Jerusalem in the year 1866, I exerted myself very much to have an awning made in front of the Western Wall. I had already made an agreement for the execution of the work, but unexpectedly some obstacle occurred which could not be surmounted, and the matter dropped. A gentleman recently tried to place there some seats for the accommodation of the numerous visitors arriving daily at that spot, and, not succeeding in his endeavors, he asked permission to have at least a number of large marble stones placed there, and was allowed to do so. But they did not remain in the place assigned to them; first one stone was removed, then another, until at last all of them disappeared."

Sir Moses Montefiore remained in Jerusalem

until August 20th directing improvements, making inquiry as to the condition and prospects of the people, their disposition and ability, and willingness to work, and as to the prospects of their being able to maintain themselves if capital were supplied to establish enterprises in which they might engage. The following are the conclusions at which the aged philanthropist arrived after making his personal examination:

"In concluding this narrative I feel it my pleasing duty to inform all the friends of Zion, that I again have had every opportunity to convince myself of the correctness of the statements made by the Jews in Jerusalem. The great regard which I always entertained toward our brethren in the Holy Land has now become, if possible, doubly increased, so that if you were to ask me, 'Are they worthy and deserving of assistance?' I would reply, 'Most decidedly.' 'Are they willing and capable of work?' 'Undoubtedly.' 'Are their mental powers of a satisfactory nature?' 'Certainly.'"

"Ought we, as Israelites, in particular, to render them support?" 'Learn,' I would say, 'if your own sacred Scriptures do not satisfy you, from non-Israelites, what degree of support those are entitled to who consecrate their lives to the worship of God. Go and cast a glance upon the numerous munificent endowments; upon the magnificent institutions; upon the annual contributions, not only in Jerusalem, but in every part of the world; not only by individuals, but by almost every mighty ruler on earth. Notice the war which had broken out within our recollection respecting a privilege of repairing a house of devotion, all for the sole object to support religion—and are we Israelites to stand back?'"

"If you put the question to me, saying thus: 'Now we are willing to contribute toward a fund intended to render them such assistance as they may require; we are ready to make even sacrifices of our own means if necessary; what scheme do you propose as best adapted to carry out the object in view?' I would reply: 'Carry out simply what they themselves have suggested; but begin, in the first instance, with the houses in Jerusalem.'"

"Select land outside the city, raise, in the form of a large square or crescent, a number of suitable houses with European improvements, have in the centre of the square or crescent a synagogue, a college, and a public bath. Let each house have in front a plot of ground large enough to cultivate olive-trees, the vine, and necessary vegetables, so as to give the occupiers a taste for agriculture."

"And if now you address me saying, 'Which would be the proper time to commence the work, supposing we were ready to be guided by your counsel?' My reply then would be, 'Commence at once, begin the work this day, if you can.'"

The tone pervading the whole of this narrative shows how intense is the desire on the part of this venerable patriarch of the Hebrew race that the ancient land should be again occupied by God's chosen people. That desire he has spared neither money nor labor to promote, and has not shrunk, even at his advanced age, from personally exploring the country, so that his advice may carry with it all the authority of reliability of his personal investigation.

That there are many Jews who do not sympathize with this scheme is well known. They have no desire to return to Palestine or to see a Jewish nationality re-established. They belong, as a rule, to the section of the Jewish community known as the Reformed School, which has abandoned the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible, and is for the most part favorable to the teachings of free thinkers. They place a high value on their Jewish lineage, and while abandoning their distinctively Jewish faith, they take pride in their race as intellectually and morally superior to all other races."

It is evident, therefore, that the movement toward Palestine on the part of the Jews must be at first a partial and gradual one. But all students of prophecy know that in spite of this indifference on the part of some Jews, the return is certain, for God has said it, and His word cannot be broken.

HEALTHY RELIGION.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"With long life will I satisfy him."—Psalm 91 : 16.

Religion a Chariot not a Hearse—Good for the Human Organism—It Promotes Longevity—

I. By Inculcating Care of the Health—A Positive Christian Duty—The Christian's Respect for the Temple of God—A Wonderful Body—Consecrated to Service—God's Caligraphy—An Ill-used Watch—II. By Preventing Dissipations—Curtailed Lives of Men of Genius—Byron, Poe, Napoleon—Religion Surrendered Before Morality—III. By Preventing Worry—A Twenty Millionaire Friend—The Wheels in a Carpet Factory—No Need for Worry About Business—Or Reputation—The Almighty Sedative for the Nervous—IV. By Assuring Post Mortem Felicity—Efforts to Remove Dread of Death—Three Experiments Fail—The Voice of the Lightnings on Calvary—The Message of the Rainbow—The Bottom Falling out of the Grave.

THROUGH the mistake of its friends religion has been chiefly associated with sick beds and graveyards. The whole subject to many people is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word religion without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tombstone cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed and that religion instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph.

Religion, so far from subtracting from one's vitality is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygienic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David in another part of the psalms prays that religion may be dominant he does not speak of it as a mild-sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp; he speaks of it as "the saving health of all nations;" while God, in the text, promises longevity to the pious, saying: "With long life will I satisfy him."

The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve HUMAN LONGEVITY.

Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were at one time in his empire forty-five people one hundred and thirty-five years old. So far down as the sixteenth century Peter Zartan died at one hundred and eighty-five years of age. I do not say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say the length of human life will be greatly improved.

It is said in Isaiah 65 : 20 : "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if according to Scripture the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and four hundred and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come. Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance and they develop a Frederick Douglass or a Toussaint L'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought out from under the serfdom of sin, what shall be the body? what shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries and who can tell what will be the strength of man and the beauty of woman, and the longevity of all?

I. My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of longevity; I prove it, first, from the fact that it makes the

a positive Christian duty. Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication, are questions very often deferred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and He has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars or mar its walls or crumble its pillars is a God-defying sacrilege.

He sees God's caligraphy in every page—anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes."

That arm with thirty-two curious bones wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain's telegraphy—three hundred and fifty pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour—the heart in twenty-four hours beating 100,000 times, during the twenty-four hours overcoming resistances amounting to 224,000,000 pounds of weight, during the same time the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air, and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate and easily disturbed and demolished.

The Christian man says to himself: "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my physical faculties I insult God and call for dire retribution." Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to Him in sacrifice animals imperfect and diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physical condition, and a man who through irregular or gluttonous eating ruins his health is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the church as with respiration easy and foot free.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray and ask God's protection while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going out on the bridge between New York and Brooklyn, leaping off and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you defer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality or to the pastry-cook or to the butcher or to the baker or to the apothecary or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. Take care of all your physical forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment.

Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined, walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate, pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything, groaning about sick headache and palpitation of the heart, which you think came from God, when they came from your own folly.

What right has any man or woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost? What is the ear? Why, it is the whispering gallery of the human soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. What is the hand? An instrument so wonderful that when the Earl of Bridgewater bequeathed in his will $40,000 for treatises to be written on the wisdom, power and goodness of God, Sir Charles Bell, the great English anatomist and surgeon found his greatest illustration in the construction of the human hand, devoting his whole book to that subject. So wonderful are these bodies that God names his own attributes after different parts of them. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—"the government shall be upon his shoulder." A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward longevity? If I toss my watch about recklessly and drop it on the pavement and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch and never abuse it and wind it up just at the same hour every night and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which watch will last the longer?

Common sense answers. Now, the human body God's watch. You see the hands of the watch. You see the face of the watch; but the beating the heart is the ticking of the watch. Oh, be careful and do not let it run down!

II. Again I remark that practical religion is friend of longevity in the fact that it is which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a very short life. Their sins kill them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know half a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore at thirty-eight years of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his chamber door was delirium tremens.

"Only this and nothing more."

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond middle life, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who took one step of his foot in the centre of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! Oh, how many people we have known who have not lived out their days because of their dissipations and indulgences! Now practical religion is a protest against all dissipation of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen, professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded. Yes; but they threw away their religion before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star line steamer bound for Liverpool in mid-Atlantic jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star line's capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clean through? In the one case if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved; in the other case if he had kept to his religion his moral would have been saved.

There are aged people who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defence and the equipage of religion. You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain or something else, but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man, walked along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of a Christian life. You went to the right; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. Oh, if this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of longevity. "With long life will I satisfy him."

III. Again religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men; it is worry, when a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul—everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when in answer to his prayers God tells him when to buy and when to sell; and if he gains that is best, and if he loses that is best?

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said: "Sir, I want you to call on me in every exigency; I am your fast friend; I could fall back on $20,000,000; I can foresee a panic ten years; I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of New York; whenever you are in any trouble call on me and I will help you; you can have my money and you can have my influence; here is my hand in pledge for it." How much would you worry about business? Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can, and ten I'll depend on my friend's generosity for the rest."

Now more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg and Ekin, and Australia and California are mine; I foresee a panic a million years; I have all the sources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble, call on me and I will help; here is my hand-pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much would that man worry? Not much. What lion will dare to put his paw on that Daniel? Is there rest in this? Is there not an eternal vacation in this?

"Oh," you say, "here is a man who asked God for a blessing in a certain enterprise, and he lost five thousand dollars in it. Explain that." I will, under is a factory, and one wheel is going north and the other wheel is going south, and one wheel says laterally and the other plays vertically. I go to the manufacturer and I say: "O manufacturer, your machinery is a contradiction. Why do you not make all the wheels go one way?" "Well," he says, "I made them to go in opposite directions on purpose, and they produce the right result. You go downstairs and examine the carpets; they are turning out in this establishment and you will see." I go down on the other floor and I see the carpets, and I am obliged to confess that though the wheels in that factory go in opposite directions, they turn out a beautiful result; and while I am standing there looking at the exquisite fabric and Scripture passage comes into my mind: "All things work together for good to them who love God." Is there not rest in that? Is there not joy in that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worried about his reputation? One man says he lies, another says he is stupid, another says he is dishonest, and half a dozen printing establishments attack him and he is in a great state of excitement and worry and cannot sleep, but religion comes to him and he says: "Man, God is on your side; He will take care of your reputation; if God be for you, who can be against you?" How much should that man worry about his reputation? Not much. If at broker who some years ago in Wall Street, after he had lost money, sat down and wrote a rewell letter to his wife before he blew his brains out—if instead of taking out of his pocket a pistol he had taken out a well-read New Testament there would have been one less suicide. O nervous and nervous people of the world, try this almighty sedative, you will live twenty-five years longer under its soothing power. It is not chloral that you want, morphine that you want; it is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. "With long life will I satisfy him."

DREAD OF POST MORTEM FUTURE.

IV. Again, practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it removes all corroding care about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a rail train you want to know at what depot it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship you want to know into what harbor it is going to run, and if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be your future destiny, I would in as little a way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence, the question most worried me upon this subject put together would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying.

I want to take the strain off your nerves and the oppression off your soul, and I make two or three experiments. Experiment the first: When you go out of this world it does not make any difference whether you have been good or bad, or whether you believed truth or error, you will go straight to glory. "Impossible," you say. "My common sense as well as my religion teaches that the bad and the good cannot live together forever. You give me no comfort in that experiment." Experiment the second: When you leave this world you will go into an intermediate state where you can be converted and prepared for heaven. "Impossible," you say; "as the tree falleth so it must lie, and I cannot postpone to an intermediate state that reformation which ought to have been effected in this state." Experiment the third: There is no future world; when a man dies that is the last of him. Do not worry about what you are to do in another state of being, you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tells me that death is not the appendix but the preface; there is something that tells me that on this side of the grave I only get started and that I shall go on forever; my power to think says 'forever,' my affections say 'forever,' my capacity to enjoy or suffer 'forever.'"

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make, and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted. A mighty One on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned his pale and agonized face toward the heavens and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the expiation. Witness earth and heaven and hell, I am the expiation." And the hammer struck him, and the spears punctured him, and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth it shall die!" "I will by no means clear the guilty!" Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift themselves into woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the bloodshedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day-dawn. And along the line of the blue I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities." And along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations." And along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us."

And then I saw the storm was over and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill and planting the other column of its colors on the other side the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward and behold there was a rainbow about the throne.

Accept that sacrifice and

QUIT WORRYING.

Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth. Religion is sunshine, that is health. Religion is fresh air and pure water, they are healthy. Religion is warmth, that is healthy. Ask all the doctors and they will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic. I offer you perfect peace now and hereafter.

What do you want in the future world? Tell me and you shall have it. Orchards? There are the trees with twelve manner of fruits, yielding fruit every month. Water scenery? There is the river of life, from under the throne of God, clear as crystal, and the sea of glass mingled with fire. Do you want music? There is the oratorio of the Creation led on by Adam, and the oratorio of the Red Sea led on by Moses, and the oratorio of the Messiah led on by St. Paul, while the archangel with swinging baton controls the one hundred and forty-four thousand who make up the orchestra.

Do you want reunion. There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair. You have been accustomed to open the door on this side the sepulchre. I open the door on the other side the sepulchre. You have been accustomed to walk in the wet grass on the top of the grave. I show you the under side of the grave; the bottom has fallen out and the long ropes with which the pall bearers let down your dead, let them clear through into heaven.

Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion! It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal life. "With long life will I satisfy him."

MISS MARY GAULT, the sister of General Gault of the Hallelujah Army, is a native of Johnstone, a small Scotch manufacturing town in Renfrewshire, where she was born in the year 1855. For many years before she gave herself entirely up to the service of Christ she lived a quiet, uneventful life in her native town. With her, as with many others, religion was but a name.

HER CONVERSION TO CHRIST.

In the year 1874 Miss Gault's father settled in the little village of Elderslie, a few miles from Paisley. It was about this time that Scotland received its first visit from Messrs. Moody and Sankey; and their labors were indirectly the means of Miss Gault's conversion. A year afterward, in 1875, Mr. Adams, an Edinburgh evangelist, visited Elderslie and began a series of Gospel meetings. The great attraction at those gatherings was the singing of Mr. Sankey's hymns. These Christian songs were to a large extent new to the quiet country people, and their sweet captivating melody soon recommended them to all hearers. Miss Gault traces her first impressions about religious matters to the singing of these hymns. The very first night that the meetings were held, conviction was carried home to her heart, and without daring to hesitate or to delay, the hour that brought conviction of sin, saw her a believer in Christ.

COMMENCES WORK IN PAISLEY.

Immediately after conversion she joined herself with a number of other earnest Christian people, and mission work of an unsectarian kind was begun in Paisley. Nearly three years afterward Miss Gault's brother—Mr. John Gault, devised and launched his scheme for the evangelization of the masses, then and now known as The Hallelujah Army. Work was begun and vigorously carried forward in the town of Paisley. Miss Gault was doubtful about the methods her brother adopted, and when large crowds gathered night after night to hear the Gospel preached in the old Jail Square of Paisley, she would place herself at the corner of the street, and watch with fear and trembling

THE PROGRESS OF THE MOVEMENT.

Not many months went past, however, until she, with characteristic energy, threw herself heartily and completely into the open-air work. This change of attitude and action was effected by no human pressure, but by unmistakable evidence that the Spirit of God was using the questioned means for His own glory and the salvation of souls. As Mr. Gault's work grew in his hands, Miss Gault went to Ireland to assist in carrying on the work of the mission there. Operations were carried on by her in various towns in Ireland, until, in May, 1881, she was recalled to Scotland to nurse her father in what proved to be his last illness. After the removal of her father by death she did not rest long—anxious to resume active effort in the work she so much loves. The month of June saw her in Edinburgh, and a branch of The Army, by her unflagging energy was soon in ACTIVE WORK IN THE CAPITAL OF SCOTLAND.

From the very first the meetings were largely attended, and proved eminently successful. Night after night the benches of that hall were crowded with the very class of people which the Church has not yet reached, and to reach which The Army was constituted. As giving an idea of the congregations which were assembled there, a policeman who looked in one night pointed out to one of the attendants two entire seats filled with young men and young women, every one of whom had been in jail. Of course with such gatherings as that the quiet and order which one naturally associates with religious meetings could not be expected; but at the same time the meetings were never beyond the control of Miss Gault. The success of the meetings may be measured not only by the numbers which attended, but also by the very large number brought to conviction of sin, and who have been led to Christ. These young Christians are not kept by The Army as its exclusive members, but are encouraged to join themselves to the churches of the city—a step which many have already taken.

THE VOICES OF THE PRESENT HOUR.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

A HOLY WAR of Mahommedans against Christians is apprehended as likely to be proclaimed by Arabi Pacha if a conflict arises between his Egyptian army and either English or French soldiers. Whether or not Arabi becomes the author of it, such a war is clearly foretold in Rev. 16: 12-14 to take place about or soon after 1882, as the end of the predicted 1260 years of the Mahommedan Antichrist's supremacy. It is there said that when the mystic Euphrates, or Turco-Mahommedan Empire, is "dried up," and Syria becomes separated from it, an evil spirit of fanatical agitation is to "go forth from the mouth of the Mahommedan False Prophet to gather the nations to the war of the great day of God Almighty." This can mean nothing else than the proclamation of a Holy War by Mahommedan priests and leaders, which will embroil not merely Mahommedan countries like Turkey, Egypt, and India, but also other nations in deadly conflict.

A MASSACRE OF EUROPEANS

in India which will be far more appalling than what took place in the Sepoy Mutiny in 1857, and which will culminate in the separation of India as well as Ireland from Britain, neither India nor Ireland having formed part of the ten prophetic kingdoms belonging to Cæsar's Roman Empire, is indicated by the Scripture Prophecies to take place some time between 1882 and 1885, and therefore may be only a few months or a year or two distant. This predestined Indian rebellion may either arise in India itself, although there is not the least sign of it at present, or may possibly spring out of the present Egyptian crisis, if the Mahommedans in Egypt should unfurl the Standard of the Prophet and proclaim a Holy War, for then the sixty million Mahommedans in India might catch the fire of fanaticism. Just as in the past, we have recommended people to sell out their investments in Turkish bonds and in landed property in Ireland, so we now recommend them to sell out of Indian railways and other Indian securities, as they will be greatly depreciated in value before long.

THE FLIGHT OF THE JEWS

from Russia to Palestine is another significant sign of this time. Up to the present date the sum of about $1,150,000 has been collected in the various countries of the world for the benefit of the Jewish sufferers by the Russian persecutions. Toward this sum the countries of Europe have contributed in the following proportions: England $350,000, France $200,000, Germany, $150,000, Austria $100,000; other European countries $100,000. From America the amount raised appears to be about $250,000, which completes the above total. It will thus be seen that England has contributed most money, though America has displayed her sympathy to a larger extent and rendered them better service by taking charge of the refugees and placing them in positions to gain a livelihood for themselves and their families.

The Russian people are beginning to see, says the Jewish Chronicle, that it does not pay to expel the Jews. The economic consequences of the recent outrages are forcing themselves in an unpleasant manner upon the attention of the commercial classes. Spain had to encounter a like experience after the events of 1492. The first result of the expulsion of the Jews was seen in the dearth of medical men, a large number of the profession having hitherto been Jews. As a consequence, the sick very often either died from lack of medical advice, or became the prey of quacks. Moreover, the expulsion deprived the country of a large number of skilled handicraftsmen and of the wealth which their combined labor represented. Spain lost, too, the distributors as well as the producers of wealth—a class indispensable to every community, and has recently issued an invitation to them to return.

The Jewish World, speaking of the economical results of the agitation, gives the following significant extracts: The Zaria, of Kieff, states that from the 8th to the 28th May more than 2000 Jews quitted Kieff. The town has now quite a deserted air. In one quarter, the Podol, more than 600 dwellings are to be let, and the general depression is not only felt by the rich and middle classes, but among the work people also the most frightful misery prevails. At Odessa some of the largest business firms have recently failed, and the menacing attitude of the starving working classes is causing the authorities much anxiety. The Moskovskie Viedomosti states that in consequence of the expulsion of Jews from Moscow, the local exhibition of Russian products is a failure.

Hundreds of Jews are now constantly arriving in Palestine from Russia, according to the statement of the Rev. A. H. Kelk of Jerusalem.

is becoming more thoroughly permeated with infidelity. The Spectator calls attention to "the steadiness and rapidity with which the French Chamber is moving toward extreme communism, and toward the extinction of any official recognition of the value of religion." In the former direction so much has been done that but little remains to do. The Chamber is becoming sovereign, and if the judges, the only great officers beyond its control, are made removable and elective, we shall see democracy enthroned in France as it has hardly yet been in any European country. That democracy will, as all appearances portend, be avowedly pagan, using that word as the only one we possess to express a definite and conscious rejection of Christianity. The Deputies evidently believe that the complete secularization of the State will be acceptable to their constituents. This marks an immense change of opinion, which in no long time will affect other than the semi-ecclesiastical laws. With religion flatly repudiated, there is but one basis possible for legislation, and that is enlightened selfishness; and the code which enlightened selfishness will frame may differ very widely from any that modern Europe has yet seen. There is no reason, for example, why it should be so chary of the death penalty, which is very effective, and costs comparatively nothing."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Nuisance Transformed.—One of the most remarkable cases of conversion in Glasgow was effected through the agency of a little girl. One night, on Paisley Road, she met a man named Moses Wilson, then under the influence of whiskey. The girl went up to him and pressed him to take the pledge, and come in to a meeting. He did so, and although he had been so wedded to strong drink, that only two of his friends believed he would stand firm to his pledge for a week, he has kept it, and is now an energetic and successful worker for Christ, in the same district where formerly he was looked upon as a nuisance.

Taking Christ into a Station-House.—Mr. Sawyer said, at the Cowcaddens' Gospel Temperance Meeting: "I know a young man who became a Christian. One night he came into our meeting and said, 'Well, I gave my soul to Jesus on such and such a night, yet I had to sleep in the station-house, as I could obtain no other accommodation. It seems rather hard, doesn't it?' An experienced Christian said to him, 'Mr. France, why don't you take Christ into the station-house with you if He sends you there?' 'Well, I will do it,' France said, and that night and the next night he did it, but never afterward. A Christian worker got him work, and since that time he has secured a home of his own, with his wife and children around him again, and Christ is in the midst of them."

Five Jewels for Christ's Crown.—A Stalwart man rose in the meeting, and, addressing Mr. Moody, said: "I should like to state that five of my own friends have been brought to Christ since you have been in Glasgow. These are my own son, two of my brothers, and a sister and her husband. One of my brothers, who is a sailor, had just come from Liverpool, and he heard you preach in the West End, about the people who were making all the excuses they could find. As we came away the big tears were rolling down his cheeks, and I had that night to praise the Lord for the salvation of my sailor brother. Another brother had been to the gold diggings for nineteen years, and we never heard where he was until he returned about five years since. He was a regular wreck.

He took what they call 'the foreign sickness' through intemperance, and when he came back his constitution was quite broken down. He went to hear you, Mr. Moody, and was likewise brought into the light. He said, after, 'Oh, Lord Jesus, I don't care where I go now; whether to the fishery or where, for if anything happens to me I am not afraid—Thou hast saved me.'"

Jumping into the Pit.—A Minister said, in the course of a Bible reading upon "The Bringing out of Egypt:" "A missionary in China once heard a group of Chinamen discussing the various religions with which China is afflicted. At last one of the group said, 'It is just as if a Chinaman were down in a deep pit, and wanted help to get out. Confucius came along and said, 'If you had only kept my precepts you would not have fallen into this pit.' Buddha also came to the mouth of the pit, saying, 'Ah, poor Chinaman, if you were only up where I am I would make you all right.' The Chinaman replied, 'If I were where you are I would not want your help.' But then there came along Jesus Christ, with tears in His eyes, and He jumped right into the pit and lifted the poor man right out of it.' This is the love which wins our hearts."

A Man all in Tatters.—Mr. Howie, in expressing his strong approval of open-air preaching, said: "When I was at the Wynd Church, a man who was all in tatters came to me. He had been a great drunkard. He said: 'John So-and-so, my companion, is evidently changed. We used to go drinking together, and I see what a wonderful change has been wrought in him. I myself wish to get the same change.' I took him into the vestry and talked to him about his soul. By-and-by he saw the way of life, and left and went away to speak to his companions, and during my ministry I have counted some twenty people brought to Christ through his instrumentality. That man, after his conversion, began to prosper in worldly matters as a joiner. He has shown his gratitude by presenting me at different times with three open-air pulpits."

The Song Outside the House.—A Man said: "I thank God I was enabled yesterday morning to look out of self to Christ. I had many a time wished for Christ, but I was looking into self, and did not feel as I wanted to do. Yesterday, while the meeting was singing 'Take me as I am' and 'Just as I am without one plea,' I was led to rest on Christ as I had never done before. But I did not find it such very easy work this morning. The enemy was buffeting me; he wanted to draw me off from Christ, and while wrestling with the temptation I heard a man outside the house singing 'Leave the poor old stranded wreck, and pull for the shore.' I threw myself on my knees and said 'Lord, I will.' You have, my friends, not only to pray that the drunkards may be kept, but also that young Christians who have been looking into self instead of to Christ may be prevented from again going back into sin."

Message to a Manufacturer.—"There was a large manufacturer in this city of Glasgow went to hear Mr. Moody eight years ago in Kent Road U. P. Church. Mr. Moody preached from the text 'Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' That man went home in deep concern about his soul, and with tears running down his cheeks, he said to his wife who was already a Christian, 'Tell me how I can find the rest my soul requires.' She opened her Bible at Romans 10: 9, 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.' He inquired, 'Is that all?' 'That is all,' she answered; and these words were the means of lifting that man out of the darkness into light. He was a saved man from that hour."

A Dying Railway Guard.—The Rev. James Scott also said: "At one of the early meetings Mr. Moody held in St. Andrew's Hall, there was present a rail conductor, and the hymn which made such a deep impression when it was sung for the first time here was sung over and over again on that Sabbath morning. The conductor did as the hymn states—he gave himself to Christ as he was and Christ took him. The man had been before thinking of giving up his work, because it was rather dangerous, and after his conversion he decided to turn his attention to some other kind of work. He gave in his notice to the railway company, and I believe he was running his last journey when he met with a fatal accident. He was not killed outright, and he died singing the chorus of the hymn, "Take me as I am." His companions had often heard him singing it after his conversion. It was the means of his conversion, and it was on his lips as he went into the presence of the King."

The Right Centre to Work from.—Mr. Scott said: "A business man was telling me that a friend who has been helping in Christian work was very much opposed to the after-meetings. He would not go near Mr. Moody's because there were second meetings; but a lad in his employment went to the Temperance Institute in Bridgeton and obtained salvation through faith in Christ. He could not hide it. He made it so manifest in the workshop that even his master, this good quiet man, who thought he was a Christian, saw the change. So he made up his mind that he would go to one of Mr. Moody's ordinary evangelistic meetings at any rate. The Holy Spirit met him, and he was saved on the spot. He went to his fellow-worker in the Christian work in which they had both been engaged, and said, 'I have been working very hard for five years, as you have seen, for salvation; but thank God! I have got it now; and in future I will be able to work from the cross and not to it.'"

An Indian Soldier's Career.—Major Colquhoun said: "Last January an old man was spoken of whose name and individuality were forgotten. About a month ago he reappeared in the Polmadie district, and said that he had ever since been searching for the person who had guided him to the Saviour in Mr. Wells's church. He had been a soldier in India. Every year for ten years he sent home, to pay his mother's rent, the sum of £10. He had fought in no fewer than twenty-three general engagements. At the siege of Delhi he was one of the first to scale the walls. Up till that day he and his comrade were sober, steady men, but from that time they were completely separated, for the demon strong drink had taken and kept possession of him till the meeting in Mr. Wells's church on the south side of the river. He is now working in some locomotive works, while his comrade, who kept sober, advanced in the service step by step, and is now colonel of the regiment into which he enlisted as a private soldier."

A Drunken Infidel Reclaimed.—A Working-man said: "I was given to drink, and, like a fool, blasphemed my Creator. I prided myself on holding very sceptical views. A man of my acquaintance, who had read a number of infidel books, used to discuss religion with me, and I used to sit with him and drink in his pernicious talk, and if any one opposed him I was ready to step forth in his defence. But my drinking habits all this while riveted themselves upon me. Many a time I was torn by the pangs of remorse, and I made resolution after resolution only to break them. One Sunday morning, after reading the newspapers, I went out, and unaccountably—for I intended to go in the opposite direction—went toward a church in my neighborhood, and going inside, I heard an evangelist named Mr. Stevenson. In the sermon the preacher spoke of a sceptical young man who had been led to a saving knowledge of Christ through carefully watching the consistent life of his Christian father. That story, although I often tried to forget it, clung to my memory, and it was ultimately the means of leading me to Christ, in whom I have found pardon and peace."

A Pugilistic Mason.—Mr. J. R. Jack said: "One of the worst men in Ayrshire, a drunken, godless mason, was converted to Christ nine years ago. He was a great swearer and also a great fighter—in fact, there was scarcely a man in Ayrshire who dare stand up against him. His wife was converted in a little church at Busby. She went home in fear and trembling, dreading to face her husband. She went upstairs, knelt down, and asked God to give her strength to confess Christ before her husband. When she came down she said to him, 'I have found Christ.' His reply was, 'See you keep Him.' She threw herself down in the middle of the floor and on her knees cried to God to save her husband, and to save him immediately. Telling me about the matter, he said, 'I had to hold on by the arms of the chair, and my very nails made a mark in the wood. I clenched my teeth and said, "A woman shall never get the better of me." The poor woman continued her cries to God, and the next day the Holy Spirit brought him to the feet of Jesus. That man is now a respected elder in one of our Free Churches.'

THE DOOM OF ANTICHRIST AND HIS FAMILY AND ALLIES.

Opposition of Christians and Jews—Divine Intervention—Capture of the Man of Sin—His Ecclesiastical Agent—Cast Alive into the Lake of Fire—The Dungeon of Antichrist.

NOR will these Gentiles stand alone in their antagonism to Antichrist. Innumerable Jews will withstand both his blandishments and his terrors; for, though probably they have not as yet yielded their hearts to Jesus, they will at least be too loyal to Jehovah to supersede His worship for that of the lawless one. The preaching of Elijah as well as the testimony of the Two Witnesses in Jerusalem (see Mal. 4: 5-6, and Rev. 11: 1-6) will doubtless lead to such public antagonism to his divine pretensions. But, whatever be the origin of such active opposition, it will not be confined to mere private resistance to his edicts, but will lead to a general insurrection of all those Jews, who unlike their rulers, have not (Isa. 27: 15), made a "covenant with Death, and with hell are at agreement." JEWISH INSURRECTION AGAINST THE LAWLESS ONE.

First and foremost in this insurrection will be the royal tribe of Judah. When Antichrist and his confederates invest Jerusalem, its inhabitants will be apparently endowed with supernatural energy; for Jeremiah says, when describing the last siege of Jerusalem, of which that of Titus was but a faint type (Zech. 12: 8), "He that is feeble among them shall be as David; and the house of David as God, as the angel of Jehovah before them." But notwithstanding their valor, Antichrist, energized as he will be by Satan, and supported as he will be by the multitudinous battalions of the ten kings (see Joel 3: 9-14), the Jews will be eventually defeated. As one result of a victory so dearly bought, no less than two-thirds of the Jews in Palestine will either be slaughtered on the battle-field, or die of those diseases, dysentery and fever, which are the fatal legacies of war (see Zech. 13: 8-9).

DIVINE INTERVENTION.

The set time for divine intervention will now have arrived. The Two Witnesses will have been slain by Antichrist, the Gentile and Jewish antagonists will have been guillotined; and the powers of hell will have been apparently triumphant. There remains, then, but One who is equal to this conflict, and who He is Isaiah foresaw when he referred to this awful crisis in the world's history. For Messiah, speaking through the prophet, says (Isa. 63: 5-6), "I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered, and there was none to uphold; therefore, My own arm brought salvation unto Me; and My fury, it upheld Me. And I will tread down the Gentiles in My anger, and make them drunk in My fury; and I will bring down their strength [armies] to the earth."

Descending on Mount Olives, our Lord will come with His bride (comp. Ezek. 43: 2-4; Zech. 14: 4; Rev. 19: 11-16), and the reign of man and Satan will come to an end. Their great leader, Antichrist, and his ecclesiastical agent will then be captured; and as their sins will be unique, so will be their penalty, for (Rev. 19: 20) they will be "cast alive into a lake of fire, burning with brimstone."

We may infer from Hebrews 9: 27, that men cannot die more than once; since it is written that, "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after that the judgment." If this exegesis is correct, it will give the clue to the reason why the penalty of Antichrist will be different to that of other men; and why he does not die on the battle-field, for having died once he can die no more. His unique doom was foretold long before his guilty career. Thus Nahum, speaking as the mouthpiece of God, says (ch. 1: 14), "I will make thy bed [or grave] for thou art vile." But to Daniel and John alone was committed the revelation of the terrible fact that Antichrist will descend alive into Gehenna: for Daniel says (7: 11), "his BODY shall be given to the burning flame!"

HIS ETERNAL DUNGEON.

After the sentence is passed on Antichrist, in the valley of Jehosaphat, he will have to pass through Hades on his road to Tartarus, his terrible dungeon throughout eternity; while there, he will apparently be assailed by the taunts of his former royal victims, as well as other godless heroes. It is probable that many regal and military personages will be slain, either by treachery, or on the battle-field, before he attains universal sway. One at least of his opponents we know will be assassinated at his instigation; for we learn from Daniel 11: 25-26, that "they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy" the King of Egypt. It is possible that when Antichrist was formerly in Hades, that they knew of his compact with Satan for the emperors of the world. As it is clear from our Lord's parable of Dives and Lazarus that the lost carry their knowledge (Luke 16: 27-28) of earthly things into Sheol, the wondrous success of Antichrist will probably be known by its regal and other prominent tenants.

HIS WELCOME IN HADES.

Of his ultimate defeat they will also know by his imprisonment, if not before. Hence, when he again descends to Hades, we can well understand why the man of sin will receive such an ironical greeting from his many royal and military victims such as no former king has received. This fact, so galling to the king of pride, we learn from Habakkuk 2: 6-7, who says, "Shall not all these take up a parable against him and a taunting proverb against him, and say, Ho! to him that increaseth what is not his, and to him that ladeth himself with thick clay! Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee?" Isaiah, too, pre-reports the very language that these kings shall employ (Isa. 14: 9-16) "Sheol from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee—even the Rephaim [or disembodied ungodly heroes] of the earth: it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations. All they shall speak and say unto thee, Art thou also become weak as we, art thou become like one of us? Is this the man that made the earth to tremble?"

And thus will end the career of him who not only defied the Most High, but dared to show himself as God, and as such was worshipped by the bulk of the Gentiles, and not only will he be cast alive with his prophet into the "lake of fire," but Antichrist will be imprisoned there at least 1000 years before Satan himself, and have for his solitary companion during that long period his compeer in iniquity.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

Nor, judging by the signs of our times, is this day far off, when we see churches and chapels deserted wholesale, and are told, alas! even in too many pulpits, that music, art, and science can moralize those masses whom the Gospel has failed to reclaim, it needs not prophetic prescience to discern that we are at the closing hours of the Saturday night of this dispensation. Nor can we wonder, when so many are seeking to replace the Gospel of God's grace by music, Sunday exhibitions of sculpture and paintings in churches, and atheistic teachings of evolution and positivism—that God should at length say (Isa. 66: 3-4) "They have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations: I also will choose their delusions." Yea (2 Thess. 2: 11) "for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie," and so give divine homage to the fierce "God of forces," Antichrist, rather than to Jesus, the Prince of Peace!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Adjournment of Congress on Tuesday, August 8th, after a session of eight months, closes the record on which the citizens of the country will have to base their verdict on its performances. That it has been a busy session is generally admitted, but there has scarcely ever been a session which has provoked wider divergence of opinion throughout the land. While in some circles the proceedings have received warm commendation, in others they have received unmitigated condemnation. This result is not so unexpected as is the verdict of the press. Among the journals most pronounced in censure are several of the recognized organs of the Republican party, and these unhesitatingly and unambiguously denounce the action of Congress as dishonest, and its inaction as culpable. On the other hand the journals regarded as the organs of that section of the party calling itself "Garfield Republican," applaud the results of the session as showing prudence and industry. It will be the duty now of individual citizens to carefully consider their duty in preparation for the forthcoming nominations and elections. The division lists show that for what has been done and what has been left undone, the responsibility must rest jointly on Republicans and Democrats, for in every important division the names of Democrats have been found side by side with Republicans in the same list. There is no difficulty in getting at the record of every member of Congress, and it will be the most puerile folly for the citizen who disapproves of his representative's conduct to vote for the renomination and re-election of the same man. Every citizen, and especially every Christian citizen, should remember that his vote is an expression of his approval or disapproval of the methods and practices of Congress, and that his own character is involved in that vote. Party lines are just now less distinct than usual, but character is well marked and all-important. Men of sound Christian principle, of unblemished integrity, and of far-sighted sagacity are needed in Congress, and it is the duty of every Christian citizen to use his influence, be it small or great, to secure the nomination of such men and only those, whether they call themselves Republicans or Democrats. If it were clearly understood by the machine that the Christians in every district would vote solid on election day against an improper candidate and that thieves if nominated could not be elected, there would be more care displayed in the selection of candidates, and the tone and character of the next Congress would be improved. In this way Christian men may make their influence felt, and the machine would learn that character is indispensable in any candidate seeking its powerful aid.

The Measures by which the Past Session of Congress will be chiefly remembered, are, the creation of the Tariff Commission; the reduction of certain unimportant taxes; the Anti-Polygamy Act; the bill restricting Chinese Immigration; the bill for extending the Bank Charters; the Reapportionment of Representation; the Three per cent Refunding bill; the River and Harbor bill, appropriating nearly twenty million dollars, vetoed by the President and passed over the veto by both Houses; and the Naval Appropriation, passed in the House to suit Mr. Robeson's ideas but reduced by the Senate in the interest of the people. It will also be remembered for the peculiar arrangement of its committees, the result of Mr. Robeson's influence over the man he manoeuvred into the Speaker's chair. Mr. Keifer's selections were made with a motive only too obvious, and resulted in the best men being placed where they could do least good. The House marked its opinion of the proceeding by separating without passing the customary vote of thanks to the Speaker, although Mr. Robeson importuned members to pass the vote.

The Kansas Republican State Convention has expressed its confidence in Governor St. John by nominating him for re-election. Solon O. Thatcher was also placed in nomination, but on the roll being called the Governor received 287 votes against 82 for Mr. Thatcher. It is gratifying to notice that the first plank of the platform adopted was that pledging the party to prohibition and its inflexible enforcement. It reads thus: "Resolved, That we declare ourselves unqualifiedly in favor of the prohibition of the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and pledge ourselves to such additional legislation as shall secure the rigid enforcement of the constitutional provision upon this subject in all parts of the State."

The Strike of the Freight Handlers in New York has apparently broken down, for many of the men have applied for employment at the old rates. At a large meeting held on August 6th at Jersey City it was announced that only $300 remained in the treasury, and several prominent men withdrew from the union and stated that they intended returning to work if the companies would take them. The collapse is believed to have been caused by the readiness of Italian workmen to accept the companies' terms.

The Property Confiscated in the Recent Raid on the pool rooms of New York which was not classed as "gambling implements" was sold on August 3d at Police Headquarters by an auctioneer. There were carpets, chairs, mirrors, a sideboard, a safe, decanters and glasses, a stove, a desk, and tables. They were sold for $278.54, less than their value. The money, less the auctioneer's fees, goes to the Public School Fund.

The Demand for the New Three per cent Government bonds fully equals the expectation of the advocates of the measure. More than 2000 packages of bonds surrendered for exchange into the new three per cents have been received at the Treasury Department. No estimate has yet been made of the amount of money represented by them. Secretary Folger estimates that the amount of the offers will exceed $200,000,000.

The Prohibitionists of Ohio held a State Convention at Columbus on August 3d, when resolutions were adopted declaring that the manufacture and sale of liquors is a crime demanding total prohibition, and denouncing as wrong any license or taxation, and declaring that the policy of taxation is a perversion of the principles of our Government. The resolutions also repeat and reaffirm the principles of the party, namely, prohibition of gambling in every form, prohibition of all speculation, prohibition of class legislation, prison contract labor, and star route swindles; demand for the reduction of the salaries of government officials; for frequent investigations of Government affairs; oppose adopting candidates from other parties; favor woman suffrage; approve the Women's State Temperance Union; congratulate the people of Iowa on the adoption of prohibition, and approve the Smith law as a step in the right direction and promise to assist its enforcement. A State ticket was nominated, with Mr. Ferdinand Schumacher for Secretary of State.

The Death of Rev. Joel Edson Rockwell, the eminent Presbyterian minister, of Brooklyn, is announced. He had been laid aside from active duty since March last owing to his suffering from cancer in the jaw, a disease which has now proved fatal. He died at the residence of his son on July 29th, at the age of sixty-six. Dr. Rockwell was born at Salisbury, Vt. His first charge was a Valatia, N. Y., but he afterward removed to Wilmington, Del. In 1851 he returned to New York State and settled in Brooklyn. It was mainly by his efforts that the church in Schermerhorn Street was erected at a cost of $34,000. In September, 1878, he accepted the pastorate of the Edgewater Church on Staten Island. During his busy life, Dr. Rockwell was a frequent contributor to both the secular and religious press. Among the books which he published were "Sketches of the Presbyterian Church," "Young Christian Warned," "The Sheet Anchor," "The Visitor's Questions," "Scenes and Impressions Abroad," "Seed Thoughts," and "The Diamond in the Cage." He also published a number of sermons.

Mr. Thomas Harrison, the "Boy Preacher," has fully recovered from his attack of mental and physical prostration, and has been conducting revival work at the Jackson Street Church, in St. Paul. During six weeks of special meetings about 350 converts were enrolled. After laboring at the church, he went to the Minnesota State camp meeting, where there were about 200 tents and cottages, with an immense crowd of people. He expects to commence another series of meetings soon, in which he will be assisted by Chaplain McCabe and the colored lady evangelist, Mrs. Amanda Smith.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been Taking a few weeks of much needed rest, but while residing at his old home in Vernon, Ct., he has been out every Sabbath, holding union evangelistic meetings in the neighborhood as occasion offered, with marked success. He spent two Sabbaths in Somers under the auspices of the pastor, Rev. C. H. Gleason. The meetings were continued daily, with conversions at almost every gathering. At Newington, also, in co-operation with the Rev. J. E. Elliott, acting pastor, special interest is awakened. An interesting incident recently came under his notice. Mr. Hammond, in 1874 held a series of union meetings in St. Louis. Many persons addicted to liquor professed conversion, and by their lives have since proved the genuineness of the change wrought upon them by the Holy Spirit. Among the most remarkable conversions was that of Commodore Davidson, who was at the head of the principal line of steamboats running from St. Louis to St. Paul. He received $12,000 a year for the privilege only of selling liquor on his steamboats, but after his conversion refused to continue this contract. A few weeks ago the commodore told Mr. Hammond that he now had a standing offer of $14,000 a year for the same privilege, which he had not accepted and would not accept.

Successful Revival Services have been Held during the past four months in Brooklyn, E. D., by Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea. They have been held in Ellery Street Mission Rooms, and in the open air. A tent has also been erected on Broadway, in which services have been held with some tokens of encouraging success. Among the classes reached have been some of the very poorest tenement-house dwellers, who in that locality are chiefly Roman Catholics. Eight entire families have professed saving faith in Christ, and have been publicly baptized by a Brooklyn clergyman. Since the mission has been commenced over five hundred persons have made a profession of religion through its instrumentality. An effort is now being made to erect a church near the spot, and a large part of the cost has already been subscribed. Mr. Schiverea intends continuing the tent and mission work until the church is erected.

An Infidel Becoming a Missionary in Answer to prayer, was the subject of some remarks made at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week. A gentleman present said: "Eight years ago when on my way from Chicago to Scotland, I came to this meeting to ask you to pray that God would bless my visit to my dear ones in the old country. I had heard that my brother was delivering infidel lectures in the city of Glasgow. The report was only too true, and he was ventilating his views in the public press. He had held arguments with several ministers, but appeared to hold his own. When I saw him I told him the simple story of what God's love and grace had done for me. The story reached his heart and set him thinking. Enlightened by God, he soon saw and then admitted that there is something supernatural in the religion of the Lord Jesus. He became a Christian and is now a medical missionary."

A Registered Package Worth a Million dollars was mailed at Baltimore, Md., recently, on which the postage and registry cost over $25. The package was about a foot long, ten inches wide, and eight inches thick, carefully sealed, and it contained bonds and other securities amounting to over $1,000,000, mostly for one banking firm in London, England. The package attracted much curiosity owing to its great value, and it will doubtless have special care bestowed upon it lest it be stolen or lost before it reaches its destination. Yet its contents are of little intrinsic value. Its importance consists in its representative character as certifying to its owner's claims on people whom he believes to be trustworthy. To a child or an unlettered savage the package would seem as worthless as the Bible does to the majority of people. The enlightened in both cases judge more wisely. To the believer who knows that the promises the Bible contains will certainly be fulfilled the book transcends by infinity the most precious package of bonds or scrip known to Wall Street, and eternity will justify his estimate (Psa. 19: 10).

A Dog Settled a Controversy as to his Ownership at Fall River, Mass., recently. A gentleman of that city named Rodgers lost a valuable dog, and was satisfied that the animal had been stolen. Walking along the street one day afterward with his knife in his hand whittling, he met a man leading the dog by a rope attached to the collar. Mr. Rodgers immediately recognized his dog, and demanded it, but the stranger claimed that the dog was his and refused to give it up. There was an angry discussion, but at last Mr. Rodgers cut the rope and speaking sharply to the animal, ordered it to "go home." The dog instantly obeyed, and was found at home by Mr. Rodgers on his return, a result which satisfied the doubtful bystanders as to the ownership of the dog. The case may serve as a type of the experience of some worldly minded Christians about whom their fellow-men are in doubt. They suffer a bad habit or the love of money or of social position to bind them until it is not clear whether they belong to God or the world. Sometimes God cuts the cords by loss of fortune and friends, and then they return to Him from whom they were enticed (Ps. 119: 67).

A Fortune Inherited by a Foundling is the subject of a romantic story published by a Boston journal. It is stated that sixteen years ago a baby about a year old was found in a street in Boston, dressed in costly clothes and wearing a locket on which the name "Charles Willoughby" was engraved. The child was adopted by a restaurant keeper of Hartford, Conn. He grew up in ignorance of his origin, and the clues furnished by the articles worn by him when he was found led to no further discoveries. Recently he became a waiter in the Lawton House at Stone Bridge, R. I., and worked there several months. Then he suddenly received a message from a dying man at Providence, who proved to be his grandfather, and was informed that he had fallen heir to a large fortune. An unexplained mystery hangs about the history of the boy. It is said that his relatives have all along known of his whereabouts and doings, but, for reasons not stated, did not make themselves known to him until the occurrence that has suddenly placed him in possession of ample wealth. The conduct of the boy's relatives seems, without explanation, very unnatural; and it is unaccountable that they should, while keeping themselves acquainted with his circumstances, have neglected to assist him or communicate with him. The condition of men in this world in relation to their Heavenly Father is exactly the reverse of this. While God is continually watching over them and doing them good they do not acknowledge Him (Isa. 51: 13-15).

Two Little Immigrants with Tags Affixed to them, as if they were freight, arrived in New York last week. They came from Manchester, England, and had made the voyage in the Spain. They were respectively eight and six years old, and are believed to be the youngest passengers who ever crossed the ocean without guardianship. The children stated that their mother came to this country three years ago, leaving them in the Industrial School at Manchester. A few weeks ago she paid their passage from Manchester to Philadelphia. There was no one coming this way in whose care the children could be placed. The manager of the school then fastened tags on their backs and had them sent to Liverpool, where they were placed on board the Spain. The tags bore the address of their mother in Philadelphia. They were placed on the Philadelphia train soon after their arrival in this city, and doubtless arrived safely after their long journey. The tags caused some little amusement to those who read them, but they saved some confusion and probably contributed to the safety of the little adventurers. Children cannot be secured from the perils they will encounter in their voyage through life by any such device, but parents can seek for them a better protection in the seal of the Spirit on their souls (Eph. 1: 13, 14).

A Lightning Bolt from a Clear Sky came near causing serious destruction on a farm at Granby, N. Y., on Tuesday, August 8th. An eyewitness states that he never before saw such a sight. Though a terrific thunder storm was raging over the cities of New York and Brooklyn at the time there was not at Granby any sound of thunder or signs of lightning, or a dark cloud overhead. Suddenly a lightning bolt fell, attracted, as he thinks, by a bronzed vane on the roof of the barn, attached by a heavy iron rod extending into an elm flag-staff. The latter was completely shattered and driven through the side of the building and into the earth. The new house was saved by the strong wind blowing in the right direction, but some lesser buildings were burned. No one was seriously injured, although the shock to the inmates of the house was great. Not a particle of rain fell for some time before or after the buildings burned. It is as a bolt out of a clear sky that the final termination of this dispensation with its accompanying terrors will come to many. To the believing student of prophecy there will be no such surprise. The sky is already overcast with signs of the impending end, and he, as commanded, is watching and praying (2 Peter 3: 3-9).

A Heartless Swindle has been Practised on a German immigrant who arrived at Castle Garden last October, but who having become dissatisfied with this country applied to the Commissioners of Emigration to be sent home. They declined going to that expense, as she was able to earn her living here. Finally she got together $20 and asked the assistant superintendent at Castle Garden if he could not procure her a passage ticket for that amount, but he replied that the sum was insufficient. On Wednesday, August 2d, the Hamburg steamship Frisia landed her immigrants at Castle Garden, and among these was a German named Julius Blassus. This man learned of his countrywoman's desire to return home, and one day last week he approached her and stated that he was a steamship agent and would give her a ticket for her home for $23, which was all the money she had in her possession. She gave him the money in return for a worthless order written on the back of a business card. With this money Blassus bought a railroad ticket for Wisconsin for himself, and his dupe soon afterward learned that she had been swindled. Far more heartless are those false priests who delude their dupes with the hope that they may secure a safe route to Heaven at death by gifts and penances. Too often that false hope is not detected until it is too late (Titus 3: 5).

ONE LION: TWO LIONS: NO LION AT ALL.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets."—Proverbs 22: 13.

"The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets."—Proverbs 26: 13.

A Pet Aversion—Slothful Men—Spiritual Sluggards—Not Lazy of Tongue—Nor of Imagination—I. A Lion—A Great Difficulty—The Ancient Order of Donomores—The Lions of Persecution—A Strange Place to Meet a Lion—The Real Lion—A Wonderful Lion-killer—II. Two Lions—The Trouble Increased by Waiting—One of the Devil's Old Soldiers—An Old Man's Regret—III. No Lion at all—The Lions Bunyan Saw—The Bird's Nest on a King's Tent.

THIS slothful man seems to cherish that one dread of his about the lions as if it were his favorite aversion, and he felt it to be too much trouble to invent another excuse. Perhaps he hugs it to his soul all the more because it is a home-born fear, conjured up by his own imagination; and as mothers are said to love their weakest children best, so is he fondest of this most imbecile of excuses; at any rate, it serves him for a passable excuse for laziness, and that is what he wants. If he can get the king of beasts to apologize for his idleness there is a sort of royalty about his pretences: he hopes his sloth will appear the less disgraceful if he can paint a lion rampant upon its shield.

I am not about to speak of

albeit that when a man does not diligently attend to his business he is committing great wrong to himself and to others. When a man is slothful as a servant he is unjust to his employers, and when he is in business on his own account idleness is usually a wrong to his wife and family. I know one who is the cause of poverty and want to those whom he ought to provide for; and all because honest labor and himself have long since fallen out. He would not move an inch if he could help it, nor even open his eyes if he could manage to live and sleep all his life away. When a man is thoroughly eaten up with the dry rot of laziness he generally finds some kind of excuse, though his crime is really inexcusable. "There is a lion in the way," and therefore the man judges it to be quite right that he should keep his bed, or that he should sit leisurely indoors, and should not give himself too much trouble or run any risks; but all this is a mere make-up to screen his loathsome vice.

No Christian ought to be slothful in his ordinary work: the apostle describes the good man as "not slothful in business"—of whatever kind that business may be. If you have a right to undertake it, if you have a right to continue in it, you have no right to be a sluggard in it. There should be as wide a division as between the poles between the thought of a Christian and the idea of a sluggard. "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily." An idler is a disgrace to himself, and if he professes religion he is a dishonor to it. Paul would starve him, for he says, "If any would not work, neither should he eat," and that is as near starvation as well can be. Popery may create and foster lazaroni, but the true faith bids every man eat his own bread.

I leave worldly sluggards to the moralist: doth not nature itself teach us to labor diligently? Man was not made for an idle life; labor is evidently his proper condition. Even when man was perfect he was placed in the garden, not to admire its flowers, but to keep it and to dress it. If he needed to work when he was perfect, much more does he require the discipline of labor now that he is fallen. Lions or no lions, men must work or find disease and death in sloth.

But we have many

and it is to them that I speak. They are not sceptics, they are not confirmed infidels, they are not opposers of the Gospel; perhaps their sluggish nature saves them from anything like energetic opposition to goodness. They claim that they are not averse to the Gospel: on the contrary, they are rather friendly to it, and one of these days they intend to be obedient to its great commands, and to yield themselves as servants to Christ; but not just yet, the good time has not fully arrived. They have a very comfortable bed of sloth upon which they lie, and they do not want to rise in a hurry and exert themselves too much. They want to take this matter very leisurely and turn to Christ when it is quite convenient—when it will not require so much self-denial as at the present moment.

Our texts speak concerning the sluggard, and you first notice about him that his tongue is not slothful: "The slothful man saith," "The man who is lazy all over is generally very busy with his tongue." "The slothful man saith, There is a lion without." In both texts the slothful man is represented as having something to say, and I think that there are no people that have so much to say as those that have little to do. Where nothing is done much is talked about. Their goodness begins and ends in mere lip service. They talk about repentance, but they do not repent. They are willing to hear about faith, and even to speak about it, but they do not believe. They extol zeal and fervor, but they like to see these active graces rather than to feel them. They will talk till midnight, but all ends in smoke.

His imagination also is not idle. There were no lions in the streets. One does not expect to find lions there. They may be in the desert; they may be in the jungle; they may be in the forest; but who expects to find lions in the streets of Jerusalem or the lanes of London? Laziness is a great lion-maker. He who does little dreams much. An idler will never be short of difficulties as long as he has no heart for work. As they say that any stick will do to beat a dog with, so any excuse will do to ruin your soul with; for this man's objection, after all, was not to lions in the way: he objected to the way itself, and he was glad to place a lion there, so that he might be excused from going into the street. He did not want to get to his work, and therefore there was a lion in the way to obstruct him. The lion was his friend. He had invented him on purpose to be the ally of his idleness.

Now, in dealing with the sluggishness and its vain excuse, my divisions to-night will be such that every child can take them home and recollect them. The first head will be a lion; the second will be two lions; and the third will be no lions at all. Those three headings will surely abide in everybody's memory, and they are fairly derived from the two texts.

I. The first is

"The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets." That is to say, it is time for him to get to the vineyard to work, but he does not get up, and he pretends that he is best in bed, for there is a lion outside the door. Would you have him risk his precious life, so valuable to himself, at any rate, if to nobody else? He turns over upon his bed to sleep again; for this is far more comfortable than to be meeting a lion, and falling a prey to his teeth.

He means, I think, that there is a great difficulty—a terrible difficulty, quite too much of a difficulty for him to overcome. He has heard of lion-tamers and lion-killers, but he is not one. He has not the strength and the vigor to attack this dreadful enemy; he will even confess that he has not sufficient courage for such an encounter. The terrible difficulty which he foresees is more than he can face: it is a lion, and he is neither Samson, nor David, nor Daniel, and therefore he had rather leave the monster alone. Are there not many here who say much the same? "Oh," they say to the preacher, "you do not know our position, or the peculiar circumstances and special trials under which we labor. We would gladly be saved, but we cannot live as Christian men: our trade is a difficulty, our poverty is a difficulty, our want of education is a difficulty, and the whole put together make up an impossibility; there is a lion in the way."

Yes, I know, that is what your relative said many years ago, and as long as there is any of your family left there always will be lions about; and you, being a true descendant of the slothful one—to speak honestly to you—can hear the lion roar under your window just as your great-grandfather's grandfather did in Solomon's time. I am persuaded that your sons and daughters, if they have the same mind as you have—that is, a mind unwilling to come to Christ—will hear the voice of the lions too; wonderful difficulties will be in their way, as they are in yours. The ancient order of the Donmores and the fruitful family of the Easys will keep their beds and their posts till the last trump shall sound. Though the promise is, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet," they have no heart for the conflict and therefore never win a victory.

Yes, but in this sluggard's case it was a very fierce lion. The Hebrew of the second text implies that it was a mighty lion that was in the street. His imagination pictured a very extraordinary monster, much larger than usual. And so, my dear friends, you have some difficulty much greater than anybody else ever had; at least, you talk as if this were the case. True, the martyrs swam through seas of blood to win the crown; and thousands were burned to ashes at the stake that they might be found faithful to Christ; but it would seem from your talk that those lions were nothing compared with your lion, which is of huge dimensions and extraordinary ferocity.

WHAT CAN THIS LION BE?

Perhaps if I were to examine a little closely it might come out that you are a great coward, and the lion a wretched cur not worth noticing. Your lion is a mere mouse: where is your manliness to tremble at so insignificant a trial? Perhaps you have an acquaintance who would be parted from you if you became a Christian. Is this your lion? It is a very young one. Or else you are following a bad trade, and a bad business, and you know that you would have to give them up. Is this all? Your shop would have to be shut on Sunday—is this the secret of the matter? You know that the tricks that you now practise, and that you find so profitable, you cannot practise if you become a Christian. Perhaps that is your lion.

I should not wonder, though you try to make others believe that it is so terrible, that you really cannot tell what it is; and yet you fondly dream that it quite excuses you for being what you are—an idle lie-abed, sleeping when the light of the Gospel is shining full in your face, and declining to decide for God and for Christ, though you know what the Lord requires of you.

Observe, again, that this sluggard said that there was a lion without, and he should be slain in the streets. It is rather a novel thing for people to be killed by lions in the streets. It has not occurred within my recollection, and I do not think that it is ever likely to occur; but still this man professed that he expected to be slain in the streets. In an age of liberty like this he is afraid to be a Christian because of persecution, for persecution would be the death of him. Oh, dear! In a time like this, when to be honest, to be upright, is, for certain, the best thing for this world as well as for the world to come, yet men still tell us that they would lose by being Christians; it would ruin their business, they could never make a living; they would be slain in the streets. If you had lived in Madagascar years ago, when to be a Christian involved your being hurled down a precipice or being speared, I could see something in the excuse; but in a land like this the persecutions which are endured may be bitter, and the losses which are incurred may be heavy; but they are hardly worth mentioning as compared with the sufferings of the first ages.

And then look at the base conclusion—"There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets," as if the lion would be sure to look for him if it did not meddle with anybody else, as if he was the only man in the street, and not one among hundreds equally in danger, if such danger there really were. The lion, for certain, would kill him, he was quite sure of it; "I shall be slain in the streets." This is how sluggards talk, as if all the troubles and trials that ever fell upon men that are decided for Christ would fall upon them; and whereas many of God's Daniels have lived in dens of lions and have been none the worse for it, they cannot look to Daniel's God, and they do not expect Daniel's rescue. They are sure that they shall be torn in pieces, though there be but one lion and that lion in the streets, where there would be protection near and shelter at hand.

Now, look ye, you that talk about the difficulties of being Christians. Are there no other Christians beside you? Will you be the only believers? When you are converted to God will you be all alone? Will there be none to help you? Is there no Christian brotherhood left among us? Are there no advanced saints who will help you as a young man to struggle against your doubts, and against the temptations that are in the way? Why, you know that you will not be alone in the streets of the Jerusalem of God. Once get into the city of God, which is His church, and you will be safe, for "no lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, but the redeemed of the Lord shall walk there;" and thus you shall be in the blessed company.

THE REAL LION,

after all, is sluggishness itself, aversion to the things of God. Oh, how many we have in the Tabernacle whom I have looked to see coming forward to profess their faith in Christ, but they have not come, and, for all that I can see, they are just where they were ten, twelve, twenty years ago. The real difficulty lies in this—that their heart is not right toward God. They have not yet humbly acknowledged their need of Jesus: it is too much trouble to confess their sins. They have not yet accepted the Lord Jesus as God presents Him, as the propitiation for sin. Oh, if they were in earnest about these things—if their hearts were really anxious to find Christ, they would not see this lion in the way. I am quite sure that the monster would soon disappear.

But, says one, "If I did come to Christ, I am persuaded that after a little while I should fall back." Be not so sure of that. If you give your heart to Christ, has He not promised to keep you? Is it not written, "I give unto My sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of My hand?" Do you think that you are to keep yourself from falling? If so, read this doxology, and try to sing it—"Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence with exceeding joy—unto Him be glory both now and ever."

"Yes, but I have tried," says one. Oh, that is your lion, is it? But how did you try? You tried in your own strength, I ween; and we do not invite you to do that any more, for your strength is perfect weakness. Had you committed yourself to the keeping of Christ you would have another tale to tell and another song to sing, for He is faithful, and He keeps those that are in His hand. If that is your lion, God grant that you may never hear it roar again. You are not asked to save yourself, or keep yourself, but to submit yourself to the grace of God, and surely that is able to keep you unto the end.

I have this to say to you before I pass to my second head. If there is a lion without,

IS THERE NO LION WITHIN?

That is to say, if you come to Christ and perish, you will most surely perish if you do not come to Him. If you live as you are, what must become of you? If you die as you are, what must be your lot? Without a Saviour to wash you from sin, and a Mediator to plead for you before God, what must be your eternal portion? Why, it would be better to go out among a thousand lions than to stay within and to perish in your sins. The lion within doors in your case will certainly destroy you; therefore up and away. Escape as a bird out of the snare of the fowler: that fowler is Satan, and his nets are the deceitfulness of sin.

If you do not feel that you can contend with the enemy—and certainly you cannot, without divine help—can you not cry for help? Our God hears and answers prayer; why not cry to the strong One for deliverance? Your lion is in the way. Shout, then, for a friend to come and help you; and within call there stands One who is a wonderful lion-killer. There is the Son of David. Did He not destroy the works of the devil when He was here? Still He shows Himself strong for the defence of all them that put their trust in Him. Call to Him, "My Jesus, deliver me from the lion," and He will be with you, and take the lion by the beard and slay him. Therefore, sluggard, your excuses will not do. They are broken vessels that hold no water. God help you to be weary of them.

II. We leave our friend, the sluggard, for a little while in the twenty-second chapter of Proverbs, and we turn on three or four pages, till we come to the twenty-sixth chapter, at the thirteenth verse, and there we find the gentleman again. The slothful man is still talking, and he says, "There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets." Is there any difference between this verse and the first one that I took for my text? Yes, I think there is this difference—that there are

He has waited because of that one lion, and now he fancies that there are two lions. He has made a bad bargain of his delay. He said that he would have a more convenient season, but where is it? It was inconvenient then because there was a lion. Is it more convenient now? Not at all, for now there are two lions. "There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the street." That is always the result of waiting: procrastination never profits; difficulties are doubled, dangers thicken. The countryman who had to cross the river foolishly determined to wait until the water had all gone past, for, at the rate it was going, he was quite sure that it must run dry; but when he had waited long, to his surprise he found that a flood had come down from the upland country, and the river was much deeper than it had been before: the river was not dried, but swollen.

Those who think, when they are young, that it will be so much more easy to seek and to find the Saviour when they reach manhood are greatly deceived. Those who think that they will wait till their family has grown up, or till they retire from business, for then they will be able to attend to it so much more easily, may live to discover that hardness of heart has come upon them as the result of delay. Life is like an evening: the longer you wait the darker it becomes. Delay bristles with danger, and the best fruit it can possibly bear is regret. When those who lingered are at length brought to Jesus, how much they wish that the precious years that have been wasted could come back to them. How heartily do they love that promise, "I will restore unto you the years which the locust hath eaten!"

You see in the second text there were two lions, and, according to the Hebrew, they were quite as bad as the other lion, for one of them was a young lion. "There is a young lion in the way." And the second Hebrew word implies a great lion. "A strong lion is in the streets." So now there were two active enemies—two unconquerable difficulties—instead of one; and, as an old Puritan observes, the first time when the sluggard looked down the street, and saw a lion lurking on the left, he could have gone the other way; but now when he looked out there was a lion to the right as well as to the left, and he could not go either way without facing a foe. With a lion at the front door and a lion at the back, there seemed to be no way of escape for him, and this was

THE WRETCHED RESULT OF WAITING.

And do not some of you who, years ago, hesitated over the difficulties of being a Christian find more difficulties now instead of less? When you were one-and-twenty you were deeply impressed, and conscience was aroused; only you said, "No, not just now. It will be easier soon." Certain cords of sin held you. But now you are forty. Well, what about it?

You have heard the Gospel so long that there is no novelty in it; and you know the excuses so well that you have got to be one of the devil's old soldiers, a veteran injured to war. You know how to get over the Gospel somehow; like an old fox, you know all the traps, and cannot be caught in them. You are sticking to the old trick about the lions; but now there are two lions, so you say. Thus you have a double-barrelled excuse.

How can I be so unreasonable as to expect you to come out often to a week-night service? You have three or four shops. How can you come out of a Sunday evening, some of you? You have half a dozen children. How is it possible that you should give much time to prayer? You are here, and there, and everywhere in your worldly calling! "Oh!" say you, "do not talk to us. Years ago it might have been possible for us to be Christians, but now, how can it be?" Therefore, I say to you young people, hasten to be blest. I beseech you do not delay. An old man took a little child up into his arms, and put his fingers into the abundant curls of his sunny hair, and he said, "Oh, dear child, while your mother sings to you, and tells you about Jesus, think of Him, and trust Him." "Grandpa," said the little boy, "don't you trust Him?" "No, dear," he said; "I might have done so years ago, but my old heart has got so hard now, nothing ever touches me now." And the old man dropped a tear as he said it. "I wish," said he, "that I had a curly head like yours, and was beginning life like you."

Oh, old man, are you here to-night? Let me tell you a secret. You may become a boy again. I am sure you may, for you may be born again; and he that is born again is but an infant, and starts on a new life with freshly given strength. He shall have softer feelings than nature lends to manhood. He shall have the feelings which grace alone can produce. In a spiritual sense his flesh shall come again unto him like that of a little child, though he cannot grow young again as to his bodily frame. The Holy Spirit can make him a new creature in Christ Jesus. But do not delay! Do not delay, you that are yet young.

III. That brings me to my last point, which is

NO LION AT ALL.

If there be here a man who would have Christ, there is no lion in the way to prevent his having Christ. "There are a thousand difficulties," says one. If thou desirest Christ truly, there is no effectual difficulty that can really block thee out from coming to Him. You notice that Solomon does not say that there were any lions in the way: he only tells us that the sluggard said so. Well, you need not believe a lazy man. The sluggard said it twice; but it did not make it true. Everybody knew what a poor fool he was, and that it was only in his own imagination that there were any lions at all. Do not believe your sluggish self, then, and do not believe the sluggish speeches of others. There are no lions except in your own imagination.

John Bunyan pictures lions at the gate of the interpreter's house, and, according to some commentators, he meant the deacons and elders of the church that are outside to watch those who desire to join the church. I am one of those horrible lions; but the happy thought is that the lions are changed. Whenever you wish to join the church, if you will only have courage to come and face us who are the dreadful lions in front of the palace gate, you will find that we are chained; and, what is more, if we were not chained we would not harm you. We do try to roar at those who are not our Master's children, and we would drive away all who come as thieves and robbers, for it is our duty to do so; but if you have a true heart, and wish to cast in your lot with the Lord's people, you shall not find that we are any terror to you. We shall be glad to say, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord. Wherefore standest thou without?" A believer's duty is to join a Christian church, therefore fear not the face of man.

I believe that some will never come to Christ until another and a real lion shall get at them, and then they will run to Jesus for shelter, lions or no lions. I mean if the lion of their sin should ever wake up and roar upon them terribly, then they will not say that there are lions in the way. I used to be terribly afraid to come to Christ until I came to be more afraid of my sin than of all things else in the world. And Mr. Bunyan, in one of his books, says that he pictured Christ in his own mind as standing with a drawn sword to keep him away, "but at last," says he, "I got so desperately worried by my convictions of sin that if the Lord Jesus had really stood with a pike in His hand, I would have thrown myself upon the point of it, for I felt that I must come at Him or perish."

Oh, throw yourself on the very point of the pike, for it is but in seeming that there is either pike or point. Hasten to Jesus, even though He seem to frown, for there is more love in a frowning Saviour than in all the world beside. He cannot mean it. No sinner comes to Him but Christ is more glad to receive him than the sinner is to be received. Nothing charms Jesus like seeing a poor troubled one come to Him. He will in no wise cast out one who does so.

I have heard of a king upon the crown of whose pavilion, when it was pitched, came and built their nests; and he was gentle of heart and truly royal, for he said to his chamberlain, "The tent shall never be taken down till the birds have hatched their young. They have found shelter in a king's pavilion, and they shall not have to rue it." And oh, if you will go like the swallows and the sparrows, and build your nests under the eaves of Christ, who is the temple of God, you shall never have your nest pulled down. Ay, and if you can lay your young there, they shall be safe too. There is no place half so secure for our children as Christ's bosom. All who are in Christ shall be kept in safety, and shall be blessed.

Oh, come along with you. Come, you that are afraid of lions. There are no lions. The way is clear and open, for Jesus says, "I am the way," and "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Why do you still say that you will come by and by? Do not trifle so. I had almost rather that you cried, "I will not come at all;" such perversity might end better than feigned promises and base delays. I pray God to give you a better mind than that, and may you say, "Yes, this very night, please God, I will be saved. The sun has gone down, but there is a little twilight left, and I will yield ere darkness quite sets in, I will now trust my Saviour, and hasten to Him, and seek Him on my knees in prayer." May the Spirit of God sweetly lead you to do this; and oh, our heart will be so glad of it. The Lord grant it, for His dear name's sake. Amen.

An Eloquent Defence of the Salvation Army, its teachings and methods, has been made by Mrs. Booth, the wife of the General of the Army. A defence was necessary, because several clergymen and evangelists, among whom was Henry Varley, have condemned recent departures, such as the dancing, as unseemly and irreverent. In the course of her address Mrs. Booth said that one critic had described the name of the Salvation Army as blasphemous. She thought it embodied the object of the movement, which was the salvation of the race, and one good thing about the name was it lacked any sectarian character. One gentleman declared that their proceedings were all excitement, in the midst of which people were told they were saved. Their Gospel was Christ's Gospel, which involved the giving up of sin, and walking in the light. Reality of conversion was evidenced by love and care for wife and family, honest service of employers, payment of old debts, even including public-house scores. Was that mere "music and excitement?" There were now awaiting their trial two men who had gone from the penitent forms of the Army, and given themselves up for the commission of murder. Was that mere "music and excitement?" Exception had been taken to the military method. She denied that God's resources for the salvation of the race were exhausted, or that He was tied down to any former regulations. There was much in the Bible to favor the assumption that a latter method for the salvation of the world would be a military one. It was to be observed that they had made their own army, and had not taken people out of the churches and chapels, but out of the gutters and slums, gin palaces and brothels. It is, however, evident, in spite of Mrs. Booth's eloquence, that the Army is in danger of gliding into paths which will end disastrously. It is matter for regret that when this danger is pointed out by true friends of the Army their warnings should be met with denunciation not far removed from scurrility.

Mr. M. R. Burns, the Deaf Mute Preacher.

Miss Mary Gault. (See page 517).

Major Gault, of the Hallelujah Army.

MR. M. R. BURNS.

The First Biblical Instructor to the Deaf and Dumb in London.

MATTHEW ROBERT BURNS was born at Dundee, Scotland, on the 10th of November, 1798. His father was a captain in the 84th Regiment. Matthew Robert, to the sorrow of his parents, was found to be a deaf mute, and it was decided that he should be educated at the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, by Dr. Joseph Watson. At the age of thirty-six he became head-master of the Deaf and Dumb School at Aberdeen, in the year 1834. In 1841 he resigned, and went to Bristol as head-master in another school, and in 1842 went to London, where he played an important part in originating the first Chapel for Deaf and Dumb people in the British metropolis.

In 1841, a gentleman named Crouch, himself the father of three deaf and dumb children, became interested in the welfare of the deaf and dumb children of London, and he opened a public religious service in the month of October, 1841, which has since developed into the Adult Institution for Providing Employment, Relief, and Religious Instruction for the Deaf and Dumb. The committee then engaged Mr. Burns, as highly qualified to teach those similarly afflicted in every branch of instruction calculated to bring them into communion with their fellow-men, and to lead them into an understanding of the Scriptures, and to a knowledge of salvation through Christ.

Mr. Burns continued to preach the Gospel with much success till the year 1866, when he relinquished all public work for a time, and lived almost in obscurity, befriended by a few generous people. About eight years ago he was afflicted with a tumor in the neck, also with bronchitis. He was never known to murmur during all his afflictions, but enjoyed much deep peace and abounding joy in Christ. His death took place on January 21st, 1879, in the eighty-first year of his age.

THE HALLELUJAH ARMY, AND AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF GENERAL GAULT.

I AM now thirty-six years of age. About eight years ago, in 1874, I was converted to God. My life up to that time had been spent in pleasure-seeking, but I had often been impressed with the need of salvation. Once, when a dear sister to whom I was attached went to be with Jesus, I promised God that I would serve Him, but my promises were like the morning cloud, and the early dew. They soon passed away, and I found myself once more with my companions in the whiskey shop and at the theatre.

For years after this I went on in sin, but God in mercy again brought me to feel my need of Christ, and in deep distress I looked to Him, and found peace to my troubled soul. I was afraid at first to speak of the change, as I dreaded the scoffs of my old companions, but a dear servant of God, James Adams, of Edinburgh, came to the village where I lived, to hold special meetings. At these meetings I consecrated myself to God, and promised with His help evermore to serve Him.

I little thought at this time that God was going to lead me out into the mission field. I joined the Primitive Methodist Church, and soon afterward was an accredited local preacher in the town of Paisley, Scotland, where I labored nearly three years, and then went to London. After seven months' active service for the Master there, I returned to Scotland for a little rest. I began to hold open-air services in the County Square, Paisley, and crowds of people came to these meetings.

SUCCESSFUL EVANGELISTIC WORK.

Going down the street one day I saw a bill with the words, "A hall to let." It was a dancing-hall at the back of a saloon, with a long, dark, dirty entrance, and held about one hundred persons; but it was without seats. I took a lease of it for three months. I made the seats myself to save expense, working at them during the day, and holding the open-air meetings at night. Soon the hall was seated, but it was far too small. There were larger halls in the town, but I was unable to pay the heavy rents. So I was compelled to labor on in the little place till I had saved from the collections taken at the meetings as much as paid the rent of a larger hall for Sundays. I continued to use the small hall for week nights, and the Temperance Hall for Sundays, until I heard of a grog-seller's cellar that was to let. It had once been a six-loomed weaving shop with a room and kitchen attached. I took a lease for twelve months, and started at once to pull down the partition, and made it into a hall that would hold rather more than four hundred people.

WHERE WERE THE SEATS TO COME FROM?

I had only what would accommodate one hundred. I told God all about it, and then went to the timber merchant and ordered what was wanted, believing that when the bill was to be paid He would send me the money; and He did so. God continued wonderfully to help me. At the meetings held in the little hall two carpenters had been saved, and with their assistance it was not long before we had made arrangements for seating four hundred people. The faithful preaching of Christ as the only remedy for fallen men was attended with the manifest blessing of God.

I had long thought of Ireland as a field of labor, having been there several times before my conversion. The number of poor people who attended no place of worship was laid on my heart; and on the 1st of May, 1880, two of our officers left for Ballymena; there they held up Jesus as "the Mighty to save," and before they were three months in that town one of the houses of ill-fame was closed; the woman who kept it was converted, as well as three or four of the unfortunate girls. This woman and one of the girls are at present in the town, and earning an honest livelihood.

Having made this town our headquarters we branched out to other towns. We have at present in the north of Ireland seven mission stations, in seven different towns. At each of these stations meetings are held every night in the week, both indoor and out, and hundreds have professed to find Christ. We have at present twelve paid agents in Ireland, also a number of cadets in the "Home" who are being trained for the work. Beside these we have six large stations in Scotland as well as many small ones.

Nearly all the paid officers that we have in the work were brought to the Lord at our meetings. The first that was engaged as an officer was standing one afternoon at the bar of a grog shop, with his companions, while we were holding an open-air meeting near by, and the singing attracted him. He followed to the hall, and God's Spirit convinced him of sin, and, to the surprise of all in the house where he lived, the next morning he went to church, and the following night he came to our meeting and found Christ. He was the first to go to Ireland, and is known in the Army as "Major Gillies." During the three years that the work has been going on, God has wrought wonders. Hundreds have been brought to repentance and salvation through our efforts, and many sleeping Christians have been quickened to a sense of their duty. Though we have been greatly blessed, yet we have had many difficulties. The collections taken at the meetings are relied upon to carry on the work, and we can truly say, "Hitherto the Lord has helped us," and "we will trust and not be afraid."

JOHN READE'S RESCUE FROM MATERIALISM.

IT was a dark, chill winter's day and the sky seemed heavy with a coming fall of snow. On the streets were very few pedestrians, and such as there were hurried with quick steps toward their destination anxious to escape the bitter wind that blew as if it had come direct from the region of eternal ice and snow.

Poor half-clothed beggars shivered under their rags at the street corners, and seeing no prospect of alms went in quest of the poor-honse or of some cheap lodging for the night.

Noticeable in the solitude of the usually busy streets was the figure of a man walking rapidly and with a firm erect bearing toward the outskirts of the city. He was tall and lithe, and his bearing betokened self reliance and energy. He could not have been over thirty, but his face was bronzed with travel and exposure, and though showing marks of intellectual culture, his occupation, of late at any rate, could not have been a sedentary one. Soon he was out of the business part of the city and entered a quiet street where the houses seemed to be occupied by private families and professional men. He stopped at the end of the street and opened the gate of a garden in the midst of which an old fashioned house could be seen through the trees. On the fence was a modest shingle on which was inscribed the words "Dr. Sedgwick."

Once inside the gate the traveller moderated his pace and finally came to a halt some dozen yards from the door. Some strange hesitation came over him and he appeared half inclined to retrace his steps. Then he apparently came to a decision, and mounting the stoop he rang the bell. When the door was opened he inquired, "Is Mrs. Reade at home?" and receiving an affirmative answer he entered and bade the help tell Mrs. Reade that "a friend wished to see her."

After a few minutes waiting in a room which seemed very familiar to the visitor, a lady entered. She was fashionably but neatly dressed, and her face, of almost childish beauty, wore a look of innocent wonder. She stood for a moment regarding her visitor with intense earnestness, and then with a cry of joy nestled in his outstretched arms, exclaiming, "My husband! my darling husband!"

This was the moment to which John Reade had looked forward for more than two long years during which he had been separated from his young wife. As she held him off at arm's length to note the changes time and travel had produced in the bronzed bearded face before her, he saw the look of love in her eyes, and once more clasped her to his breast in joyful gladness. Then she wanted to hear an account of his adventures and unexpected return, but before he could give it, the door was thrown open and John Reade was overwhelmed with hearty greetings from a group of delighted friends. Dr. Sedgwick, who was Mrs. Reade's father, had been driving with another daughter and two friends, and returning had heard of his son-in-law's arrival and rushed at once to the room where he was, to give him cordial welcome.

"I am delighted to see you, Reade," said Dr. Sedgwick, grasping with both hands Reade's extended palms, "you are just in time for a regular round of entertainments and new year's parties; you will have quite a public ovation, coming in like this as if you were an angel flying among us without a word of preparation."

"But I am only here for a day," said Reade; "to-morrow night I am off again for another two months trip and then I am coming back to stay."

The announcement brought a look of consternation and disappointment to every face in the group, and entreaties that a least for the new year's week Reade would postpone his departure. But Reade said, no; it was a case like that of Longfellow's standard bearer, he must refuse all entreaties, and if his motto was not "excelsior," it was "forward." So in spite of the pleading of his wife and her sister and Dr. Sedgwick he remained firm.

Dr. Sedgwick's Welcome to John Reade.

Reade was an ambitious man who, having devoted himself to the study of chemistry and medicine, had accepted an appointment which involved frequent and prolonged absence from home. He did this to increase his own knowledge as well as to gain for himself a public reputation. Dr. Sedgwick was proud of his son-in-law, and had approved of his course, and with true fatherly kindness consoled his daughter Emily for her husband's absence.

That night John Reade related his adventures since leaving home, and the family party was thrilled by a narrative of danger and of hair-breadth escape from death by drowning, from wild beasts, and by savage hands. At its conclusion Dr. Sedgwick proposed that they should all unite in offering thanks to God for His preserving care over one so dearly loved. John Reade for his part showed some reluctance, which did not escape his father-in-law's notice, though it was a mere look unobserved by the others, and a fervent prayer was offered by Dr. Sedgwick.

The next day Dr. Sedgwick spoke privately to Reade of this reluctance and asked him its cause. Then Reade said that during his journey he had been studying the works of Condillac and had been led to doubt the existence of the soul, and finally had abandoned his faith in God Himself. This was a sad blow to Dr. Sedgwick, who, though a learned man and a skilful physician, was an earnest Christian, and he begged of his son-in-law to go over the whole matter with him as soon as he returned, and meanwhile to read the Bible carefully and not to trust too implicitly to theories and speculations of men.

During the next two months while Reade was absent Dr. Sedgwick's daily prayer was that the Holy Spirit might enlighten the mind of the young man, and in some way convince him that there was in the human organism something which the surgeon's knife had never found and which came from God Himself. He also carefully went over the process of reasoning by which he when a young man similarly assailed had arrived at a conclusion far away from materialism. Thus fortified by prayer and thought he looked forward with confidence to his son-in-law's return.

The day came and with it the eagerly expected traveller. But there was no need of discussion. Reade was, to Dr. Sedgwick's delight, already a convinced man. During his journey he had visited a hospital where lay an aged man who while suffering from an incurable disease had been fearfully crushed and mangled in a railroad accident. Reade had never witnessed suffering such as the old man endured from his injuries and his disease. He expected to find him overwhelmed, but instead, he saw him, even in the paroxysms of his agony, calmly looking forward to release, and confident in the belief that his soul would be carried into the presence of his crucified, glorified Saviour. The soul was uninjured, and while the body was racked and tortured, the man himself seemed to rise above his frame. Reade saw him die and heard his last triumphant words, and he came away from that death bed a believer in the immortality of the soul and the truths of revelation. God had answered prayer, and the student who might have resisted Dr. Sedgwick's arguments was overcome by the spectacle of a Christian's death-bed.

That Honesty is the best Policy every School boy has heard, but the motive to which it appeals is so low that the proverb is suspected of having been invented by some one who had tried the other alternative. A Cincinnati journal relates an incident which it states occurred recently and which shows that even the good policy is doubted by unprincipled men. A prominent politician had among his supporters a large number of disreputable men who were kept true to him mainly by the influence of one idle dissolute fellow who had great influence with them. The politician found that his hogs were being shot and discovered that his influential supporter was the offender. He was afraid to offend the man, and at last approached him with an offer. He said: "Say, look here. I want you to quit shooting my pigs. I desire to allow them to grow to a proper size before they are killed, and I want to kill them myself. If you will give me your word that you'll not shoot any more of them, I'll agree to give you 500 pounds of pork a year. What do you say? Is it a bargain?" "All right," replied the other; "I give you my word that I'll not kill any more of your swine on the terms you propose; but—" after a pause, "I'll lose pork by it." The frank admission indicated that the bargain was made with reluctance and that his observance of it would be doubtful. There is reason to fear from certain recent scandals that some men professing to be Christians have the same lack of principle. Their minds are so troubled by missing dishonest gains that they have resorted to trickery to make up the deficiency. It should never be forgotten that the Bible is very explicit on this question of money worship (1 Tim. 6: 9, 10).

WEE DAVIE.

The Oil of Consolation.

THE Minister rose to depart. Before doing so, he asked permission to pray, which was cheerfully granted. Wishing to strengthen the faith, in prayer, of those sufferers, he first said, "If God cannot hear and answer prayer, He is not all-perfect and supreme; if He will not, He is not our Father. But blessed be His name, His own Son, who knew Him perfectly, prayed Himself, and was heard in that He prayed. He heard, too, every true prayer addressed to Himself; while He has in His kindness furnished us with an argument for prayer the truth and beauty of which we parents can of all men most appreciate; 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him!'"

The doctor then poured forth a simple, loving, and most sympathizing prayer, in which he made himself one with his fellow-worshippers, and expressed to a common Father the anguish and the hopes of the hearts around him. When it ended, he went to the bed, and looked at the sleeping child, touched his white hand, and said, "God bless your little one! May this sleep be for health."

"It's the first sleep," said Jeanie, "he has had for a long time. It may be a turn in his complaint."

The minister then shook them both warmly by the hand, and gazed on them with a world of interest in his eyes, asking them only to consider kindly what he had said.

The silence which ensued for a few minutes after his absence, as William and Jeanie returned from the door and stood beside the bed, was broken by the smith observing, "I am glad that man came to our house, Jeanie. Yon was indeed preaching that a man can understand and canna forget. It was wee Davie did it." "That's true," said Jeanie; "thank God for 't!" And after gazing on the sleeping child, she added, "Is he no bonnie? I dinna wunner that sic a bairn should bring guid to the house."

That night William had thoughts in his heart which burned with a redder glow than the coals upon the smithy fire!

It was a beautiful morning in spring, with blue sky, living air, springing grass, and singing birds; but William Thorburn had not left his house, and the door was shut. Mrs. Fergusson trod the wooden stair that led to the flat above it with slow and cautious step; and as she met her boy running down whistling, she said, "What d'ye mean, Jamie, wi' that noise? Do ye no ken wee Davie is dead? Ye should hae mair feeling, laddie!"

The Corporal, whose door was half-open, crept out, and in an underbreath beckoned Mrs. Fergusson to speak to him. "Do you know how they are?" he asked, in a low voice.

"No," she replied, shaking her head. "I sat up wi' Mrs. Thorburn half the night, and left Davie sleeping, and never thocht it would come to this. My heart is sair for them. But since it happened the door has been barred, and no one has been in. I somehow dinna like to intrude, for, nae doot, they will be in an awfu' way about that bairn."

"I don't wonder—I don't wonder!" remarked the Corporal, meditatively; "I did not believe I could feel as I do. I don't understand it. Here am I, who have seen men killed by my side—who have seen a few shots cut down almost half our company; and—"

"Is it possible?" interposed Mrs. Fergusson.

"It is certain," said the Corporal; "and I have charged at Pampeluna—it was there I was wounded—over dead and dying comrades, yet, will you believe me? I never shed a tear—never; but there was something in that Captain—I mean the boy—and the Corporal took out his snuff-box, and snuffed vehemently. "And what a brave fellow his father is! I never thought I could love a Radical; but he is not what you call a Radical; he is—I don't know what else, but he is a man—an out-and-out man, every inch of him. I'll say that for him—a man is William Thorburn! Have you not seen his wife?"

"No, poor body! It was six o'clock when she ran up to me, no distracted either, but awfu' quiet like, and wakened me up, and just said, 'He's awa', and then afore I could speak she ran doon the stair, and steekit her door; and she has such a keen spirit, I dinna like to gang to bother her. I'm unco wae for them."

They both were silent, as if listening for some sound in William Thorburn's house, but all was still as the grave.

The first who entered it that morning were old David Armstrong and his wife. They found Jeanie busy about her house, and William sitting on a chair, dressed better than usual, staring into the fire. The curtains of the bed were up. It was covered with a pure white sheet, and something lay upon it which they recognized.

Jeanie came forward, and took the hand of father and mother, without a tear on her face, and said quietly, "come ben," as she gave her father a chair beside her husband, and led her mother into an inner room, closing the door. What was spoken there between them I know not.

William rose to receive old David, and remarked in a careless manner, that "it was a fine spring day."

David gave a warm squeeze to his hand, and sat down. He soon rose and went to the bed. William followed him, and took the cloth off the boy's face in silence. The face was unchanged, as in sleep. The flaxen curls seemed to have been carefully arranged, for they escaped from under the white cap, and clustered like golden wreaths around the marble forehead and cheeks. William covered up the face, and both returned to their seats by the fireside.

"I never lost ane since my ain wee Davie dee'd, and yours, Willie, was dear to me as my ain," exclaimed the old man, and then broke down, and sobbed like a child.

William never moved, though his great chest seemed to heave; but he seized the poker, and began to arrange the fire, and then was still as before.

By and by the door of the inner room opened, and Jeanie and her mother appeared, both of them composed and calm. The same scene was repeated as they passed the bed. Mrs. Armstrong then seated herself beside her husband.

Jeanie, placing a large Bible on the table, pointed to it, and said, "Father." She then drew her chair near the smith.

David Armstrong put on his spectacles, opened the Bible, and selecting a portion of Scripture, reverently said, "Let us read the Word of God." The house was quiet. No business on that day intruded itself upon their minds. It was difficult for any of them to speak, but they were willing to hear. The passages which old David selected for reading were 2 Samuel 12: 15-23, on the sorrow of King David when he lost his child; Matthew 9: 18-26, containing the history of the raising up of the daughter of Jairus; and John 11: 1-44, with its memorable narrative of the darkness of mysterious sorrow, and the light of unexpected deliverance experienced by Martha and Mary of Bethany.

Having closed the Book, he said, with a trembling but solemn voice, "God, who doeth all things according to the counsel of His own will, has been pleased to send us a heavy affliction. 'The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away! May He enable us to say at all times, 'Blessed be the name of the Lord.' For whether He gives or takes away, He is always the same in love and mercy toward us, and therefore ought to have the same confidence from us. In truth, if He takes away, it is but to give something better, for He afflicts us in order to make us partakers of His holiness. Our little one is not dead, but only sleepeth."

Here David paused, but recovering himself, said, "Yes, his body sleepeth in Jesus till the resurrection morning. He himself is with Christ. He is alive, in his Father's bosom. Oh, it is strange to think o't, and hard to believe! but, blessed be God! it's true, that—that—Jesus Christ, who sees us, sees him, and sees us thegither, ay, at this vera moment!—" continued David, thoughtfully, like one pondering on a new truth; "this very moment we are all in His sight! Oh, it's grand and comforting; our wee Davie is in the arms of Jesus Christ!"

A solemn silence ensued. "The bonnie bairn will never return to us," continued the elder, "but we shall go to him, and some o' us ere lang, I hope. Let us pray." And they all knelt down, and a true prayer, from a true heart, was spoken from suffering parents, to Him "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."

To David's surprise and great satisfaction, he heard William utter Amen to his prayer, which included honest confession of sin; expressions of thankfulness for mercies, among others, for the great gift of their child, thus taken away, for all he had been, and for all he then was; with trustful petitions for the forgiveness of sin, and grace to help in this their time of need.

That afternoon Dr. McGavin called, and manifested quiet, unobtrusive, but most touching sympathy. His very silence was eloquent affection.

"I'm proud to meet wi' you, sir," said old Armstrong, after the doctor had been seated for a while. "Altho' I'm no o' your kirk, yet we're baith o' ae kirk for a' that."

"With one Father, one Brother, one Spirit, one life, one love, one hope!" replied Dr. McGavin.

"True, sir, true, our differences are nothing to our agreements."

"Our non-essential differences arise out of our essential union, Mr. Armstrong. For if we differ honestly and conscientiously as brethren, I hope it is because we differ only in judgment as to how to please our Father and our eldest Brother. Our hearts are one in our wish to do their will. For none of us liveth or even dieth to himself."

"Ay, ay, sir. So it is, so it is! But as the auld saying has't, 'The best o' men are but men at the best.' We maun carry ane another's burdens; and ignorance, or even bigotry is the heaviest ony man can carry for his neebor. Thank God, however, that brighter and better times are coming! We here see thro' a glass darkly; but then face to face. We know only in part, then shall we know even as we are known. In the mean time, we must be faithful to our given light, and, according to the best o' our fallible judgment, serve Him and not man."

"There are differences among living men," replied the minister, "but none among the dead. We shall agree perfectly only when we know and love as saints, without error and without sin."

"I mind," said David, warming with the conversation, and the pleasure of getting his better heart out—"I mind twa neighbors o' ours, and ye'll mind them, too, gudewife? that was Johnny Morton and auld Andrew Gebbie. The one was a keen Burgher, and the t'ither an Anti-Burgher. Baith lived in the same house, tho' at different ends, and it was the bargain that each should keep his ain side o' the house aye weel thatched. But they happened to dispute so keenly about the principles o' their kirks, that at last they quarrelled, and didna speak at a'!"

"So ae day after this, as they were on the roof thatching, each on his ain side, they reached the tap, and looking ower face met face. What could they do? They couldna flee. So at last, Andrew took aff his Kilmarnock cap, and scratching his head, said, 'Johnnie, you aid me, I think, hae been very foolish to dispute as we hae done concerning Christ's will about our kirks, until we hae clean forgot His will about ourselves; and so we hae fought sae bitterly for what we ca' the truth, that it has ended in spite. Whatever's wrang, it's perfectly certain that it never can be right to be uncivil, unneighborly, unkind, in fac, tae hate ane another. Na, na, that's the deevil's wark, and no God's! Noo, it strikes me that maybe it's wi' the kirk as wi' this house; ye're working on ae side and me on the t'ither, but if we only do our wark weel, we will meet at the tap at last. Gie's your lian', auld neighbor!' And so they shook han's, and were the best o' freens ever after."

"Thank you, Mr. Armstrong, for the story," said Dr. McGavin. Then looking to the bed, he remarked, "Oh, if we were only simple, true, and loving, like little children, would we not, like that dear one, enter the kingdom of heaven, and know and love all who were in it, or on their way to it?"

"I'm glad I have met you, sir," resumed the old Elder. "It does ane's heart good to meet a brother who has been a stranger. But if it hadna been for his death, we might never have met ! Isna that queer ? God's ways are no our ways !"

"God brings life to our hearts out of death," replied the minister, "and in many ways does He ordain praise from babes and sucklings, whether living or dead."

And thus a quiet chat was kept up for a time round the fireside, full of genial Christian cheerfulness. There was light in that dwelling on many a question, for there was love—love intensified by sorrow, as the last rays of evening become more glorious from the clouds round the setting sun.

"With your permission, good friends," said Dr. McGavin, "I will read a short psalm and offer up a short prayer before I go." He selected the 23d His only remark, as he closed the Bible, was, "The good Shepherd has been pleased to take this dear lamb into His fold, never more to leave it."

"And may the lamb be the means of making the auld sheep to follow !" added the elder.

PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES SILENCED.

S.S. Lesson for Aug. 27, Mark 12 : 13-27. Golden Text, Matt. 7 : 28, 29, and 1 Tim. 4 : 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Spiritual Power Attributed to Wrong Causes—A Trap Laid—Christ's Mode of Answering—The Image and Superscription—Of Amusements—Of Dress—Opposing Parties United Against Christ—The Snare of the Sadducees—Spiritual Perception Lacking—Two Kinds of Ignorance—Knowledge and Experience—Death a Temporary Condition.

THE chief priests, scribes, and elders felt that they were put to the worst before Jesus. "Never man spake like this Man" (John 7 : 46), and they felt it deeply. They, with all the power of ecclesiastical position at their back, they, the recognized spiritual leaders of the day, felt that "He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes" or, as another Scripture says, "His word was with power" (Luke 4 : 32). Nothing angers unspiritual teachers so much as to feel the power of the Holy Ghost in the words of others. They try by every means to explain it away ; some will call it mesmeric influence, some designate it the power of a strong mind over a weak one ; others do not hesitate to imply that it is the work of the enemy of souls ; but there it is, a power, a felt power, and one which they cannot crush out.

But these men were determined to try it. The popularity and the personal power of this simple Jesus of Nazareth was intolerable to them.

FOILED THEMSELVES.

"They send unto Him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians to catch Him in His words." How little they knew the task they were attempting ! Jesus said to His disciples, "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself ; but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works" (John 14 : 10). There was nothing in the words of Jesus which man or devil could lay hold of, they were all divine. That which is human can dispute and overcome that which is human, but that which is divine must stand. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away" (Luke 21 : 33).

One thing is very striking ; in all the attempts of Christ's enemies, we never see them making an appeal to anything personal in Him. His every word and deed was evidence that He did not live for Himself and that He knew no personal consideration. Therefore the ground on which they sought to entrap Him, was the law of God ; they would have Him take sides in some of the questions of the day, and by this means seek a ground of condemnation against Him. But they knew not Him with whom they had to do, they knew not that He is above all parties, all questions.

They weighed their words with the utmost care, and approached Him with an apparent confidence in Him and in His teaching. "Master, we know that Thou art true, and carest for no man ; for Thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth : Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not ? Shall we give, or shall we not give ?" But Jesus was not to be blinded by words of apparent trust in Him, and appreciation of His teaching. Under the bland tones of courtesy He heard tones of treachery, under the eyes which outwardly manifested only ingenuous desire to know the truth He detected the falsity of the heart. "He, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye Me ?" All their disguise was useless. He who could decipher hearts was there, and they must have felt small when He said, "Why tempt ye Me ? Bring Me a penny, that I may see it. And they brought it. And He saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription ? They say unto Him, Cæsar's. And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."

THEY HAD MISCALCULATED.

This was no such answer as they had looked for. They knew the law : "Thou shalt in anywise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose : one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee : thou mayest not set a stranger over thee who is not thy brother" (Deut. 17 : 15). With all the sophistry with which they were so well acquainted, they would have found no difficulty in proving that if Jesus decided they should give tribute to Cæsar, He was teaching that which was contrary to the law of God. If, on the other hand, He decided that they should not do so, then they had a ground of condemnation against Him as a rebel against the Roman yoke. Jesus always answered His questioners by leading them

OUT OF THEIR DEPTH.

And what an answer is this to all questionings ! How repeatedly the question arises, "What do you think of amusements ? Do you think there is any harm in a quiet card party ?" Let me ask in the name of my Lord, "Whose is this image and superscription ?" Is this God's card party, brought together for God, and by God ? or is it the world's card party bearing the world's stamp and the world's superscription ? Is it a thing which the world owns, or is it not of the world even as Christ was not of the world ? "But you would not say it was necessary to change one's dress, and to be peculiar in appearance ?" Again I would ask, Whose image and superscription does your dress bear ? God's or the world's ? If by it you are better known as a child of God, good, praise God for it ; if by it you are mistaken for a worldling, because the image and superscription of the world is on it, then you are liable to our Lord's most cutting rebuke, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's ;" if you are of the world, be heart and soul for the world, be a whole man for one thing ; if you are God's be all for God, within and without, let there be no reserves.

The Lord teach us this lesson. O God try us, show us whose image and superscription is upon us, and make us true to Him in whose image we were created and after whose image we are created anew in Christ Jesus ; God calls us to live in a holy and continual independence of the world. Let it have its own, "Render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's." The world loves honor, let it have all the honor it craves, but, O Christian, don't you seek after it : the world loves pleasure, let it have its pleasure ; it has nothing better, but O, child of God, don't you go and drink at such a miserable fountain. Let Cæsar have his own, but O let God have His rights. Are you His ? then be His out and out, let Him have you altogether. The questioners "marvelled at Him," but they could not answer Him, they could not overcome Jesus.

"Then came unto Him the Sadducees." The chief priests, scribes, elders, Pharisees, and Herodians had tried their utmost ; these last two sects, themselves opposed in their tenets, united to dispute with Jesus, and now the Sadducees, the rationalists of those days, would try their hand. "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit : but the Pharisees confess both" (Acts 23 : 8). These men attempted to ridicule the teaching of Jesus. They proposed to Him a very unlikely case, of the application of that law of the Jews (Deut. 25 : 5) which refers to the brother taking to him the childless brother's wife. They said, "Now there were seven brethren : and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed. And the second took her, and died, neither left he any seed ; and the third likewise. And the seven had her, and left no seed : last of all the woman died also. In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them ? for seven had her to wife. And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God ? For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage ; but are as the angels which are in heaven."

O how clearly we see from this and other passages how "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God : for they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2 : 14). God is far above us, and when we cannot understand Him, let us believe that there are heights and depths hidden as yet from our view. The Sadducees had no idea of any order of things beyond their carnal conceptions, and Jesus blamed their ignorance.

"YE DO ERR,

because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God." It is our privilege to be acquainted both with the Scriptures and with the power of God ; the Scriptures, without the power, fill us with head knowledge, and lead us to self-deception ; the power of God without the Scriptures has led into the most grievous extravagancies : Jesus would have us know both.

It is a pitiabie thing to see a man full of knowledge, able to expound any passage of Scripture, and yet to see that his words have no weight, because they do not come filled with the power of the Holy Ghost. Alas this is not an unusual thing ! God says to such a man, "Thou dost err, because thou knowest not the power of God." A man who is satisfied to go on without hearing in his own soul, and producing in his work, the fruit of the Spirit of God, is one who knows not what it is to give himself up to be the instrument of the Holy Ghost, and no wonder such an one falls into silly reasonings like the Sadducees, or bitter opposition of that which is true and real like the Pharisees.

Our beloved Lord sought to lead the Sadducees a step farther. He said, "And as touching the dead that they rise ; have ye not read in the book of Moses how in the bush God spake unto him saying, I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob ? He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living ; ye therefore do greatly err." Had they been open to conviction, such reasoning must surely have convinced them ; they were, however, not enquirers but critics, they did not love the truth for the truth's sake, and experience has taught us that the clearest, most self-evident truth is utterly incomprehensible to those who are unwilling to receive it. But O how precious is this truth to us, God is the God of the living. Death is not death in His sight, for He is the Resurrection and the Life, and our beloved ones who sleep in Him are His, and He is theirs, and is not ashamed to be called their God.

O how we see the temporary nature of death to the believer, and the blessedness of having and knowing, and walking and talking with a living God, eternally the God of the living, who are "alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6 : 11). How can He forget us when He calls Himself our God ? How can we lack any good thing with such a God, really, actually engaged on our behalf, to defend, to keep, to purify, to educate us ! If we know the Scriptures and the power of God, how shall any question with us remain an open question ? How can anything remain a difficulty ? How ready He would have been to take all these questioning Jews to His heart, to find out the real hunger of their hearts, and to satisfy it ! Let us not be like them, but welcoming every thing which brings us on an errand to Him, let us sit at His feet with Mary, and learn of Him, and love Him and trust Him, because we believe in the mighty power of His love, which is gone out, and is ever going out towards us. Lord overcome us by Thy love, that we may be conquered and won by Thee !

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Lord Mayor of London in Giving a Banquet to the Cabinet has afforded Mr. Gladstone an extra-parliamentary opportunity of defending his policy. In the speech in which he returned thanks for the customary complimentary toast, Mr. Gladstone said: "We do not go to war with the Egyptian people, but to rescue them from the oppression of military tyranny; nor do we make war upon the Mohammedan religion, as Englishmen respect the convictions of believers in every other faith. We do not want to repress the growth of liberty in Egypt, but desire that she be prosperous. England goes to Egypt with clean hands, and with no secret intention to conceal from other nations. There is a class of men beside the military who require to be overawed—who were the instruments of former oppression, and who wish well to military tyranny because they would provide for the revival of abuses and cruelty already extinguished or mitigated."

The Conflict Between the Two Houses of the British Parliament has ended in the surrender of the Lords after an unimportant concession on the part of the Lower House. The Commons amended their bill in the direction desired by the Lords to the extent of granting landowners a lien on the money for which a tenant in arrears might sell his tenant right; but the lien was only to be to the extent of one year's rent. Thus altered, the Lords accepted the bill, though the Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservatives, was still opposed to the measure. He frankly stated that the decision to abandon opposition was due to a meeting of conservative peers at his residence, which had decided, by an overwhelming majority, that, in view of the state of affairs in Ireland and Egypt, it was not expedient to reject the Arrears bill. He said he was not of that opinion, but that he found himself in a small minority.

Serious Discontent has Broken out Among the Irish police. The duties of the force have been very onerous of late and have been attended with considerable danger. The men consequently made a claim for an increase of pay, and a sum worth $900,000 was voted them for extra service, but owing to the dilatoriness of some officials it was not promptly distributed. Then the men assembled and decided that if their grievances were not considered and remedied they would resign in a body. The Government was thus confronted with the prospect of adding to the disaffected classes in Ireland a large body of trained and disciplined men. A foolish inspector further complicated matters by addressing the men in insulting language as traitors. On Thursday, August 10th, the Lord Lieutenant succeeded by the exercise of tact in averting the danger, and the men have formally agreed that if their grievances are remedied promptly they will continue to perform their duties.

Turkish Troops are being prepared for a campaign in Egypt. This important step has been taken with a precipitancy unusual in Turkish affairs, and the credit of having aroused the Sultan to action is said to be due to the skill with which Lord Dufferin, the British Minister, has conducted the negotiations. It is the custom of Turkey to haggle about trifles and to pursue a dilatory policy in diplomacy, but Lord Dufferin when presenting the British demand stated that if any delay occurred the Sultan would be considered to have rejected the proposals and England would act alone. The British Government stipulated that the Turkish contingent should be under the command of Sir Garnet Wolseley, but that condition has been modified to avoid humiliating the Sultan. England will not now insist on having the command, but stipulates that Ottoman troops shall not be moved without the previous assent of Sir Garnet Wolseley. Turkey will perhaps overcome the difficulty by putting the Ottoman troops under the control of the Khédive. The Sultan has prepared a proclamation denouncing Arabi as a rebel, in accordance with the English demand. The proclamation is to be published when the Turkish troops land, and states that "Arabi Pasha, having a second time transgressed the law by taking authority which does not belong to him, and having presumed to menace the vessels belonging to an old and tried friend and ally of Turkey, is for these misdeeds proclaimed a rebel, together with his adherents. Be it known to all that obedience is due solely to the Khédive, who is the representative of the Sultan." The Sultan has directed that an addition to the proclamation be made, declaring Arabi Bey a rebel unless he shall submit, on the ground that in resisting he acts contrary to the precepts of the Koran. Importance is attached to this express mention of the Koran against Arabi. The Ministers are said to have sat throughout the night discussing the terms of this proclamation.

A New Cabinet has been Formed in France to succeed that of M. de Freycinet. Senator Duclerc is the new Premier. He has had some experience of official work, having held the post of Minister of Finance, which he ably filled. His entry into public life was during the revolution of 1848, when he was called to assist in the organization of the city of Paris. Without entering much into the political discussions of the day he devoted himself to the duties of his office, organizing the police of the city on the model of those of London and introducing various municipal reforms. The other members of the Cabinet are in several cases men who served under M. de Freycinet, and in others men of some eminence at the bar and in the Legislature. It is generally considered as a temporary, expedient, the existence of which will be short-lived. The Premier, in explaining his policy to the chambers, stated that his efforts would be directed to reuniting the various sections of the Republican party, and as to Egypt that the new ministry recognized in the vote refusing money for an Egyptian expedition an indication of the national will and by no means an act of abdication, but a vote of prudence and reserve, and would loyally accept its spirit.

A Man Arrested for Complicity in the Murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Bourke is now on his way to Great Britain from Venezuela. He was arrested on his own confession to the British Consul at that port. Some doubt is entertained by the detectives as to his sincerity which will not be cleared up until his arrival and examination. He gives, however, a very connected and rational account of the manner in which he escaped after the tragedy, and a belief is growing that the man is rightly accusing himself.

The Total Wreck of the Mosel, a German steamer well known in this port, occurred on August 9th. She was on her way from Southampton to New York when the accident occurred. She went ashore near Lizard Point. The passengers were landed by the steamer Rosetta, of Falmouth. A thick fog prevailed at the time of the accident. The Mosel left Southampton with from six hundred to seven hundred passengers. The weather was calm. Suddenly the vessel struck the rocks near the Lizard with great force. There was no panic. Nine boats were got out and the Lizard lifeboat was launched. The steamer Rosetta landed all the passengers and the mails. Divers report that her bottom, from stem to foremast, is smashed. The other part of the vessel is uninjured. The water from forward has flowed aft, and is now over the main deck to the mainmast at low water. She is submerged from the stem to the entrance of the saloon and nothing can be saved without the aid of divers.

The Value of American Mission Work in Egypt is being recognized by the newspaper correspondents sent to that country to describe the war. One of them writes. "The operations which have been left to Americans alone in Egypt are those which faster than all others were preparing the people of the country for being able to realize their favorite dream of 'Egypt for the Egyptians.' Every one who has made the voyage of the Nile and been in contact with the Egyptian people knows how utterly incapable they are of anything approaching self-government. Give young Egypt the power of government and you put a keen-edged tool in the hands of an infant. The tact and general intelligence necessary for the right use of power are totally wanting. The average Egyptian is ignorant and degraded, and therefore must be educated intellectually and morally before he can be intrusted with the protection of his own liberties, or before he can really comprehend the true idea of liberty. This education is just what the little band of Americans in Egypt are giving to the people of Egypt. Dr. Ellenwood, who, a few years ago, made the tour of the missionary world, pronounced the American Mission in Egypt one of the most successful missions in the world. Since then the outward tangible success of the mission has trebled itself. From Alexandria on the sea, to Assouan at the first cataract are found scattered all along the valley the teachers and schools—evangelists and colporteurs, sent out and controlled by the American Mission. At the close of the last year there were fifty-four schools whose teachers were educated in the mission institutions. So far has the work of education already advanced that the mission reports the sale, during 1881, of 27,150 volumes of books, religious and educational, for which was received the sum of $6243. About one-third of all the books sold were sacred Scriptures, making the Bible distribution in Egypt almost double that of all Syria."

A Vivisector was Stopped at the Palace of Trocadéro, in Paris, on Sunday, July 19th. A physiologist—M. Laborde—had been announced to deliver a lecture to be illustrated by experiments upon live animals. A number of frogs, rabbits, and dogs, the intended victims, were placed upon the platform. The lecturer was about to begin by sacrificing one of the frogs, when a lady sprang from among the audience on to the platform and entered an energetic protest against the proceedings. M. Laborde at first attempted to proceed at the same time declaring that he was the victim of a clerical cabal. The public, however, supported the lady, and the lecture was abandoned amid great confusion.

A Cat's Performance in an Organ Caused an exciting scene at a morning service in an English church a few Sundays ago. At St. Matthew's, Sheffield, on Sunday, July 16th, the organist was greatly puzzled to find some of the keys on the "great organ" firmly fastened down. Having obtained assistance, an examination of the organ was made, when a cat was discovered in the interior of the instrument. All attempts to coax the animal from its place were unavailing. The service proceeded smoothly, but when the organist attempted to play the accompaniment to the "Amen" following the ascription at the close of the sermon, and drew two soft stops, without a note being touched the most discordant and piercing strains were emitted from the instrument. The last hymn was sung without accompaniment other than those produced by the movements of the frightened animal inside the organ. Just as the hymn finished "puss" made her escape, and bounding along the middle aisle gained the street. The congregation seemed to be much more interested in the freaks of the cat and the noises of the organ than in the service. The cat's interruption was a novel one, but the same diversion of the attention is sometimes caused by the entrance of a bird or a bat or the crying of a child. When souls are being drawn from the kingdom of Satan to the kingdom of God the devil is active in his endeavors by any means to prevent the great transaction being consummated.

THE REV. CHARLES GARRETT.

The New President of the Wesleyan Conference of Great Britain.

Born in 1826—Conversion and Call to the Ministry—Enters Richmond College—His First Circuits—His Efforts During the Lancashire Cotton Famine in 1860—Increasing Popularity—Devotion to the Temperance Cause—A Verbal Photograph—A Self-Revelation—Fitness for His Important Post.

THE spontaneous election of any man from among his equals in position to be the leader and chief, of all is an honor of a very distinguished kind. Whether it be in politics, in the courts of justice, or in the church, the man so chosen occupies a position higher by far than any inherited distinction, for it implies that his personal qualities have commended him to the notice of his fellow laborers, and have inspired them with confidence and esteem.

Such an honored position is that to which the Rev. Charles Garrett has just been elected. He is now the President, or chief executive, of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of Great Britain, a denomination which, in that country alone, numbers over four hundred thousand members, has 2155 ministers regularly ordained, employs 15,250 local preachers, and possesses nearly seven thousand places of worship. It is no slight testimony to Mr. Garrett's character and worth that not only has he been elected to the office of President but the choice of his brethren is emphatically indorsed by the laity of the church.

There is a significance too in the honor thus conferred, from the character of the work Mr. Garrett has performed. The reproach is frequently cast on Christianity that its efforts are directed exclusively to spiritual concerns, to the neglect of the physical and temporal welfare of the human race. It is unnecessary in these columns to show how undeserved is that reproach, but it is a significant fact that the foremost minister of one of the great Christian denominations is a man who has not only labored with conspicuous success in the pulpit for the conversion of souls, but has been equally successful out of the pulpit in philanthropic work.

Mainly through his efforts, the coffee tavern movement was inaugurated and carried to successful execution, and the working-men in all the cities and large towns of Great Britain are now able to enjoy the society of each other, and spend pleasant evenings in places where they are not assailed with temptations to intemperance. To his energy and Christian sympathy also was largely due the patience and cheerfulness which characterized the English operatives in the cotton mills during the cotton famine occasioned by our civil war. During that time of trouble, when this land was groaning under the bitter struggle, the thousands of Lancashire were thrown out of work by the scarcity of material, and poverty and starvation stalked through the whole district. Mr. Garrett was at that time stationed in Lancashire, and his constant and earnest efforts were directed to the relief of distress and the inculcation of lessons of patient submission to the will of God.

Charles Garrett was born Nov. 22, 1826, in the small town of Shaftesbury, Dorsetshire, the place from which the philanthropic Earl of Shaftesbury takes his name, and where he controls the church patronage, and owns nearly all the property. Small as is the town, and unimportant commercially, yet Methodism early found a home there, and a "preaching-house" was built as far back as 1756. The cause of Methodism is still well sustained in the little town, as appears from the fact that at the last census 724 persons in a total population of 2200 registered as Methodists.

Left fatherless in early life, Charles Garrett became dependent on his mother, who, happily for him, was a pious, God-fearing woman and a wise mother. Her position in the social scale was a very humble one, but she denied herself that she might give her boy a good education at a commercial school in his native town, above all taking care that his companionships were with the people of God. Attending the Methodist Sunday school in Shaftesbury, his steady conduct and intelligence recommended him to notice, and while a mere boy he was made a teacher in the school, and retained that relationship till the time he left home to study for the ministry.

JOINS THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

At the time he became a teacher he took another decided step; the principles of total abstinence were then first introduced into England by Joseph Livesey and a few friends at Preston, and they rapidly spread over England, securing as one lifelong adherent the boy Charles Garrett. (The first panel in our frontispiece represents the boy in the act of signing the pledge.) He became an abstainer in 1840, after hearing a temperance lecture by John Cassell, and has never since tasted intoxicating liquor. He is to-day one of the Vice-Presidents of the National Temperance League and of the United Kingdom Alliance, and is connected with almost all the temperance organizations in Great Britain. He has greatly assisted in promoting the introduction and spread of Bands of Hope, in order to save the young from the perils associated with the use of intoxicating drink.

A MOMENTOUS INTERVIEW.

While Charles Garrett was yet a lad, as he was walking down the High Street of Shaftesbury he met a good woman, to whom he spoke, and as the conversation continued she said, "Charles, isn't it time you gave your heart to God?" It was like a voice from heaven. The boy's attention was arrested, his heart was moved, and without hesitation he replied, "Yes." And he at once resolved to do so. (The scene is depicted on our frontispiece.) The teaching and preaching of those simple, earnest Methodist ministers who at that time filled the pulpits of Dorsetshire, whom he had heard, now began to exert on his mind holy longings and earnest desires to work for God. His labors in the Sunday-school showed even in his youth that he possessed the gift of an attractive and persuasive utterance, and his way was soon opened to the pulpits in the circuit which were occupied on certain Sundays by lay preachers, the regular ministers preaching on stated occasions. Mr. Garrett thus commenced his work, and in 1846, at the age of twenty, he was enrolled in the ranks as a local preacher.

The conspicuous success of his efforts in preaching the Gospel, and the rich and multiplying blessings which accompanied him in the conversion of souls, and the edification of professing Christians, induced him seriously to consider whether or not God was calling him to enter the regular ministry. The subject having been submitted to the deliberate and prayerful judgment of some trustworthy friends and counsellors, his pathway was made plain, and as the consequence of a most cordial recommendation, he was entered in 1849, as a student in Richmond College, Surrey.

HIS FIRST CIRCUITS.

At the end of three years he commenced active work, being appointed to Mildenhall, Ely, Louth, and Malton, in succession. There were, however, unhappy circumstances connected with the Methodist cause in those localities which rendered the work of the ministry painful and disappointing, for a feud which culminated in disruption existed there, and Mr. Garrett at the end of his term determined to remove to a northern circuit. From 1857 his labors have been almost exclusively confined to the circuits of Lancashire.

His first charge in this busy manufacturing county was at Rochdale, where his genial presence, brotherly sympathy, earnest preaching, and unwearied pastoral work soon gained for him the love and admiration of the people. In the year 1860, and during the prevalence of the cotton famine, he was removed to Preston, where with the most untiring assiduity and unflinching tenderness he strove to mitigate the severity of that memorable ordeal, and, according to the testimony of the local authorities, by his instrumentalty numbers, young and old, were delivered from imminent starvation. (One of the panels in our front picture represents a procession of starved-out operatives at this distressing period.) While at Preston he suggested the desirability of establishing a cheap Wesleyan newspaper for the people, and, as a consequence, the Methodist Recorder was started, and has since been conducted with intelligence and enterprise, and now enjoys a considerable circulation.

INCREASING POPULARITY.

But it was upon his removal to Hull, in Yorkshire, whither he was appointed in 1863, that he became more intimately acquainted with the pleasures and perils of popularity. The mere announcement that the Rev. C. Garrett was to preach or speak, was of itself sufficient to fill the largest building; nor was increased popularity the only result of his work, God owned and blessed his labors, and many souls were converted under his preaching. At the end of his three years' term, so useful had his labors been in the town that a public meeting was called, and was largely attended by public men and Christians of all denominations, to bid him a hearty and affectionate farewell.

In 1866, he returned to Lancashire, and served the full term of three years respectively at Gravel Lane, and Cheetham Hill, Manchester. When the time came for his removal from Manchester the great Free Trade Hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience to take their farewell of a beloved friend, and they testified their affection by the spontaneous gift of a testimonial worth $5250, to which the Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Fraser, who is one of Mr. Garrett's warmest friends, contributed liberally. (The presentation ceremony is represented in our frontispiece.)

In 1872 he was stationed in Liverpool. During his three years' location in that circuit his mind was deeply pained and intensely exercised by the daily scenes of drunkenness he witnessed. In March, 1875, at a public meeting he addressed, he devoted his remarks to the question of "How to Reach the Masses." The result of that stirring, powerful, and convincing appeal was the formation of a company for establishing

COCOA AND COFFEE PUBLIC HOUSES.

Mr. Garrett took the lead of the movement. He made it a matter of earnest and constant prayer, and the scheme has proved a marvellous success. It has not only spread its happy influence over Great Britain, but it has extended its benefits also to America and Australia.

In 1875, when the three years had expired during which, according to the laws of Methodism, Mr. Garrett might continue in one locality, some of the leading men of the denomination appealed to the Conference for Mr. Garrett to be appointed superintendent of a lay mission, to spread its operations among the neglected masses all over Liverpool. The urgency of the case was apparent, the Conference yielded to the appeal, and Pitt Street Chapel was taken as headquarters. The chapel at that time was burdened with a debt of $20,000. This Mr. Garrett soon cleared off, and spent $10,000 more in adapting the place to the wants of the working classes. The mission has prospered, and now there are ten stations in Liverpool, all supported by funds collected by Mr. Garrett, and thousands of drunkards have been rescued, and multitudes gathered into the Church through that agency.

Mr. Garrett's labors in the crowded districts of Liverpool among low lodging-houses, crowded alleys and ill ventilated abodes, brought on a breakdown of physical health, and he was obliged to take a much-needed rest. This he was able to enjoy, but his own happy position led him to sympathize with his suffering and worn-out brethren in the ministry, who often, though needing rest and change, were unable from poverty to leave their homes. He accordingly originated houses of rest for ministers overworked; and two houses are now built for their use, and $20,000 invested for their maintenance.

Mr. Garrett's

DEVOTION TO THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE

is proverbial. Next to the preaching of the Gospel it is the thing nearest and dearest to his heart; and it was with intense delight that temperance workers in London listened to a powerful sermon he preached about two years ago at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, on behalf of the National Temperance League. The congregation which filled that vast building still retain a vivid recollection of his impassioned appeal to the Church of Christ, if it would hold its own and please its Master, in God's ame to attack the intemperance of England and weep it away for ever. His plea for Bands of hope at Exeter Hall in 1863, since published under the title of "Stop the Gap," reminded those who heard it, in its dramatic intensity and earnestness, of the celebrated appeals of Mr. John B. Gough.

A VERBAL PHOTOGRAPH.

Mr. Garrett is short in stature and thin of frame, but with a face beaming with goodness and benevolence, which unmistakably reflects the sympathetic emotions of one of the warmest hearts that ever beat. He has a pleasing voice and his manner is exceedingly winning. The two leading features of his preaching are, as in the preaching of Mr. Spurgeon, simplicity and earnestness, which make themselves felt, and awaken a responsive chord in the hearts of his hearers. His powers as a preacher are exceedingly brilliant, but it is to the conversion of the masses that they have been chiefly directed, and his words and deeds have carried sunshine and happiness, light and purity, into hundreds upon hundreds of once darkened homes, and often has the blessing of those that were ready to perish cheered his heart and lightened the weight of his labors.

It is impossible to say how much Methodism owes to his earnest and self-denying efforts, and looking at what God has enabled him to accomplish, one cannot wonder that in the end his physical frame fairly broke down under the strain of which it had been subjected. So critical, indeed, was his condition about six years ago, that his life seemed to be hovering between the two worlds, and all exertion was forbidden by his physician. To use his own words: "Such nervous depression was on me that the blackness of darkness was upon my soul. I was so prostrate that I had no hope of ever preaching again, but the Conference at Nottingham prayed for me, and God answered that prayer."

A SELF-REVELATION.

Mr. Garrett is a man of singular nobility of character. His charity, in the sense of love for his fellow-men, like that of the Apostle Paul, is boundless and all-embracing. In one of his own speeches he has given us, as it were, a glimpse into his inner self, and has revealed to us with honest boldness and frankness, what manner of man he is. "I am a Catholic," he said, "by my convictions, in the sense, not of a Roman Catholic, but of the broad Christian love and sympathy which takes in the whole church of Christ; I am a Catholic by my spiritual nature, and I am a Catholic by my very mental peculiarity. So that, so far as I am concerned I always felt that I belonged to the whole Church, and that if other members of the Church would not shake hands with me, it was their fault and not mine. Never has a good man known me, I can honestly say, but knew there was a warm shake of the hand whenever he was willing to have it."

"I do not understand the peculiarity of some people in this matter. Would to God it were swept away! Why, I hate bigotry more than I hate drink, and that is a strong figure. I have tried to show my catholicity, not by proposing votes of thanks upon platforms of Evangelical Alliances, that were to be forgotten as soon as the meeting ended, but by helping as much as I could all the branches of the Church, and if I have not preached in the pulpit of every branch of the Church the fault has not been mine. I long for the time when everything that interferes with the free interchange of loving labor on the part of the Christian Church shall be swept away; when the ministers of Christ, as well as the people will be found standing fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel."

HIS FITNESS FOR HIS IMPORTANT POST.

These are, indeed, noble and ennobling sentiments, which it might be wished that some other ministers of the denomination to which Mr. Garrett belongs, and who are known for their exclusiveness, would take to heart. Such ministers are in reality the very backbone, or rather the very life-blood, of the body to which they belong. As to his fitness for the Presidential chair, to which he has just been elected, in place of any words of our own we would rather quote those of one of the most eminent of living ministers, the Rev. Alexander M'Aulay, who thus explained the secret of Mr. Garrett's getting through so much work in so short a space of time: "He is something like a cathedral clock, big wheels and small wheels, all so playing into each other that they keep the exact time of day, and he goes on ticking round you, though you cannot tell which wheel produces the tick, and then he strikes the right hour and shows us the time of the day and how we should walk." It is by the efforts of such men, with the true metallic ring in them, that Methodism has won the grand position it holds in the world to-day, and it is by their aid that it will go on strengthening its cords and enlarging its bounds.

Many prayers are being offered that the year of Mr. Garrett's presidency may be one of great spiritual enrichment to himself, and fraught with abundant blessing to the denomination he delights, for Christ's sake, to serve. We trust that the indefatigable zeal and unselfish devotion of their new President to the work of saving souls may be emulated by his brethren in the ministry, and that they may be drawn into closer relations with their ministerial brethren of other denominations, who, if not calling themselves by the name of the great and good John Wesley, are servants of Christ whom John Wesley was proud to serve. If they become, like their President, willing to work with ministers of other denominations and to recognize them as brethren in Christ the change will be a very hopeful one, and will tend to the advancement of Christianity in Great Britain.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

AS ONE COME BACK FROM THE DEAD.

A VERY painful affection similar to two cases described in Cooper's Surgical Dictionary (Seventh Edition) has yielded in the case of a sufferer in England to the power of God invoked by prayer. The sufferer, Harriett Packham, of 20 North Street, Tunbridge Wells, thus writes describing her case:

"It is with deepest gratitude to God that I give testimony to the truth of God's Word that 'The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up.' More than ten years ago I was in Guy's Hospital as an in-patient for the purpose of having a growth of bone removed from my neck, but after making an opening in it the doctors were only able to take off a piece of bone the size of a filbert. The doctors said that the bone had formed on the top rib and reached down to the tip of the lungs sending out branches in all directions, causing a great amount of pressure on all the nerves on my left side."

"After the operation I lost the use of my left arm, but in due time it was restored to me when my strength returned, so that I was able to walk about for four years. Since that time, however, I have been confined to my bed for five years and to my room for one year and six months. Severe attacks of pain deranged the functions of my digestive organs. Since the twentieth of October last I have taken solid food, which I had not been able to do before for five years. I have had morphia injected in my arms four times a day, which was found to be the only thing remaining that would relieve my pain after every other remedy that doctors could prescribe had failed to give relief. In fact everything has been done for me that the skill of man could do, but in vain."

"Then the dear Lord Himself was pleased to prove that His own power and willingness to heal and cure the sick and suffering are the same now as in the time of the Apostles, when Jesus sent them forth to heal and cure sickness and diseases of the people through prayer and faith in God. People have said that I am as one come back from the dead, and, indeed, at one time I bade my friends good-by, at another time I was past speaking. I am the greatest wonder to many people."

"It was on August 3d, 1881, that I first saw Mr. Hall, through whose instrumentality the dear Lord was pleased to raise me up from my bed of intense suffering. After the constant visits and prayers of Mr. Hall, I was able, on September 28th, to ride out for the first time, and in one month from that date I was able to walk the distance of one mile without any assistance. I have continued to gain strength from that time, and having received such great blessings myself, I am anxious that others may know the way to get as large a share for themselves."

AN INTERNAL TUMOR HEALED.

At a meeting on July 12th at Bethshan, Dr. Boardman's House in London, a middle-aged woman, who appeared to be in good health, said: "I thank God that He has given me a thorough healing, after thirteen years' suffering—the last part much more acute than the first. I was diseased from head to foot, and very bad—in fact, I was a hopeless case. I had internal tumor and many other diseases. I had undergone several operations, and suffered very much indeed. Just at my extremity I was brought to this Home. At the end of four days I was enabled to lay hold of these words—'He bore our sicknesses.' They came before my mind. I said to the Lord, 'If you have borne my sins my soul is saved; and if you have borne my sicknesses I am healed;' and though before I could not move an inch without pain, I got up. I have been made perfectly whole."

DR. BOARDMAN'S EXPLANATION.

Dr. Boardman said: "Our sister came in here on the Wednesday, and had an epileptic fit while on the couch the same evening. On Friday she accepted Jesus as an in-dwelling Saviour, and expected healing from that day. On Sunday evening, in an adjoining room, she took the words which Jesus gave her, and rose up, and from that moment has been well."

"This is how it came about. In the first place she was looking to Jesus. Then Jesus in His own right moment spoke to her as if He had been present in the body, and spoke the words Himself, saying, 'I have borne all your sins; I have borne your sicknesses.' She said to herself, and said rightly, 'If He has borne my sicknesses I will get up and say I am well!' But then came the suggestion, 'If you do you will make a fool of yourself and fall down.' Jesus spoke to her a second time—oh! how gracious of the Saviour not to let her go when she had heard Satan's voice and obeyed that instead of His voice—and the same thing was repeated. She said, 'I will get up and say I am well;' but then came the suggestion again, 'You will make a fool of yourself if you do.' She heeded that, and lay still and was not healed. But the blessed Saviour in His threefold love—in His wondrous goodness—spoke to her the same words again the third time. Then she said this, 'Oh Lord, I will get up and say I am well.' She had faith, she obeyed Him, and felt the healing. Thank God, she is well to-day."

A Little Heroine only Twelve Years of Age was presented with a gold watch and chain on August 10th at Bath, L. I. Two days before, a little boy nine years old was bathing in the bay, and Miss Edith Baxter, who was staying with her parents at the Avon Beach Hotel, stood on the hotel pier watching him. She had not been there long before she noticed that the child could not swim and was drifting out of his depth. There was no one on the pier she could call, so she quickly cast aside her outer garments and jumped into the water and waded to a point where she saw a foot visible above the surface, and seizing the foot cried for help, struggling meanwhile to turn the drowning child's head upward, but without avail. In a few moments some swimmers who were near came to the rescue, and both of the children were taken from the water. The boy, who had already sunk twice when Edith went to his aid, was almost drowned, but was resuscitated at the hotel, while his brave rescuer was also properly cared for. On Thursday evening there was a gathering of three hundred guests in the parlors of the hotel, and the heroine was by them presented with a handsome gold watch and chain as a token of esteem for her extraordinary courage. The gift bears an inscription recording briefly the act which led to its presentation. Those who work in the Lord's service often hear of similar cases of rescue from eternal death where deliverance seemed impossible, but in which the cry raised to Him who is mighty to save has brought salvation, and that cry has often been raised by a child (Eccles. 4:13).

SUCCESSFUL MEDICAMENT.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."—Matt. 9:12.

The Knife of Sarcasm—The Criticism of the High-toned People—Christ's Cutting Reply—I. Sin as a Disease—Moral Paralysis—A Common Origin—Delirious Sickness—Produced by the Surroundings—A Malarial Disease—Beyond Human Medicament—Philosophic Prescriptions—II. A Great Physician—His Record—Millions of Cures—An Almighty Doctor—Always Successful—Sympathetic—Does not Like to Cut—Has been Wounded Himself—Cures Chronic Cases—Crises in Disease—Heroic Treatment—Perfect Recovery—Gifts to the Physician.

No Scotchman would have called for Dr. Abernethy unless there had been illness in the house. No New Yorker would have called for Dr. Hosack, no Philadelphian for Dr. Rush, if there had not been physical disease. People go to a doctor when they are ill, or their families are ill. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." And yet, my friends, that is not the meaning of my text. Sarcasm is a sharp knife, and like every other sharp knife it may be used for good or ill; it may destroy life, or it may save it. Christ wielded this knife of sarcasm very skilfully in the text.

He was seated with the publicans, who had a bad name for overreaching and extortion, and decent people in those times did not want to be seen with these publicans; but Christ was seated with them at the table. The arrogant Pharisees, who considered themselves far looked in through the window and saw Christ with these publicans, and began to jeer at them, and to caricature the whole scene; as much as to say, "If you want fine company, why don't you come out among us Pharisees? We would give you a more elegant reception, and you would have more educated and refined society; why do you sit down there with those poor, miserable publicans?"

And Christ cut with the sarcasm of my text, as much as to say, "I know I am seated among these publicans, and they are bad people, and they mightily want My grace and my help; of course they do, and of course you don't; you Pharisees, you great professors, you high-toned people, you educated people, you Pharisees, of course you don't; the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

I. My text presents sin as a disease. It sometimes acts as a dropsy, showing itself in great swellings of pride; sometimes as a consumption, while it gives a flush of health to the cheek, eating away the vitals of the immortal spirit; sometimes as

and the feet cannot walk as they ought, and the hands cannot move as they ought, and the brain cannot think as it ought; sometimes as an ague, now cold, now hot, flashes of excitement followed by yawnings and great prostration. If you find ten thousand people they will have the disease of sin in ten thousand shapes, but, after all, it is the same disease.

You are aware of the fact that the most of diseases come from an impurity of the blood, and if the heart throws out the wrong kind of blood, and that blood settles on the lungs, it produces inflammation or congestion; or on the muscles, it produces rheumatism; or on the skin, it produces erysipelas. Wherever that bad blood settles there is disease, and the trouble all comes from the heart. And so it is with this disease of sin; it all starts in the heart, and it circulates through the entire moral nature, and wherever it settles there is suffering and there is death. I propose to-night to speak of this sin-sickness of the soul, and then to offer an infallible cure to all the people.

In the first place, I remark in regard to this sin-sickness, it is a

DELIRIOUS SICKNESS.

You have known people seized with some dangerous malady who thought themselves perfectly well. You could hardly get them to lie on the pillow. They rose up in the bed and said, "I don't see why you sent for the doctor. I am perfectly well; there is nothing the matter with me." And perhaps in the night, when the nurse had fallen asleep, they went out slyly and walked on the roof of the house or along a precipice. They were delirious.

Well, that is just the character of this disease with which we have all been afflicted—this disease of sin; it is a delirious sickness. A man thinks he is all right. He says, "I have need of nothing," when the fact is that he is poor, and wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked. That he is delirious I prove from the fact that he walks on the verge of a dangerous precipice, and that he sits down at a banquet where there are swords suspended overhead, and that he drinks out of fountains where the nightshade drops its leaves, and into which the adder spits its venom. I prove that he is delirious from the fact that he stops his ears to the raptures of harps seraphic, and he blinds his eyes to a beauty which opens into wider landscape, and sweeter joy, and mightier triumphs and stronger hallelujahs, and loftier thrones. By the awful risks he runs, and by the glorious opportunities he refuses, I come to the conclusion he is in delirium.

If you should come to me and I were a business man, and you could show me how I could make 50,000 dollars without any possible risk, and make it so plainly there could not be any possible doubt about it, and I should refuse to go into the enterprise, you would simply say, "He is crazy." Or, if there were a bridge over a dangerous chasm, and some of its supports were washed away by a freshet, and a board on each side of the bridge that said "Dangerous—let no one attempt to pass this bridge," and with all that warning, and all that peril, I should pass on and attempt to go over the bridge, you would say, "That man is not in his senses; he is crazy."

If I should go out to-night on the track as the express train is coming along, and I should see the headlight of the locomotive, and I should wait until the train came within a hundred yards, and still kept my position mid-track, until the train came up within ten yards, somebody shouting all the time for me to get off, and I should continue to stand until the last moment, what would you say in regard to me? Why, you would say, "That man has lost his reason." So, if I can show you that there are dangerous bridges you are trying to cross, or that you are standing amid perils that threaten to destroy you, and that you run the risk day after day, and month after month, and year after year, I must come to the conclusion that sin is a delirious sickness.

Again: I remark in regard to this disease of sin that it is endemical—that is,

PRODUCED BY THE SURROUNDINGS.

You know how up from a marsh or pond the malaria will ascend, and going along that place at night you breathe the air, you get the fever, you come down on the sick-bed. And I have to tell you that our surroundings in this world somehow give us this disease of sin. We breathe it in the air. We take it with our food. We get it from all the circumstances among which we mingle. The fact is that the earth is only a great quagmire of iniquity, and no pond ever sent up such a dreadful malaria as this whole earth, in a spiritual sense, now sends up, until all the nations sweat, and fester, and groan with this awful malady.

I go further, and remark, in regard to this sin-sickness with which we are all afflicted, that it is catching. You know how the ancient plague was. In the year 263, in the city of Rome, 5000 people died daily of the plague. Under King James 30,000 perished in the plague; under Edward the First 35,000 people perished in the plague, and it went on from neighborhood to neighborhood, and from nation to nation, until all the world was aghast; but that was not a contagious disease as compared with sin, the disease with which our soul is afflicted. In the course of your life you have caught it from ten thousand, and you will give it to ten thousand.

It is so contagious a disease that, if the whole race were purified and healed, save just one man in all the earth, he would give it to the neighborhood, and the neighborhood to the next neighborhood, until the continent and the two hemispheres would feel it. Yes, it is a contagious sickness.

I go a step further, and say that it is a disease

BEYOND ALL HUMAN MEDICAMENT.

Plato wrote a prescription, and the world took it; the prescription failed. Zeno wrote a prescription; the world took it; the prescription failed. Socrates wrote a prescription; the world took the prescription failed. For six thousand years there has never been anything but failure on the part of men who have tried by their own power to cure this disease. No catholicon, no anodyne, balm, no help. Away, then, with all human quackery. Away, then, in a spiritual sense, with all earthly materia medica. It will effect nothing at all this matter of the soul's sickness.

But I will introduce to you a Doctor who is able and willing to cure the whole race. "The whole need not a physician." If there are people here who feel themselves all right, if there are people here who feel themselves, if in looking upon their life they cannot see any great mistake and making an inspection of their entire nature they are perfectly satisfied, then I can do nothing with them save to cut them with the sarcasm of Christ in the text: "The whole need not a physician." But if there are people here—and believe this comprises the whole audience—if there are people here who feel they are not all right—there are men and women here who want to be made better—dissatisfied with their past life and want to begin again—if there are thousands of people here who are willing to admit that they are sick with sin, then I am ready to come out and commend the best doctor the world has ever seen. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

II. Yes; my text speaks, in the second place,

A GREAT PHYSICIAN.

My first remark in regard to this physician is that He has cured millions of cases that were as sick as you are. He cured the demoniac, the paralytic, the leper. He took the most chronic and complicated diseases, and they could not stand before His fiat. To one He said, "Be thou clean;" to another He said, "Take up thy bed and walk;" to another He said, "Damsel, arise;" and all the while they were not only cured as to the body, but cured as to the soul.

A pastor went into a house where there was a young Christian dying in great triumph. He entered the room to congratulate her as she was about to enter heaven, and as he went into the room he began to talk cheerfully about the joys that were immediately before her, the sister left the room. A few weeks after the pastor was called to the same house, and this sister who had left the room was about to take her departure into the eternal world, but she was not ready. She said to the pastor, "You don't remember me, do you?" "Oh, yes," he replied, "I remember you," she said. "Do you remember when you were talking to my sister about heaven, I left the room?" "Yes," he said, "I remember that." She said, "Do you know why I left?" "No," he said, "I don't." "Well," she said, "I didn't want to hear anything about my soul, or about heaven, and now I am dying. Oh sir, it is a dreadful thing to die." Now, what was the difference between these two sisters? The one was cured of the disease of sin; the other was not.

I go further and remark, in regard to this divine Physician, that He is an almighty doctor. A midnight sudden disease comes upon your little child. You hasten for a physician, or you call for a telegraph boy to get the doctor there as soon as you can, and hour after hour there is a contest between science and the King of Terrors. And yet you stand there and you watch and you see the disease is conquering fortress after fortress of strength, until after a while you stand over the lifeless form and have to confess that there is a limit beyond which human medicament cannot go. But I hail to-night an almighty Doctor, who NEVER LOST A PATIENT.

Why, a leper came out with a bandage over his mouth and utterly loathsome, so they drove him

t from all society, and when he came out the people all ran, and Christ ran. But Christ ran in different direction from the people. They all ran away from the poor man; Christ ran toward him. And then a second leper came out with a bandage over his mouth, and a third, and a fourth, and so on till there were ten lepers, and I see Christ standing among them. It is a dangerous experiment, you say. Why, if you caught the breath of one such an as that, it would be certain death. There Christ stood among the ten lepers, and He cured the first, and the second, and the tenth.

Going along by a graveyard one day, two macs came out, fire in the eye, foam on the lip, cutting themselves with knives until the blood spured from the face to the limbs; and Christ spake, and devils were exorcised, and the men were clothed and in their right mind.

When Christ went through the streets, He could hardly find a place to put his foot down for the streets and the mattresses that were laid in His way. He saw Him going through the streets of Jerusalem, and He has to pick His way, stepping over the streets of the suffering and the distressed. He touches a blind eye, and into it pours the beauty of mountain and lawn and lake and sea. He touches a deaf ear, and into it pours the sound of the bird's song, and the waterfall's dash, and the insect's hum, and the boy's halloo. He touches the palsied and limp arm that hangs down useless by the man's side, and no sooner does Christ touch it than the blood begins to circulate, and the muscles work, and the arms to thrill, until that arm which hung just before powerless at the man's side is stretched out in strong and healthy congratulation.

Oh, He is a mighty Doctor! He cured not only bodies, but He cured souls. When I see at Christ's touch Fraud dropping its dishonest gains, and Burglary throwing away its false keys, and Arson extinguishing its torch, and Murder sheathing its dagger, and Pollution washing itself clean, and the wretchedness and the misery and abandonment of the world turning into brightness and purity and joy, I say, "Hail! hail! this is an almighty Doctor!"

I have again to remark that this physician spoken of in my text is

A SYMPATHETIC DOCTOR.

There are some men in the medical profession who have not learned the first art of gentleness. They have a way of slamming the door when they come in or go out, and they tramp across the floor until all your nerves quiver; and I do not care how many medicines they bring in, they make you worse. They do not know how to doctor you. They have a rough way of taking off a bandage, and a hard way of pressing a sore. They like to cut; it puts them in a perfect glee when they can cut. But your family physician comes in, and he is so cheerful and hopeful. The dawn of his face in the room cools the fever and quiets the nerves, and he talks with you a few moments, and you really think, after all, you do not need any medicine. He is so kind. His looks and his manner are worth more than the medicines.

But I greet the Lord Jesus Christ to-night as a sympathetic Physician. Sometimes indeed he has to cut; He must cut; but

HE NEVER LIKES TO CUT.

He does not afflict willingly the children of men. He has been afflicted in all our afflictions, and oh, how it soothes us, how it comforts us, how it solaces us, how it strikes us through and through with an infinite contentment as He breathes on us these words, "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest!" He has been wounded Himself. He had pains in the head, pains in the hand, pains in the heart, pains in the feet. He knows all about it. Bone of our bone. Flesh of our flesh. "Sorrow of our sorrow. Heart of our heart. Groan of our groan." He wept. He bled. He agonized. He died. He cannot help being sympathetic. Oh, you sin-sick soul, unbandage the awful wound and let Him look at it. Do not shrink back when He tries to touch you. He will not hurt you. Tell Him all your spiritual symptoms. Trust this sympathetic, this experienced, this omnipotent Doctor.

But you know that there are

and when they have gone on for a long time, or five, ten, fifteen, twenty years, you say, "Oh, there is no use." The physician comes in and says, "Oh, I can't help you; it is chronic." And so it is with sin; with many people it is chronic; we have it a great while; it has been going on with us through the months and years of our past life. Oh, how long we have had it! There are people here who have had it forty years, fifty years, sixty years, seventy years. It is chronic.

I have to tell you also that there is such a thing as a crisis in a disease. You all know that. Some doctors will tell you it is on the seventh day, or the ninth day, or the fourteenth day, or the twenty-first day. Oh, what a solemn time it is in the household when the crisis has come in the sick-room! Ah, how I remember walking up and down the floor all one Sabbath-day, for the crisis had come. I stood at the top of the stairs and watched. I feared some one would come up and make a disturbance. If that child could sleep one hour longer, we thought he would get well. And how anxious I was to keep everything quiet! The crisis had come. After a while the perspiration came out, and the fever began to go away. The crisis had passed. And in all the households of my congregation I suppose there has been some such crisis.

Well, now, in your spiritual disease, there is a crisis. It may be the seventh day, or the fourteenth day, or the twenty-first day in the history of your soul's disorder, I cannot tell; but I verily believe, as I stand here before you and before God, to whom I must answer for this night's service, that this is the crisis of the spiritual disease of a great multitude here. Which way will the matter turn? God only knows. It is a crisis—an immortal crisis.

You know that there is such a thing as HEROIC TREATMENT.

The physician has given milder medicines; they have not effected anything. "Now, the case is in such a shape," he says, "that the patient can't get well anyhow without medicine, and perhaps if I give it it may be fatal; but there is a possibility that it may be a cure, and so I must risk it." That prescription is given; it kills or it cures. That is what is called in all departments of medicine "heroic treatment." I have to tell you that the Gospel is heroic treatment. It is the savor of life unto life, or of death unto death. It kills or it cures. It is an omnipotent Gospel; it will raise for you a throne, or dig for you a dungeon. It will mould for you a crown, or it will forge for you a chain. It will set your feet on the path where angels walk, and the redeemed of God move in procession; or it will set you down on a barren beach to which there comes the surf-beating of a sea whose moaning is the cry of the self-destroyed. Omnipotent Gospel!

I praise God to-night that so many have taken this medicine and invited in the divine Physician, and they are getting well just as fast as possible. Sometimes, indeed, they have a return of the old complaint, but they are getting better and better; and, just as sure as you sit there and I stand here, God is going to take them to a place where their shall be proclaimed. It is not a great way off, either, to some of us. You know the place of which I speak. Oh, how many have entered upon it and got well of all their diseases! And there are those here spiritually diseased who will get cured in that blessed country.

Across the harsh discords of this world there comes floating down the voice of a great rapture, dropping from golden harps and swept off from fiery seas, and rumbling down under eternal arches, and rolling through aisles of amethyst, and between mountains of frankincense, and through gates of pearl, and between walls of jasper and chrysoprase, while there mingle together the warble of seraphs, and the trill of minstrels, and the fire-song of the martyrs, and the chanting of temples, and the shout of great armies, and the chorus of ransomed empires, and the eternal and triumphal march of myriads come to glory.

Oh, my friends, I see some of those who are on crutches coming up to that bright gate, and they move in, and instantly their step is elastic. I see others coming up to that gate borne on couches of pain, and the Lord lifts them out of the field ambulance, and instantly all their wounds are healed. I see them coming up to that gate in total physical blindness, and they are feeling their way up toward it; but no sooner do they touch the gate than it opens, and there flashes upon them immortal vision. And these bright and beautiful ones—who are they? Oh, they are that the Lord lifted out of the mother's arms, or out of the cradle, and there they are now—they have got over all their sickness, and there they stand in heaven, drinking at the fountain of eternal health, and they say one to another, "What shall we bring as a gift to the Physician?"

And one shall bring a palm, and another will bring a gem from the depths of the river of life, and another will bring a leaf of ananarath, and another will bring a crystal glass, flashing bright with the waters from the eternal rock—water bright as its own glorified spirit; while there will be others there who will stand in astonishment, and they will bring neither leaf, nor palm, nor gem, nor crystal, but stand in transfixed silence, looking upon the inscription written in folds of light all over the architectural glory at the entrance: "The inhabitant shall never say, I am sick, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

A Deserving Charity is in Need of Funds to extend its operations. The Earle Guild has during the pitiless heat of the past three weeks distributed ice to the poor in some of the poverty-stricken quarters of New York. It is impossible to obtain cold water anywhere without ice, while the price of the commodity is so high that thousands of the sick and suffering are unable to obtain it. A small sum given to the Earle Guild will enable it to give to many feeble old people and sick children that refreshing drink which they so sadly need.

The Jewish Exodus from Russia to Palestine still proceeds, notwithstanding the alleged prohibition of the Sultan against the founding of colonies there. Families are constantly arriving at Jaffa from Odessa, and are received by M. Levantin, the Charkoff Commissioner, who is the superintendent of a society in Jaffa which provides temporary homes for Russian colonists. Most of those now migrating toward Palestine are persons of capital. More than 300 families are at present assembled in Jerusalem, and having obtained the sanction of the Turkish Government to found a colony, their agents are now employed in trying to obtain land for them in a suitable locality. Eighty families, too, are to be found in Tiberias. Land has been purchased by the Jaffa society at a village called Jehudi. On the whole, it is apparent that, practically, every facility is afforded by the Government of the Sultan to Jewish immigrants who arrive in Palestine for the purpose of colonization.

Fears of a Moslem Rising in the Holy Land have been prevalent since the massacre in Alexandria. Miss Jacombe, who is conducting mission work at Bethlehem, writes: "At the news of the outrage on the English Consul in Alexandria the Christians were in great fear, supposing the Moslems had done it; but after the arrival of the mail all quieted down for a few days. But after that some natives of Palestine, who were residing in Egypt, came home with terrible tales of what was going on, and this set all Bethlehem in a stir again. The men have provided themselves with firearms, and the women have hidden away all the jewelry and money, and many people have taken refuge in the convents, but there is no real cause for all this. The Moslems might rise at any time, but we consider we are as safe here, or perhaps safer, than either Jerusalem or Jaffa. Our house is a good strong one, and the owners in defending themselves would be all the human defence that we could have; but what is more than all, we feel that we are in our Heavenly Father's keeping. We could not feel justified in leaving our work in the present state of affairs."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Sailor's Sins.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting on July 21, in Glasgow, Mr. Duncan narrated an incident of a sailor who was asked by a Christian worker, much interested in his spiritual and eternal welfare, "What about your sins; whatever will you do with them?" "Nothing at all," was the unusual but most appropriate reply, "nothing at all; why should I when God has cast them into the deep sea of the Saviour's blood, from which the storms will never be able to throw them up."

A Broken Heart Healed.—An Elderly Man was present at one of the young converts' meetings recently who, when several persons got up desiring prayer, rose and said he had been attending Mr. Moody's meetings almost from the commencement, but he could not find peace. He could not rest day or night, and his body was greatly weakened through the want of sleep. Mr. Moody's sermons, he said, had all entered his soul and were tearing it to pieces. He was extremely anxious to find salvation. The same man was present at the meeting in Cowcaddens, on Tuesday night, and publicly stood up and said, he would "trust and not be afraid."

Hetty the Needlewoman.—At the Noonday meeting on July 5th, a minister said he was acquainted with two persons, a mother and daughter, who earned their bread by sewing for shops and private families. Neither of the two were Christians, though they were both members of a church. One evening the daughter came home and said to her mother, "I have been converted to-night, and mean to become a member of Zion Chapel." The mother's feelings were outraged, as many nominal Christians are when they hear of conversions. She demanded an explanation. "Are you not already a church member? Have you not been baptized? What do you mean, Hetty?" "Mother," she answered, "you know that often we put out bad work, but after this no seam will ever rip up."

"Murder will Out!"—Mr. Duncan said: "A man committed a murder and carried the body of his victim into the depths of a dense forest. Laying it down he covered it over with leaves and branches and went away. But his deed haunted him; he found himself drawn by an irresistible fascination to the place, and to his horror he saw that the winds had blown away the covering and exposed his victim to the light of day. He lifted the body in his arms and carried it to the river near by, but found that the water was almost dried up. He could not effectually dispose of the slain body; the spilt blood cried out for vengeance, and the man could not hide his sin. There is no power which can get rid of sin but the blood of Christ. If He does not pardon it He must punish it. There is no alternative."

The Plague of the District.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting, Cowcaddens, on July 20, Mr. Duncan said: "In the year 1859 I was conducting services in a remote town. One day a friend pointed out to me a cottage, saying, 'The man who lives there was at one time the plague of the district—a poacher, a thief, a drunkard, and a gambler. So bad was he that the most hopeful and earnest workers gave him up as being beyond the reach of salvation.' The Holy Spirit breathed upon the place, and a powerful religious revival resulted. Among those who were led to Christ was this very man, and to this hour he is working for Christ as actively as he had previously worked for the devil, and with extraordinary success. His own unvarying confession is, 'I am recruiting for King Jesus; will you accept the bounty?'"

A Miner's Timely Decision.—At the Same meeting, Mr. Elliot said: "I will tell you of a man who heard the Gospel for the last time, and very nearly rejected it. A miner went into a Gospel meeting one night and became very anxious about his soul. While the meeting was going on a friend spoke to him, and said, 'Make up your mind at once and decide for Christ.' He answered, 'I will think of it; I cannot settle it to night so suddenly, but I will come back to-morrow night.' His friend said, 'You may be dead by to-morrow night.' On his way home he began to think, and almost involuntarily turned back to the meeting, and that night gave himself to Christ, and returned to his cottage rejoicing. Next day, while working in the mine, a large piece of rock fell upon him. As the men were extricating his poor mangled body they heard him gasp out with his dying breath, 'It is well that I settled it with Christ last night.'

Hurtful Holidays.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, on July 19, Mr. Duncan said: "The power of the Gospel of Christ is exemplified continually and very clearly in reclaiming drunkards. A brother of mine, who for many years was in the habit of spending the 'Fair' holidays in steady drinking, and went to bed intoxicated every night during that time, is now a Christian man and a member of the Mizpah Temperance Band, inaugurated by Mr. Moody. The change which has taken place in himself and his home is simply marvellous, and an occasion of unceasing gratitude to God. His house is furnished in a respectable manner, and his wife and children are comfortably dressed, and not as before in rags and wretchedness. His whole energy and strength are now employed in trying to pull others out of the horrible pit, and leading them to Christ."

A Negligent Mother.—At the Noon-day meeting on July 20, the Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost said: "In the inquiry room, in Boston, just after Mr. Moody's return from his last visit to Scotland, eight years ago, I met an intelligent-looking young man, and asked him if he was a Christian. 'No, sir,' was his immediate reply. I then inquired of him, 'Don't you want to become one?' 'No, sir, I don't,' he said. 'Why not, I ventured to say; 'you believe in the Gospel of Christ?' 'You have no right to press me,' he answered; 'but since you do so I will say that I think that all Christians are either hypocrites or the victims of blind delusion.' 'Is your mother a Christian?' I asked. 'Well, she is a member of a Christian Church.' 'Then is your mother a Christian?' 'That is not right.' 'Why not? you say that we are all hypocrites or deluded, and as your mother is one of us, it is right that you should clearly know whom you are charging with being hypocrites.' 'Well, then,' inquired the young man, 'if my mother is a Christian, why has she never spoken to me about my soul?'"

A Timid Minister Rebuked.—At the same meeting Mr. Pentecost said: "A pastor in one of our New England towns, during a religious revival, determined to summon sufficient courage to speak to a member of the church who attended the services regularly but made no profession of being a converted man. Although the minister had known him for ten years, and had often dined and spent the evening in his house, yet he never could speak to him personally about his soul. At last the pastor fixed upon a certain morning to call and speak to his friend. He went to his office, and said, 'Well, Mr. B—, I have come to speak to you about your soul.' 'Too late, pastor; too late,' was the staggering reply. 'Never too late for Christ to show mercy.' The merchant solemnly answered, 'Pastor, during all the past nine years I have been waiting for you to speak to me about my soul, but you never did so, and only five minutes before you came in, I bowed my knees in prayer and gave myself to Christ. So that you see it is now too late for you to be used by a loving God as the instrument of my salvation.'

Destruction of Whiskey Casks.—Mr. Duncan related the following: "A man in Ulster who had been well brought up, a professing Christian and an officer of the church, was led some time ago to see an irreconcilable antagonism between his profession as a church member and his business. Among other articles which he sold were wines and spirits, but it had never struck him that it was wrong to do so. It was also the most profitable part of his trade. Twenty years ago there was a great religious revival in Ulster, and one Sunday morning, after family worship, this man's son asked him if he had heard of the work of grace which was going on. This caused a conversation to spring up about the need of consistent personal example in professing Christians. The man's mind was so wrought upon by the Holy Spirit, that that very day he resolved to sell no more of the soul-destroying drink. Immediately after he opened his shop the next morning, a regular customer, who was a great drinker, called and ordered some whiskey. was refused. The customer laughed the conscientious shopkeeper to scorn, but finally said that he had heard of his new views and was testing him. After this man left the shop the tradesman looked round on the casks, which seemed to him now like so many demons, and resolved to destroy them once. He did so, and though at great cost to himself financially, he nevertheless realized an enriching blessing in his act of self-sacrifice."

A Negro Woman's New Heart.—At the Noonday meeting, on July 25, the Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost said: "When I was a boy there was an old negro woman at a meeting I attended, giving her experience. After she had concluded an old man stood up and asked, 'Well, has the Lord changed your heart?' 'No,' she answered. 'What! do you mean to say that you are not converted; do you not love the brethren?' 'Yes, I love the brethren.' 'What do you mean, then, by saying that the Lord has not changed your heart?' 'Brother Johnstone,' said the negress, 'I and the Lord have been working on the old heart for forty years and more, and we could make "nothing of it," so He just threw it away altogether, and gave me a new one.'

Last Visit to the Theatre.—At the same Meeting, Mr. Brand, of New York, said: "When Mr. Pentecost was holding meetings in our city, a lady's son was desirous to be permitted to go to the theatre. She reluctantly consented, while she herself went to Mr. Pentecost's meeting. During the singing of the solo, 'Where is my wandering boy to-night?' her heart well-nigh burst with the thought of where her boy was. She returned home in great sorrow on his account, and when he came from the theatre, she said to him: 'Oh, my boy they sang the song, "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" at the meeting, and my heart felt very sore when I thought that you were on the way to hell. Will you not give your heart to the Lord?' The young man, overpowered by his mother's anxiety immediately knelt down and implored mercy."

THE DOOM OF ANTICHRIST, AND HIS FAMILY AND ALLIES.

The Fate of the Ten Kings—Their Unburied Bodies—"The Valley of Passengers"—The Evil Activities of Antichrist—Utter Destruction of Descendants and Kinsmen—Other Emphatic Predictions—Antichrist will be a Bonaparte—His Universal Sway and Final Fall—End of the Gentile Dispensation.

Now, though the penalty will be different until the judgment of the great white throne, Antichrist will not be alone punished for open defiance of the Most High; for both his family and the ten confederated kings of revived Rome will also suffer an immediate penalty for their rebellion.

As regards these last Gentile kings, it has been questioned, whether these ten, mentioned in Rev. 17:12, are the same whose alliance with Antichrist is described in Rev. 13:1. In the latter passage they appear as crownless, while in the former they are seen with crowns. In Rev. 17:12, we read that these ten heads of revived Rome "have received no kingdom as yet, but receive power as kings at one and the same hour with the Beast."

This would lead to the inference that the same personages are intended, but that they hold a different position at the close to that which they sustained at the commencement of the hebdomad. At first they are elected as presidents, or rather dictators, or ten federated republicans, for seven years; but in the middle of that term, either by election or by a coup d'état—like that of the two Napoleons—they, at the instigation of Antichrist, will assume the regal title, and then grant to him the imperial diadem as autocrat of the world.

After the defeat of Antichrist and his confederated kings in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the consequent capture and incarceration in Tartarus, they too, will have their fitting penalty, for they will be slain on the very field of the world's glory (Comp. Zech. 14 and Rev. 19:21).

THE FATE OF THE TEN KINGS.

After the Therion and his ecclesiastical agent are captured, we learn, from Rev. 19 : 21, that "the remnant were slain with the sword of Him who sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth." Nor are the causes of the death of the ten kings and their armies left to mere surmise, for by Christ's command, or the "sword of His mouth," plague and panic will become His executioners. No language can exaggerate the horrors of this judicial penalty, as no possible death can vie with it for physical agony. Thus Zechariah says (ch. 14 : 12-13) "their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongues shall consume away in their mouths." This sudden calamity will necessarily lead to such a maddening panic that "every one will lay hold of the hand of his neighbor and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbor." It is "a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

THEIR BODIES UNBURIED.

Like that of their imperial master, the bodies of the ten kings will not be hurried—their very flesh being devoured by vultures and beasts of prey. This terrible fate was first pre-recorded by Ezekiel, who says (39 : 17-19), "Speak unto every feathered fowl, and every beast of the field, Assemble yourselves and come ; gather yourselves on every side to My sacrifice, that I do sacrifice for you, even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh and drink blood. Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth . . . and ye shall eat fat till ye be full, and drink blood till ye be drunken of My sacrifice, which I have sacrificed for you."

The apocalyptic seer, also, in his marvellous panorama of the same period and locality, saw (Rev. 19 : 17-18) "An angel standing in (near) the sun, and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, 'Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God ; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all free and bond, both small and great.'"

"THE VALLEY OF PASSENGERS."

After this the bones of the ten kings and their princes, and multitudinous men of war will be buried together in an undistinguishable mass. So great will be the slaughter of the armies of the world, that Ezekiel intimates (39 : 11-16) that "the people of the land will sever out men of continual employment to pass through the land (that is Palestine) to bury" their bones. This will occupy seven months. The site assigned for their sepulchre, "the Valley of Passengers," is supposed to be in front of the Dead Sea. It will henceforth be known by a new name, that is Hamon gog, or the multitude or tumult of God.

THE EVIL ACTIVITIES OF ANTICHRIST.

Among the many evil activities of Antichrist will be his determination to (Dan. 7 : 25) "change times and laws" by a universal edict ; or, in other words, to remodel the whole arrangements of society according to his own notions. What the outcome of this tyranny will be we also learn from holy writ : For "framing mischief (iniquity) by law" (Psalm 94 : 20), as will Antichrist, not because he deems it right, but from sheer self-will, he will probably (1 Tim. 4 : 3) "forbid marriage," and advocate "free love"—the socialist euphemism for unrestrained lust. Whether he carries out his own theory or not, he will at least select one woman to bear the title of Queen.

Thus Nahum says, in a prophecy whose fulfilment was only adumbrated in the fall of Nineveh, (Nahum 2 : 7), "Huzzab shall be discovered (margin) and led away captive : she shall be brought up, and her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves, tahrering (or noaning and smiting) upon their breasts." As it is improbable that the Empress of Rome will be with the army when it invests Jerusalem we are warranted in inferring that on receiving the news of the awful defeat and captivity of her husband, she and her ladies of honor will hide themselves. But, as her very name, Huzzab, implies one that is discovered, we conclude that they will hide in vain, and, if not slain, will be carried away into a captivity which will only end with death.

UTTER DESTRUCTION OF DESCENDANTS.

Nor will his descendants and kinsmen escape the earthly penalty awarded to Antichrist ; for his family will be so extirpated that not one of his blood relations will be left to contaminate the earth, or by their existence serve to remind the Millennials of his awful career. Such extermination of a whole family will not be without its Biblical parallel ; for of the great traitor Judas we read in a Messianic Psalm (109 : 9-13), "Let his posterity be cut off, and in the generation following let their name be cut off." Now if there is any item in unfulfilled prophecy of whose meaning there can be no two opinions, it is this fact, that the family of Antichrist will be exterminated. To the prophet Job this fact was first foreshadowed ; and thus he wrote (Job 21 : 19), "God layeth up the punishment of his iniquity (margin) for his children." Thus, too, David, in the Messianic Psalm 21 : 8-10, says, "Thine hand shall find out all Thine enemies : Thy right hand shall find out those that hate Thee—their fruit (or offspring) shalt Thou destroy from the earth ; and their seed from the children of men." Malachi, also, in a prediction which unmistakably applies to the time of Antichrist (ch. 4 : 1) says, "Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven ; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble ; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith Jehovah of hosts, that shall leave them neither root nor branch," or proprietors and descendants.

OTHER EMPHATIC PREDICTIONS.

But two other prophecies which refer to the extirpation of the family of Antichrist are expressed in still more definite terms. Thus, Isaiah, while speaking of the future and last king of Babylon, says (Isa. 14 : 21-22), "Prepare slaughter for his children, for the iniquity of their fathers, that they do not rise nor possess the land, nor fill the face of the world with cities ; for I will rise up against them, saith Jehovah of Hosts, and cut off from Babylon the remnant and son and nephew," or, rather, grandchild. So the Edomite, Bildad, in his forecast of the activities of Antichrist, affirms that (Job 18 : 18-20) "He shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world : he shall have neither son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwelling. They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were laid hold on horror" [margin].

Lastly, as the earthly culmination of the penalty to be inflicted on Antichrist, Nahum (1 : 14) declares, "Jehovah hath given a commandment concerning thee, that no more of thy name be sown." And thus will perish out of the earth the family of that lawless one who had deluged it with blood, for, as they will necessarily rise with his rise, so will they fall with his fall, leaving, as foretold, "neither root nor branch."

ANTICHRIST WILL BE A BONAPARTE.

Many eminent students of prophecy have come to the conclusion that the last Antichrist will be a member of the Bonaparte family, probably either an obscure or despised branch. Among the most prominent are Hatley Frere, Edward Irving, Stanley Faber, and Dr. Keith. The startling evidence upon which their conclusions is based is exhaustively indicated in the 6th appendix of the "Forty Coming Wonders," by Rev. M. Baxter.

Based upon this theory it is also inferred that the ten last kings will, probably, either be related by blood or by marriage alliance to Antichrist. One prediction would seem to favor the inference that the ten last kings will either be members of Antichrist's family, or, at least, his most successful generals, for Daniel says (11 : 39) "he shall cause them to rule over the many." Thus, if nominally elected by the ten nations as their kings, they will be really nominated by Antichrist, just as, in 1870-1, after the Franco-German war, the minor kings of Germany nominally elected the King of Prussia German Emperor, while the real appointer was the unscrupulous Prince Bismarck.

If, then, this theory be correct, the nepotism of the First Napoleon will be only imitated by his successor. For when he subjected the continent, he created his elder brother, Joseph, King of Spain, his brother Louis, King of Holland, another brother, Jerome, King of Westphalia, his youngest brother, Lucien, reigning Prince of Canino, and his brother-in-law, Murat, King of Naples. Napoleon III. so far as his influence permitted, so avowedly copied his uncle in all his sayings and doings that at best he was only an echo of the Corsican usurper.

Napoleon III. had no brothers living at the time of his coup d'état, to elevate to the regal dignity, even if Europe would have permitted it. But he placed his relative, the Archduke Maximilian on the ephemeral throne of Mexico ; his cousin, Jerome Napoleon, became son-in-law to the King of Italy, through his intervention ; and another cousin, Lucien, he caused to be created a cardinal, doubtless with the view of his ultimate election to the Papedom.

HIS UNIVERSAL SWAY AND FINAL FALL.

But whoever Antichrist may be, no one who has read the biographies of past great conquerors—from Norman William down to Napoleon I.—can doubt that his family and followers, will reap the profit of his exaltation to universal sway. Speaking of this man, and denouncing his evil career, Habakkuk says (ch. 2 : 6 and 9), "Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his ! and to him that ladeth himself with thick clay ! Woe to him that gaineth an evil gain to his house (or family, margin) that he may set his nest on high, that he may be relieved from the power of evil !" We need not then be surprised to hear that Antichrist (Dan. 11 : 39) "shall cause them to rule over many," or rather the masses or nations. Nor will their honors be empty ones. For (Dan. 11 : 24) "He shall scatter among them the prey and spoil, and riches." Nay, in order to defray the cost of his armaments, and sustain the grandeur of his family, he will (Dan. 11 : 39) "divide the land of Palestine for a price" (margin).

It is thus seen that Antichrist—like the first Bonaparte—will raise his family to princely, if not regal dignity, with adequate means to support their exalted station. Thus, partaking in his exaltation, they will participate in his awful fall ; and either perish on the battlefield or at home.

END OF THE GENTILE DISPENSATION.

And so will end the Gentile dispensation, nay, so will close man's long reign, not only at open defiance of God, but in its highest symbol or representation being worshipped as God. And what other end can we anticipate of a world which tried its utmost to crush the Divine Man, who came solely to save it from itself ?—and which, doubtless, would echo the same cry, where He again to come in the disguise of a carpenter—"Crucify Him !" Herod or Barabbas rather than Jesus !

Happily for the future of the human race, the Crucified One is also the Untiring One, and so, when His feet again stand on Mount Olivet, it will not be solely for the epiphany of Himself and His Bride, the Church, but in order that He may subdue and reign over a world nigh six thousand years in rebellion. When that blissful period arrives—and every sign of our times tells that His chariot is on its road—the last item, at least, of the famous French motto, "Liberty, equality, and fraternity," will cease to be the symbol and watchword of a political party, but become a recognized, because visible, fact. For mankind will, for the first time, in spite of Darwinism, practically believe that Bible truth which Paul summarized so powerfully at Athens (Acts 17 : 26) : God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth."

Thus it is seen that, when men have filled up the measure of their guilt and hell seems to have conquered, the "King of nations" (Rev. 15 : 3, literal, as in margin) will reign with His viceroys, the resurrection-saints, and the world, for the first time, he ruled in righteousness. If, then, the parabolic prophecy of Zechariah (14 : 7) has first its physical fulfilment, it will also, happily, be morally accomplished, for "it shall come to pass at evening time it shall be light !"

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Marked Decrease in our Foreign Trade is observed in the statistics now published for the last fiscal year, which closed on June 30th. The entire volume of our foreign trade during 1881-2 amounted to $1,566,857,456. In 1880-1 it was $1,675,024,318. This is a decrease of $108,164,862. The reduction is on the domestic export side of the account, and the chief articles affected are cotton, breadstuffs and provisions. Leaving out the specie account the total exports were $750,351,173, and the imports $724,623,317; which is an excess of exports over imports of $25,727,856. In 1881-82 the exports exceeded the imports by $259,712,718. While our exports have decreased our purchases have increased over those of last year by nearly $82,000,000, and were more than double those of 1860. These facts will probably bring into greater prominence than usual the tariff as one of the issues of the approaching campaign.

Representatives Belonging to Both the great political parties have discovered that their support of the River and Harbor bill is likely to have considerable weight in the districts they represent in determining their political future. There has been a great deal of discussion as to the share the two parties had in the responsibility for the bill. The following summary, taken from the columns of an independent journal, may assist in deciding that question: "The vote, for the bill and against the veto, was composed of twenty Republicans and six Democrats from the Northern Atlantic States, thirty-six Republicans and one Democrat from the Western and Northwestern States, two Republicans and one Democrat from the Pacific States, and finally forty-four Democrats, five Republicans, four Greenbackers and two Readjusters from the Southern States; or, to sum up the vote more closely, the bill was passed over the veto by a coalition of Northern Republicans and Southern Democrats, Greenbackers and Readjusters. In the whole North and Northwest, including the Pacific States, only eight Democrats voted to pass the bill over the veto; in the South forty-four Democrats joined fifty-six Northern Republicans to pass the bill over the veto."

The Publication of Letters Written by Senator S. W. Dorsey to President Garfield reveals some unpleasant facts in relation to the troubled period between the presidential election and the President's assassination. These letters, like Whitelaw Reid's midnight despatch, show that General Garfield must have led a harassed, worried life for several months, and have paid a heavy penalty for the distinguished honor conferred upon him. The two irresponsible advisers of the President addressed him in a tone as dictatorial and disrespectful as it was unconstitutional, and the same selfish spirit, careful for the interests of the party and oblivious of the interests of the nation, animated both. The policy advocated by Senator Dorsey was denounced by Mr. Reid, and it is evident that the President, if he had many such friends as these two, would, if he had lived, have had a miserable term. It is difficult to see what good purpose can be served by the publication of these letters at the present time, and it is certain that at least in one direction their influence must be injurious.

The Most Prominent Question in the Fall campaign in Illinois promises to be that of prohibition. A Chicago journal says: "The liquor men of this State are going into the canvass for members of the Legislature this fall exclusively on a whiskey basis. They are organizing the legislative district for this purpose, and are soon to hold a State convention, to promote the same end. They are governed by no political principles, and propose to use the franchise of freemen for no great interest of the community or the State, but simply to sustain, promote and extend the liquor traffic. At a meeting of the Chicago Saloon Keepers' Association, on the 19th, it was resolved to support no man who would not give the strongest pledges to oppose temperance, and they require that the parties shall distinctly disavow prohibition by a plank in their platforms."

The Efficacy of Prohibition in Maine has of late been disputed in the daily journals. It is, however, worthy of note that ex-Secretary Blaine, who probably knows the State as thoroughly as any living man, testifies to the effects of the law in the course of his recently published letter to the Republicans of Maine. Mr. Blaine says: "Intemperance has steadily decreased in the State since the first enactment of the prohibitory law, until now it can be said with truth that there is no equal number of people in the Anglo-Saxon world among whom so small an amount of intoxicating liquor is consumed as among the 650,000 inhabitants of Maine."

The Death of Senator Benjamin H. Hill occurred on Wednesday, August 16, after a long and painful illness. Senator Hill was fifty-nine years of age, having been born in Jasper Co., Ga., on September 14, 1823. He studied at the University of Georgia and passed with high honors, when he at once commenced the study of the law. He was elected to the State Legislature in 1850. He declined a renomination in 1853, but accepted it and was elected in 1859. He strongly opposed the secession ordinance introduced in the State Convention of 1861, but after it was passed Mr. Hill decided to go with his State. He sat in the Confederate Senate as Senator from Georgia and served ed in that capacity until the close of the war. In 1875 he was chosen to succeed Garrett McMillan in the 44th Congress and was re-elected the following year. In March, 1877, the Legislature elected him a United States Senator. In July, 1881, it became known that Mr. Hill was suffering from cancer of the tongue, and a letter of sympathy of a very gratifying character was signed by every Senator at the Capital and sent to him. Senator Hill occupied throughout his life a very prominent position in the political world, and though he had many enemies, he appears to have made many friends by whom his death is sincerely lamented.

The Outbreak of Yellow Fever at Brownsville, Texas, is not abated in severity. There were thirty-eight new cases reported on August 18th, and intelligence from Matamoros showed that the epidemic there was still spreading. The following appeal to the General Government for aid has been forwarded to Washington by the Mayor of Brownsville, indorsed by the Governor of Texas: "One of the results of the quarantining of this city by all the ports of Texas and New Orleans has been the throwing out of employment of a large portion of our working population. These people, thus deprived of their resources, have become paupers, and are dependent for means of existence on charity, and we have thus far kept them from want and have established a hospital for the care of the sick, fumigated and disinfected. We can bear the burden imposed on us by the sickness alone, but the pressure of 2000 unemployed and destitute people warrants us in asking that you apply to the General Government for such relief as under the circumstances it may deem desirable to grant. If we have to care for the destitute we cannot deal with the sick, and neglect of either will bring about an immediate and most probably uncontrollable increase of the disease."

The President's Flag which was Hoisted on the vessel by which he travelled from Washington to New York is a special flag made to be carried at the masthead of Government vessels when the chief executive is on board. It is fourteen feet long by eleven feet broad. The material is navy blue bunting. In the centre is the American coat of arms, the American eagle holding in its mouth the pennant, on which is inscribed "E pluribus Unum," perched on a shield, grappling in one claw a bunch of arrows and in the other a bunch of oak leaves above the coat of arms. Arranged in a semicircle are thirteen white stars, representing the thirteen original States.

An Effort to Check the Progress of Opium smoking in New York is being made. The practice is spreading with alarming rapidity and new dens are being opened in all parts of the city. In several of the most aristocratic localities the dens flourish and are crowded from morning to night with native Americans of both sexes as well as with foreigners. The police have at last commenced moving against the opium dens, and last week two of them were raided and the proprietors and the visitors were arrested. It is stated that many young people contract the habit through curiosity. It should be known that, once formed, the opium habit is more difficult to overcome than the passion for intoxicating liquor.

The Annual Camp Meeting at Sing Sing, which closed on August 17th, was a most successful meeting. The president of the board of trustees said on the last day that the meeting had been more successful in every way than for several preceding seasons. The attendance has been larger than last year, and there is every indication of a steady increase in the future. The running expenses of the meeting are about $1200 annually, and this year this amount has been met and there will be a surplus of $600 in the treasury. There was a floating debt of $5000, which has all been paid off. Next year the trustees will make a large number of improvements at an outlay of not less than $2000. These improvements will include a regrading of the grounds, the changing of existing streets and the laying out of new ones, the erection of an additional number of tents, an enlargement of the lodging-house, needed changes in the preachers' stand, and the laying out of a park at the back of the circle of tents.

A Destructive Tornado Passed over Bangor, Me., on Tuesday August 15. It struck the city about six o'clock in the evening, doing considerable damage to buildings and crops. A report from a correspondent in Bangor says: The wind blew with terrific velocity, and the rain fell in sheets, converting the streets into roaring streams, the whole accompanied by incessant thunder and lightning. Buildings were blown down, roofs taken off, chimneys demolished and signs and awnings carried away. The spire of a church was blown to the ground and the roof of the county court-house was taken off. The European and North American Railroad Company's sheds were blown down and the cars imprisoned. Several houses were badly damaged, hundreds of chimneys went over, and the business streets of the city are almost impassable with bricks and debris, while large numbers of trees lie across other streets of the city. It is thought that the loss on buildings will amount to $100,000.

The Unfolding of a Rosebud Recently Suggested consolation to a bereaved family. A dearly loved child died at its home in Auburn, Me., and when the body was laid in the casket a rosebud was plucked from a neighboring garden and the stem was placed in one of the lifeless little hands. A day or two elapsed between this incident and the funeral ceremony. In the interval the rosebud in the hand of clay was seen to gradually unfold. When the service was held the bud had become a blossom. The sorrowing parents saw in this incident a mute reminder that beautiful and precious as their dead child was to them when living, its perfect development, like that of the rosebud, would be attained after it had been gathered by Him who gave and had taken away (1 Cor. 15:42, 43).

A Heavy Penalty for Curiosity was Paid by a visitor to Denver, Col., recently. He was walking along the track toward Denver when he picked up a giant cap—one used to explode giant powder. As he had never before seen one it excited his curiosity, and he began picking the dust out with a pin. While thus engaged the cap exploded, blowing off the first two fingers and thumb of the left hand and the thumb of the right. He tied his mutilated hands up in a handkerchief as best he could, and shortly afterward was picked up by a train which conveyed him to Denver. He was taken to the office of a physician and the necessary surgical operations were performed. He certainly learned the power of the explosive article, but at fearful cost to himself. Numbers of young men who are curious to see life in great cities, and who visit vicious resorts for that purpose, have had an experience still more disastrous, for they have lost their souls in their investigation. In such cases Solomon's advice is the only safe course to follow. (Prov. 1:15).

A Remarkable Meteorological Phenomenon was witnessed on Lake Michigan on Tuesday August 8. Capt. Stine, of the steamer Menominee, reports that when in midlake, a thick, cold cloud swept over the water and burst over the steamer, and her decks were covered with snow and slush. The Menominee was moving at the time at a speed of about fourteen miles an hour. For five minutes the atmosphere was like that of winter, and with the snow on them and on deck the officers felt as if the boat had suddenly plunged into winter. At the expiration of the five minutes, when the boat had passed out of the polar wave, the atmosphere became warm and summer suddenly again set in. Capt. Stine and his officers and passengers were greatly puzzled at the phenomenon. Snow in that latitude in August is something wholly unprecedented. The cloud, or polar wave, was accompanied by a roaring sound, though the wind was by no means high or swift at the time, and numerous gulls hovered about the vessel, shrieked a dismal chorus, and whirled away. The melancholy birds seemed to be travelling with the storm as a part of it. The phenomenon, though unusual, is easily accounted for by meteorologists. An experience of which this is a type sometimes comes upon the believer. From the bright scene of ease and prosperity he passes into bleak adversity, when for the moment even God's face seems hidden from him. God in His wisdom and love permits this as a necessary discipline intended to lead to self examination and more complete consecration (Psa. 119:67).

A Novel Safe Deposit Vault has been Robbed in Ohio. It seems that a farmer recently came into possession of eight hundred dollars, which he did not know where to deposit. He would not take it to a bank, because a few years ago he lost a large sum by the failure of a Cincinnati Savings Institution. Nor would he place it with any Safe Deposit Company, having a dread of loss. Procuring a strong tin box, he placed the money in it, fastening it securely, and put the box in the bottom of an old ash barrel in his wood-shed, filling the barrel up with various kinds of rubbish. He placed a box on top of it, which he filled with straw, and placed in one corner a dozen eggs and an old setting hen. He argued that should thieves come around they would never think of looking for anything valuable in an old barrel of rubbish, and even should they chance to suspect the hiding place, the hen would make such a clatter that the household would be aroused. A few days ago having nothing else to do, he examined the barrel, when to his dismay he found that the tin box, with its contents, had been removed. His device, crafty as it was, had failed him as utterly as the bank had done (Prov. 28:11). If his double loss lead him to obey our Saviour's injunction the money will be well lost (Matt. 6:19-20).

A House Believed to be Haunted was Opened last week after being closed thirty-two years. It stands about two miles from Paterson, N. J., and the last occupants of it, an aged couple, were brutally murdered there. The walls and floor were stained with their blood, and no one would live in the place. It has been shut up ever since, but it is now intended to reconstruct the building, and so remodel it as to destroy the associations with the crime. It was not an easy matter to effect an entrance into the house. The vines had grown so thickly around the doors and windows that a way was cleared with much difficulty. The hinges of the doors had rusted almost solid and had to be pushed open by main force. The room had a damp smell, and everything was partially decayed; the furniture was almost hidden under the dust, and there were masses of cobwebs in the corners, and there was a hole in the roof through which the rain had trickled until there was a hole rotted through the floors and ceilings. It was a scene of desolation, such as is seldom seen in a civilized city. The wretched place, branded with associations of crime, its doors fast closed, and its furniture in ruins, is a fit illustration of the state of an impenitent man's heart before Christ takes possession of it, and makes all things new (Mark 7:20-23).

A Moment of Peril on the Elevated Railroad was experienced by the passengers in a train on Monday, August 14. The custom adopted on the Third Avenue line is for the engine drawing a train to be detached from it on reaching a terminus. An engine standing on a middle line of rails then backs up to the train and is connected with the last car, which then becomes the first car on the return trip. As soon as the train starts the detached engine follows it as far as the switch and there passes to the middle line ready for the next train. On Monday the brakeman managing this operation dropped his lever too quickly, and the switch was turned for the engine before the last car had passed. The rear wheels entered the switch to the middle line while the front wheels were on the down line. Then the car careened and seemed about to fall into the street below. A cry was raised and the air-breaks applied only just in time to save the car, which was so strained that it had to be removed for repairs. The passengers were much alarmed, but happily no one was hurt. The companies have frequently boasted of the absolute safety of their lock switch system, but this narrow escape shows that, like all human contrivances, it is fallible. It is in life as in railway travelling, the place where most care is needed is at the switches; it is so easy there to leave the right track unless there is constant watchfulness and prayer. (Prov. 4:25-27).

THE VOICE BEHIND THEE.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, 'This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left.'"—Isaiah 30:21.

The Warning Voice—An Unconditional Promise—I. The Position of the Wanderer—His Back Toward God—Going Further Away—In Spite of Warning—Whitewashed Sins—Left Hand Sins—II. The Call of Mercy—Undesired—Unsought—Flying from Methodists in the Backwoods—A Daughter's Interdicted Bible—A Town Smelling of Lavender—The Unseen Caller—The Sinner Overtaken—An Opportune Call—Absolutely Necessary—III. The Words of the Call—Specific Instructions—Personal Direction—IV. The Success of the Call—Its Effects—Uneasiness—Desire—Resolve—Which is my Way?

ON the Sabbath before last we spoke concerning "the still small voice." * After the thunder and the fire and the earthquake had passed away, for the Lord was not in them, there came a still small voice unto Elijah, which reached the prophet's heart, and brought him back to his former condition of communion with God. This morning we shall hear that same "still small voice" actually speaking a warning and teaching word, and we shall see how it operates upon the sinner, reaching both his ear and his heart. God calls to the rebellious, and by His gentle word they are brought to His feet with repentance, turned from their evil wandering, and led in the way of obedience.

The word behind us which is spoken of in the text is mentioned as one among other covenant blessings. No "if" or "but" is joined to it. It is one of those gracious, unconditional promises upon which the salvation of the guilty depends. There are many comforts of the new life which depend upon our own action and behavior, and these come to us with "ifs;" but those which are vital and essential are secured to the chosen of God without "but" or "peradventure." It shall be so: God declares it shall, and He has power to carry out every jot and tittle of every promise that He makes to His people.

I. I invite you to notice first of all the position of THE WANDERER to whom this special blessing comes. How does God find men when He declares that they shall hear a word behind them? First, He finds them with their backs turned to Him. This is clear enough, if you remember that the word is to be heard "behind" them. The sinner has gone away from God, and God calls after him from behind. He has turned his back upon his true Friend, his best Friend, his only capable Friend, but that Friend does not therefore change His temper and resent the insult; nay, He is provoked to a love more pleading and persuasive than ever, and calls to him to come into the right way. The word of warning, instruction, and entreaty follows the wanderer, and with ever-increasing pathos beseeches him to turn and live. Again and again the wise, earnest, personal voice assails his ear, as if love resolved that he should not perish if wooing could win him to life. The wanderer seeks not God, but his God seeks him. Man turns from the God of love, but the love of God turns not away from him.

Observe that these persons had not only turned their backs on God, but they were going further and further away from Him. Of course, when you have once turned your back upon the right, the further you travel the more wrong you become. They were not content to be near to God, even with their backs to Him, but they hastened away. They are eager and quick to escape from their own mercy. Like the prodigal, they are not satisfied till they get into "a far country;" they cannot rest in the same land with their God; they journey with all speed away from the Lord, and the greater the distance that they can set between themselves and their Father the more are they at ease. In forgetting God they find a horrible peace; the peace of death, a peace which will stupefy them into eternal destruction.

Now, it is while they are thus going hot foot away from God, further and further every day, madly rushing along the downward road, never satisfied with the sin to which they have attained, flying from God as if He were their terror and would be their destroyer, it is even then that the word sounds behind them and they are startled into thought. They have pleading with them thus: "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die, O house of Israel? This is the way, walk ye in it. The way you are now pursuing is not the way to peace and safety; return at once, for this is the way, walk ye in it." Here again I admire the overflowing riches of the grace of God, that He should call men to Himself when they are altogether taken up with other things, when every thought, and every word, and every act is in rebellion against Him.

More than this, however, is true. They had turned their backs on God, and were going further from Him, though they were warned not to do so, and they were pursuing their course in spite of warning. Read the twentieth verse: "Thine eyes shall see thy teachers;" there they stood, good men, right in the way, entreating their hearers to cease from provoking their God and destroying their own souls. Hear them cry, "Turn ye from your iniquities, for this way leads to death; turn ye, turn ye." They can see their teachers stretching out their hands with eager importunity, pleading even unto boiling tears, persuading them to turn from the way and the wages of sin. Still they push on, as if eternal destruction were a prize to be sought rather than a doom to be dreaded.

Was it not so with many of us in the days of our unregeneracy? Mother and father endeavored to block up the evil road; in them our eyes beheld our teachers. How they taught us; how they prayed with us; how they labored if possible to turn us from the error of our ways! But we persevered with obstinate resolve. It is hard going to hell over a pleading mother, and equally hard to destroy one's self by pushing aside an earnest father's good advice; but we seemed resolved to do so. Then perhaps followed Sunday-school teachers, full of intense love to us; and how they pleaded! How wisely they set the case before us, and how tenderly they pleaded; our eyes did see our teachers, but still our eyes would not see the right way, nor would our hearts desire it; we were determined that we would by hook or by crook land ourselves in hell.

In after-life it may be our teachers were earnest pastors, who could not preach dull, dead sermons, and would not suffer us to sleep ourselves into perdition. They cried aloud and spared not; they were in anguish about us; they gave themselves no rest until we would turn from our iniquities. We could see our teachers, and we had a loving respect for them too, yet we cast their word behind our back; it was of no use to us; we loved iniquity, and that way we would go, come what might of it. Yet even then, when we were despising God's prophets and paying no regard to all the words of warning, the Lord was still loving us, looking after us, and crying after us, and saying, "This is the way, this is the way; walk ye in it. Come back, come back, come back; you are destroying yourselves; return unto your Father and your God."

One more mark of the ungodly condition of those whom God would call was this, that they had many ways in which to wander. Sometimes they roamed to the right hand, at other times they wandered to the left, but they never turned face about. Hear ye the way to heaven; it is right about face, then keep straight on to glory. Nay, but we will turn this way, or we will turn that way, we will turn any way except to God. Some men have right-hand sins, respectable iniquities which challenge little censure from their fellows; not black, but

WHITEWASHED SINS.

Such men are not thieves, they are not licentious, they are not drunkards, but their sins take a quieter form; they mock God with their self-righteousness, and insult Him with their prayers, which are no prayers, but only pretences and fictions, and not the real prayers of God's elect ones.

Others have left-hand sins; they plunge into the sins of the flesh; no vice is too black for them. Only propose to have a little pleasure and they will plunge into any vice to gain it; ay, and almost without pleasure, altogether without present profit, they will sin, as if for sin's own sake.

II. Now, for a little while, we will dwell upon THE CALL OF MERCY.

"Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee."

Notice, it is a call that is altogether undesired, and comes unsought to the man who has gone astray. He hears the inward call whose voice is "Return;" he looks for a moment, and then puts his foot down to pursue his journey. "Never," he says, "will I alter my course," and he boldly hastens on, though before him lie death and hell. As he is persevering in his ruinous course the same word again bids him "Return." He hears the admonition, but still he pushes on; he must not and will not return from the way of evil. If he could reach a spot where such disturbing voices would never trouble him how gladly would he hasten toward it. Hence so many altogether forsake the place of worship; they prefer the stagnant pool of stupid obstinacy to the sweet river of the water of life. So far from desiring to be warned, if they could voyage to a distant Tarshish, where voices of warning would never reach them more, it would be a delightful journey; and if ship could be taken, they would, like Jonah, pay the fare to the shipmaster, and secure a berth in the next vessel.

I have heard of one

of America who was unloading his furniture, and while doing so up rode a Methodist minister. "Confound you," said he, "I have moved half a dozen times to get away from you Methodist fellows; I am never comfortable where you are. I will put the things on the cart again, and find a spot where I shall be free from you." On they went to another clearing, but when they reached it the first thing that happened, before the man took up his lodging, was the appearance of a Methodist minister. "Where shall I go to get away from you Methodist preachers?" "There is nowhere I know of," said the minister, "that you can go; for I am afraid if you go to hell you will find some of them there, for preachers have been lost. The very best thing you can do is to yield at once, and let me hold a service to-night in your camp." That was sound advice; and so some of you will be pestered and worried as long as you live if you will not come to Christ. Omnipotence has servants everywhere, and these are all charged to warn you of your peril.

I knew one who would not go to a place of worship, and turned every Bible out of his house; but he found a copy of the holy book in his house, and as he cursed and swore he learned that it was the property of a daughter whom he loved too much to scold, and he was obliged to let the sacred volume rest where she had placed it. A Bible in a house where it is forbidden to be read is a splendid power for good, as he soon discovered. In a house where it is outwardly honored the Bible may have little influence, but if it gets where it must not be allowed, everybody reads it. If you can make God's Word to be forbidden fruit, Eve will feed on it, and Adam will follow her. Thus the grace of God came into the house, and it could never be expelled.

Down by Mitcham, when the lavender is growing, if you take a house there you will discern a smell of lavender, you may shut the windows and close the doors, but when any persons enter a whiff of lavender enters with them, you cannot help it; and if you live where the Gospel is preached at all you will be sure to hear it, and made to know of it. It is God's intention that you should. It is a voice that comes unasked and undesired, but come it does.

"A word behind thee;" it is the voice of an unseen caller whose existence has been almost forgotten. It is not the teachers that speak in this powerful way. The teachers you have seen with your eyes, and they have done you no good; but some one calls whom you never saw and never will see till He sits on the throne of judgment at the last great day; but still He utters a word which cannot be kept out of your ears.

I recollect one who in this very city plunged into all manner of gayety to try to get rid of this word yet God met him in a play; words were used in the performance which touched his conscience, and he fled from the playhouse as from a burning building, fell on his knees, and sought and found the Saviour. This call of mercy is the word of hidden One; you cannot see who it is that speaks yet you cannot shut your ears to His admonition nor refuse reverence to His warnings.

This voice pursues and overtakes the sinner. Do you see him running, with all his might rushing to his own destruction? The word comes, first, rather feebly—"Return." He scarcely looks back, but on he flies. Lo, the voice follows. He runs faster from it to show his determination to carry out his own will. The voice still follows him saying, "Return." Then he stops a minute, but being desperately enamored of his transgression he again takes to his heels to fly away from God still the word pursues his footsteps, and in pleading accents cries, "Return, return, return, return;" till at last he is constrained to sit down and listen to the word which comes from he knows not where. He cannot understand how and why it comes so home to him, but it is a fulfilment of the promise it is the word behind him saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it."

That voice when it comes to sinners is generally most opportune, for according to the text they are to hear this voice behind them to the right hand or to the left. A man may go steadily plodding on in his course of ungodliness and hear no such word of pleading, but how often it has happened that there has been a temptation of a more than usually forceful character, and the traveller was about to turn to the right, and then at that precise moment, he has heard the word of God behind him giving him warning.

Or it may be it is what I have described as left-handed sin; the man was carried on to a action which, if he had actually performed it would have involved his sure destruction. Even where the Spirit of God does not save a man keeps him from many a sin; and when men rebel against the light and will not yield to it, yet still that light has a restraining influence over them, which they may be unconscious. Those who watch them know that if that bit and bridle had not been supplied by the word, they would have gone to an excess of riot which would have been dangerous to others as well as totally destructive to themselves.

And you see, to close this second point, that it is absolutely necessary that the potent word should be spoken and should be heard. For the man has seen his teachers, but they had not wrought him any good. How often the Lord seems to put His ministers right up in the corner with our faces to the wall, till we are little in the eyes of our hearers and little in our own eyes. He does so with me and while I can glorify His name and bless Him abundantly for the many that are brought to Christ, yet I never take the slightest congratulation to myself about it, for what am I but the driest and most barren stick that there is in all my Master's garden apart from His watering? If sinners had nothing to save them but us poor preachers, not one of them would be brought up from death and hell.

The word behind us is needful, that "still small voice" which no mortal man can speak, but only God Himself, that inward monition of the conscience, that touching language of the heart, which is as much beyond the power of man as to make world or breathe life into an image of clay.

III. But what was

THE WORD OF THAT CALL?

It is stated at full length, "This is the way, walk ye in it." That is the word of the call. It contains within itself, first, specific instruction. "This is the way." There is a kind of preaching which has nothing specific, definite, and positive in it; it is a bit of cloud-land, and you may make what you like out of it—God's grace or man's merit, faith in Christ or faith in self. You need to be your own instructor, and then like the child looking into the fire you will see whatever your own eye chooses to create. Too much preaching is of a kind so mixed that it reminds me of the showman when his visitors asked, "Which is Wellington and which is Napoleon?" "Whichever you please," said he; "you have paid your money and you may take your choice." So it seems to be with many preachers as to doctrine. You may have what kind of doctrine you like so long as you pay your few-rent.

"Cleverly put," cries one, when he has heard a smart sermon. Is not that enough? I answer, it is not enough; we want the sure testimony of revelation, sealed in the heart by the Holy Ghost. Cleverness is not God's way of blessing men. Conjectures and loose opinions are not worth the breath which is expended in expressing them. The Lord lays down a definite pathway, and He says, "This is the way." "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved; this is the way. Repent and be converted, every one of you; this is the way. To leave sin, to quit self, to trust in Christ; this is the way." Something definite is laid down before those who desire to be taught of God, and they are told what is to be done, what is to be received, what is to be given up. "This is the way." Definite instruction is given. This may not suit the Broad School, but it is exactly what the anxious seeker needs.

This is followed up by a word of personal direction. "Walk ye in it." Do not merely hear about it, but "walk ye in it." Be not content to be critics, thinkers, and considerers, but become doers of the word. "This is the way," here is the doctrine; "Walk ye in it," there is the practice. Well is it when the Lord by His Spirit speaks to the runaway sinner and tells him what he is to do and to believe; then He makes the way and the walk to be vividly present, "This is the way, walk ye in it" without delay.

This takes the form of encouraging permission. Some think they may not come to Christ. They actually ask the question, in Him? Is there salvation for me?" Why, saith the text, "This is the way." Do not sit looking at it: "walk ye in it." "But I am so big a sinner." "Christ is the way; walk ye in it." There is room enough for big sinners in Jesus. "But I have been so long coming." Never mind; this is the way. "walk ye in it." Never mind if you have been seventy years coming, if you have come to the way at last, "Walk ye in it." "But I am afraid my feet are so polluted that I shall stain the way." "This is the way, walk ye in it."

"MAY I BELIEVE

You are not told to stand on one side and wait till something shall happen to you which shall persuade you to come, but here is the king's highway, walk ye in it. Walking is the simplest of all exercises. There is no great artistic skill required in order to walk, but walking is all that is wanted. Come to Christ, come to Him anyhow. Oh soul, tumble to Him somehow; trust Him as best you can; and if you cannot do it without question, trust Him because you must trust Him, since you have nobody else to trust to. Throw yourself into Jesus' arms; swoon away on the bosom of Christ. It is the essence of faith to die into the life of God in Christ Jesus. This is the message which comes behind many a runaway sinner, "This is the way, walk ye in it."

IV. According to our text success is promised to the word. "Thine ear shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." Notice, thine ears shall hear. God not only gives us something to hear, but He gives us ears to hear with. Teachers cannot make men hear. They can appeal to the external ear, and after that they have no more that they can do; but God can make men hear. Without violating the freedom of their wills He can get at their hearts, at their consciences, at their understandings, and He can press the truth home to their souls. When the Lord does it, it is done. When we do it, it is often so done that afterward it is undone, but verily I know that what God doeth shall be forever. All that is of nature's spinning will be unravelled one day; but when God spins, it will last throughout eternity.

THE SUCCESS OF THE WORD—

I take it when we read here, "Thine ears shall hear," it means first, that the message of divine love shall come to the man's mind so as to create uneasiness in it. He is jauntily traversing the road to destruction; he has chosen the path, and he delights in it. It often looks to him to be a flowery way, a pleasant road. So he walks on, and he would be very happy but for that word behind him crying, "Turn ye! turn ye! turn ye!" Just as he was turning down that glade in the wood to the right, where all the flowers of spring are found in profusion, that call troubled him again! He would sooner have seen a serpent hissing in the pathway, or heard a lion roar from the thicket, than have heard that word.

The man says, "I never can be quiet; I can see other people going to amusements and pleasures, and they heartily enjoy themselves; but the fact is, the more amusement I have the less I am amused, and I am never more miserable than when everybody else is laughing. Why am I thus?" He wishes he had never heard the parson preach the sermon which bothered him so; he wishes he had never had a godly mother at all, that he might have gone straight away into sin, and have been as merry as a cricket; but now there is that voice again behind him, boring its way into his tingling ears. For a moment he had forgotten it, but there it comes again—"Turn! turn! turn! turn!" He stops his ears; but it bombards his soul with worse than cannon balls; as if the word of God pounded him with shells, he hears the thunders of the cannonade, "Return! Return! Return!" What can he do? He longs to escape from the divine rebuke. The word has made him quiver and quake. So far so good. We shall see next

WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO HIM.

After a while there gets to be a desire in his heart. It is only a faint and spasmodic desire, nothing very strong or constant—but there it is, and it cannot be quenched. "I wish I could get right somehow; for in my present condition I am in an evil case; I am sailing in the wrong boat; I wish I could land somewhere, and take the return boat and get to my home. I do not feel at all easy, I wish I knew what to do to be saved. I do know it somehow, for I have heard it every Sabbath day, but yet I do not understand it; I cannot get hold of it. I do not feel as I ought. I am told to believe, but I do not know what it means, or I cannot do it." He is getting on all right, friends. We shall have a better bulletin concerning him directly. He is wonderfully improving; a great deal of the fever of pride has gone out of the man; we shall have him yet in perfect health. He could not rest because he heard too much of the word behind him, and now he cannot rest because he cannot hear enough of it; he desires that it may penetrate his soul and change him from darkness to light.

What shall happen next? As that voice continues to sound, it pulls him up, and leads to resolve. He does not dare go any further; he sits down to consider. I think I saw him on his knees too. I am glad he has come to that pass. Friend, you are just like the prodigal when he said, "I will arise and go to my father;" only take care you do not end in resolutions. Let it be said of you as of that same prodigal, "He arose, and came to his father;" for all our resolutions are not worth the making unless they be most earnestly and speedily carried into effect. Observe the effect of the word behind the wanderer. Cannot you see the man who was running so fast? He has pulled up. He sees a line drawn across his path, and he must not go over it. He feels that if he goes further he may never have another call of mercy, and this makes him pause. Did not we sing this morning,

"Soon that voice will cease its calling?"

The man is anxious to obey while he may. He is not yet resolved to go back, but he dares not go further.

What will be

of this inner work? Since the man dares not go any further in this wrong way, what is he to do? He cannot turn to the right or to the left, for God has hedged up his way with thorns. Now, listen to what he will say, "I will return unto my first husband, for it was better with me than than now." This poor soul looks on Him whom he pierced. He did not know he was piercing his Redeemer; but now he sees it all, and while his eyes begin to stream with tears, he turns unto this Christ upon the cross, and finds life while looking at Him. Now he enquires,

"WHICH IS MY WAY?"

Speak, sweet voice; speak, sweet voice; tell me which is my way." And now the voice moves and speaks in front of him; for shepherds go before their sheep. The man looks and sees the Crucified One with pierced hands and feet leading the way, and he delights to follow Him; ay, and he shall follow Him until at the last he shall see His face in glory everlasting. Redeemed by blood and rescued by power eternal, and brought home to the great Shepherd's fold, to go no more out forever, the sinner shall be filled with gladness. Listen, then, listen, ye that have turned your backs on God! Infinite mercy woos you, boundless compassion entreats you to be saved. Turn ye; turn as you are, all black and filthy and bemired; tarry not to mend or wash, but come to Jesus all unholy and unclean, without a single sound speck upon your leprous frame, utterly lost and ruined. Christ died for such as you. I say again, tarry not to improve yourselves, but come now, while mercy's voice invites you, while the Holy Ghost not only entreats, but sweetly constrains. Come and welcome, sinners, come. The Lord bless you. Amen.

WILLIAM LOVETT'S DIFFICULTIES.

ONE wintery afternoon, just before sunset, two companions in sorrow were seen threading their way through a grove of trees near a Southern cemetery. They sustained to each other the relation of brother and sister, and had just returned from the funeral of their father. They had been shocked by the talk of eager legatees, who could not suppress their selfish din even whilst the corpse lay in the house, and so the two had wandered out for an hour's quietness, and for such consultation as the circumstances required. William Lovett, though the subject of many prayers, was in an unsettled state of mind about religion. It had been his misfortune to be much in the society of some who, though loud professors, were far from adorning the doctrine in all things, and he had been particularly disgusted by observing that those of the legatees whose conduct had been most unseemly and avaricious, were people who, of all others, ought to have been most careful not to bring religion into contempt by their inconsistency.

"I wonder," said William Lovett to his sister, "how such people can put on such a face to talk to me about conversion and the like, while their own conduct falls below common decency." "Yes," said Miss Lovett; "dear father used to say that if he were to look only at the conduct of many professors of religion, he would be a down-right infidel. But you remember how he used to add that hypocrisy, so far from proving religion an imposture, is one evidence of its truth. People would not think it worth while to be hypocrites if there were not something transcendently good and noble in real religion. It has become proverbial that hypocrisy is the compliment that vice pays to virtue, and it is a compliment that many people are only too ready to pay. But you and I, William, have at any rate seen real religion in the life of our father and mother."

"Yes," said William, "I must own that our father's high-minded integrity and readiness to suffer loss rather than swerve from his sense of right, impressed me more than all the arguments for religion I ever heard. And as to our dear mother's patience and tenderness, I never knew anything like it. Nothing brought home to me the fact of an infinite love like that love of hers."

Miss Lovett Argues a Difficult Question.

Mrs. Edwards Astonished by an Unexpected Arrival.

Miss Lovett was delighted to find that impressions so deep had been made upon the mind of her brother, and in her heart said of him, "Thou art not far from the Kingdom of God!" Still she felt he who was not far from the kingdom, was nevertheless outside of it, and she lost no opportunity of pressing upon him the importance of accepting once for all God's offer of pardon and peace in Jesus Christ. His attachment to his sister thus conspired with his reverence for the memory of his father and mother to prepare his mind for the reception of saving truth, and he became a decided and active Christian.

THE WANDERER'S RETURN.

IN the Captain's cabin of a vessel approaching the American shores, two men sat late one night smoking and talking. They were the Captain and one of his passengers. At last the Captain said, "We shall be in sight of land in the morning, and you have not kept your promise of telling me your story. You said you were like Tennyson's hero Enoch Arden; you have aroused my curiosity and you must gratify it." The passenger, whose name was Arthur Edwards, consented, and this was the story he told:

"To begin at the beginning," he said, "you must know that ten years ago I married the best woman in the world. No offence to you, Captain, if you are a married man, but that is what I think of my wife. A good woman, too, who would have made a better man of me than I was if I would have let her. She tried to get me to attend church and to give up a lot of habits I had that she did not like, but she failed, though I loved her dearly. She had many suitors beside me, and when she accepted me she chose the poorest man of the lot and not the best by any means. We did fairly well at first, but two years ago trouble came and I lost the little money I had. We had two children, the youngest only a month old, and I saw with dismay that our few dollars were fast melting away.

"Then I had an offer to go out to China in charge of a cargo which I was to sell, and purchase with the proceeds goods for the home voyage. I accepted that, for it promised well, and the house kindly offered to advance a sum on account of my commission to keep the family while I was away. I made the voyage out safely and finished up the business in good style. I put my heart in it, and I tell you the people who sent me out must have made a pile of dollars out of my bargain. One night I was on deck idly looking around; we were to sail for home early the next morning and I was glad enough at the thought. The vessel had been towed out of the harbor so that we might start at daybreak, and I saw the sun set on the strange scene of a Chinese port, the strangest I think in the world. Suddenly I saw a dark object falling apparently right over my head and I sprang aside to avoid it, lost my footing and fell overboard. I could not swim, but there was a large barrel floating near the ship and I managed to get hold of it, but almost instantly it was dashed against the side of the ship and I got a blow on the head that seemed to crush it. I felt the blood run down my neck and I remember no more.

"It seems I was picked up and taken ashore and attended by a missionary doctor, an Englishman, in the port. But they despaired of me and before midnight they thought I was dead, and sent word to the ship, and she sailed without me. But it was not death though a bad swoon. The doctor says I surprised them all the next morning by showing signs of life. Then I had brain fever and it was nearly two months before I knew where I was and in a kind of dazed way realized my position. The missionary did not know where my friends were, so he could not write to them; so I knew that by that time my wife must have received news of my death.

"My mind was full of morbid fancies, the result of my illness, and I could not bring myself to the task of writing, and very foolishly I had the idea that it would be better for my wife to believe me dead, so I never wrote at all. I obtained employment in a shipping house where a clerk had died recently, and I was in that about a year and a half, and saved some money. Then an irresistible longing came over me to go back to America, and I took passage on your ship, and here I am."

"Well," said Captain Owen, "I think you acted foolishly, but if your wife is all you say, I believe you'll find her still cherishing your memory."

Two days after that conversation Edwards was walking through the village toward his home. He had not made any inquiry about his wife, for his courage failed him when he had an opportunity. He was near the gate of his garden when he overtook a good old man whom he knew well. He put the question he had been afraid to ask.

"True to you!" said his friend, "why, Edwards, you should be ashamed to ask.

They entered the garden, and there on the path was a little toddler about two years old in which Edwards saw his wife's eyes and rich hazel hair, and he knew in an instant that it was the babe he had left two years before. He stooped and took the little one in his arms and kissed her. As he did so his elder daughter saw him from the window of the cottage and calling her mother to look too he was recognized. The dead had been restored to life, and the wife, who had thought herself a widow, was soon bounding down the garden path to be clasped in her husband's arms. With what delight the wife laid aside her widow's cap and the little family reunited sat hand in hand listening to the story of the wanderer it is needless to describe. To the Christian wife, however, the most delightful part of the narrative was the revelation that this was more than a restoration of her lost husband—it was a new union. The missionary doctor had not only been the means of saving her husband's life, but his teaching and prayers had been blessed to the salvation of his soul. It was with a joy most intense that the Godly woman rejoiced in the conviction that her husband could now unite with her in ascriptions of praise to Him who had given the hope of life everlasting.

THE BEDOUIN ARABS.

A COMMON scene in the deserts of Africa and Arabia is depicted in the accompanying illustration. The Bedouin Arabs are wanderers, and they roam through all the country stretching from the borders of Persia on the east to the western coast of Africa. They are supposed to be descendants of Ishmael, of whom the angel said (Genesis 16:12) "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him." The words apply to the Bedouin Arabs, for they have no national existence nor national history.

At the present crisis they have come into marked prominence on account of the attitude of Arabi toward the Sultan of Turkey. Should "a holy war" against Christians be proclaimed by Arabi there is a possibility of the Bedouins ranging themselves under his standard, in which case, they being accustomed to the climate and to the country, they might operate with some success against the British troops, and there would be a danger of Turkish troops also deserting to Arabi. In the event of their joining Arabi the result may be a rebellion of Arabia and Syria against the Sultan of Turkey (an event which Daniel's prophecies show to be near at hand—Dan. 8:9; 11:40).

In matters of religion the Bedouins are lax Mahommedans—that peculiar form of Islamism, which was originated in the latter end of the twelfth century by Abdel Wahab, who sought to extend its influence over them. This may be described as a Mahommedan puritanism, incorporated with a Bedouin government, in which the great chiefs stand forth as political and religious leaders.

"An Arab's property," says Burckhardt, "consists almost wholly in his horses and camels. The profits arising from his butter enable him to procure the necessary provisions of wheat and barley, and occasionally a new suit of clothes for his wife and daughters. No Arab family can exist without one camel at least; a man who has but ten is reckoned poor; thirty or forty place a man in easy circumstances; and he who possesses sixty is rich."

They are described by Burckhardt as "the most tolerant of Eastern nations;" yet it would be erroneous to suppose that an avowed Christian going among them would be well treated, without some powerful means of commanding their services. They class Christians with the foreign race of Turks, whom they despise most heartily. Both Christians and Turks are treated in a manner equally hostile, because their skins are fair, and their beards long, and because their customs are reckoned effeminate, and much less hardy than the tawny Bedouin.

In his tent, the Arab is most indolent and lazy; his only occupation is feeding the horse, or milking the camels in the evening, and he now and then goes to hunt with his hawk. A man, hired for the purpose, takes care of the herds and flocks, while the wife and daughters perform all the domestic business. They grind wheat in the hand mill, or pound it in the mortar; they prepare the breakfast and dinner; knead and bake the bread; make butter, fetch water, work at the loom, mend the tent-covering, and are indefatigable; while the husband or brother sits before the tent smoking his pipe, or is engaged in plundering some passing caravan.

WEE DAVIE.

Acquiescence.

WHEN the prayer was over, Jeanie, who had hardly spoken a word, said, without looking at the doctor, "O sir, God didna hear our prayer for my bairn!"

"Dinna speak that way, Jeanie, woman!" said her mother, softly, yet firmly.

"I canna help it, mither; I maun get oot my thochts that are burning at my heart. The minister maun forgie me," replied Jeanie.

"Surely, Mrs. Thorburn, said the minister; and it would be a great satisfaction to me were I able, from what God has taught me in His Word, and from my own experience of sorrow, to solve any difficulty, or help you to acquiesce in

A Bedouin Arab and his Family on a Journey.

God's dealings with you; not because you must, but because you ought to submit; and that again, not because God has power, and therefore does what He pleases, but because He is love, and therefore pleases always to do what is right."

"But, oh, He didna hear our prayer; that's my burthen! But we were maybe wrang in asking what was against His will."

"He did not answer you in the way, perhaps, in which you expected, Mrs. Thorburn; yet, depend upon it, every true prayer is verily heard and answered by Him. But He is too good, too wise, too loving, to give us always literally what we ask; if so, He would often be very cruel, and that He can never be! You would not give your child a serpent, if in his ignorance he asked one, mistaking it for a fish? nor would you give him a stone for bread?"

Jeanie was silent.

"When Nathan, the Lord's prophet, telt King David that his child must die," said the Elder, "yet nevertheless David even then, when it seemed almost rebellion, prayed to the Lord to spare his life, and I dinna doot that his Father in heaven was pleased wi' his freedom and faith. He could na but tak' kindly such confidence frae his distressed servant."

"And as regards your dear child, Mrs. Thorburn," continued the minister, touching her arm, and speaking with great earnestness, "I believe sorrow's crown of sorrow to a Christian parent, and the heaviest he or she can endure on earth, is that of seeing a child, dearer than their own life, living and dying in wickedness! What was David's sorrow for his dead babe, when compared with that wail of bitter agony for his wicked son, 'Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!' God has saved you from that agony. He has done so by taking your child to Himself. Your precious jewel is not lost, but is in God's treasury, where no thief can break through and steal: that is surely something."

"Something exclaimed the smith, 'it is surely, after all, everything. And yet—'"

"And yet," said Jeanie, as if interpreting the feeling of her husband, "wi' a these blessed thochts about our wee bairn, he's an awfu' blank! Ilka thing in the world seems different."

"I'm just thinking, Jeanie," said her mother, "that it's a comfort ye ever pat yer een on Davie; for there's puir Mrs. Blair (John Blair's blin' wife, ye ken) when she lost her callant, May was a year, she cam to me in an awfu' way about it, and said that what vexed her sae muckle was, that she never had seen his wee face, and could only touch and han'le him, and hear him greet, but never get a look o' him."

"Puir body," remarked Jeanie, "it was a sair misfortune for any mither that! Ilka ane has their ain burden to carry. But, minister, let me speir at you, sir: Will I never see my bairn again? and if I see him, will I no ken him?"

"You might as well ask me whether you could see and know your child if he had gone to a foreign country instead of to heaven," replied the minister. "Alas for Christian love, if we did not know our beloved friends in heaven. But such ignorance is not possible in that home of light and love."

"It wadna be rational to think so," remarked William. "And yet, minister," he continued, "excuse me for just saying, though I would rather listen than speak, that the knowledge of the lost, if such knowledge there can be, must be terrible!"

"I know not how that will be," replied the minister, "though I have my own views on it. Yet surely our ignorance of any person being lost would be dearly purchased by our ignorance of any person being saved?"

"I did not think of that," said the smith.

"But," continued Jeanie, with quiet earnestness, "will our bairn aye be a bairn, doctor? Oh, I hope so!"

"Dinna try, Jeanie dear," said David, "to be wise aboon what is written."

The minister smiled, and asked, "If your child had lived, think you, would you have rejoiced had he always continued to be a child and never grown or advanced? and are you a loss or a gain to your father and mother, because you have grown in mind and knowledge since you were an infant?"

"I never thoct o' that either," said Jeanie, thoughtfully.

"Be assured," continued the minister, "there will be no such imperfect and incomplete beings there as infants in intellect and in sense forever. All will be perfect and complete, according to the plan of God, who made us for fellowship with Himself and with all His blissful family. Your darling has gone to a noble school, and will be taught and trained there for immortality, by Him who was Himself a child, who spoke as a child, reasoned as a child, and as a child 'grew in wisdom and in stature'; and who also sympathized with a mother's love and a mother's sorrow.

"You too, parents, if you believe in Christ, and hold fast your confidence in Him, and become to Him as little children, will be made fit to enter the same society; and thus you and your boy, though never, perhaps, forgetting your old relationship on earth, will be fit companions for one another, forever and forever. Depend upon it, you will both know and love each other there better than you ever could possibly have done here!"

"My wee pet!" murmured Jeanie, as the tears began to flow from a softened, because happier, heart.

William hid his face in his hands. After a while, he broke silence and said, "These thoughts of heaven are new to me. But common sense tells me they maun be true. Heaven does not seem to me noo to be the same strange place it used to be."

"Lord, help our unbelief!" said Mr. Armstrong; "for the mair I think o' the things which I believe, the mair they seem to me owre gude news to be true!"

"The disciples, when they first saw Christ after His resurrection," said the minister, "did not believe from very joy."

"We thnk owre muckle o' our ain folk, doctor, and owre little o' Him," remarked the Elder. "But it's a comfort that He's kent and loved as He ought to be by them in heaven. I thank Him, alang wi' them that's awa', for all He is and gies to them noo in His presence."

"And for all He is and does and will ever be and do to every man who trusts Him," added Dr. McGavin; "our friends would be grieved if grief were possible to them now, did they think our memory of them made us forget Him, or that our love to them made us love Him less. Surely, if they know what we are doing, they would rejoice if they also knew that, along with themselves, we too rejoiced in their God and our God. What child in heaven but would be glad to know that its parents joined with it every day in offering up, through the same Spirit, the same prayer of 'Our Father!'"

"If wee Davie could preach to us, I daresay, sir, that might be his text," said the elder.

"Though dead, he yet speaketh," replied the minister.

The minister rose to depart. "By the by," he said, "let me repeat a verse or two to you, Thorburn, which I am sure you will like. They express the thoughts of a parent about his dead girl, which have already in part been poorly expressed by me when your wife asked me if she would know her boy:

"She is not dead—the child of our affection—
But gone unto that school
Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
And Christ Himself doth rule.

"Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when with raptures wild
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child;

"But a fair maiden, in her Father's Mansion
Clothed with celestial grace,
And beautiful with all the soul's expansion Shall we behold her face."

"Thank ye, sir, thank ye," said Thorburn; "and ye'll no be offended if I ax ye to gie me a grip o' yer han'." And the smith laid hold of the doctor's proffered hand, so small and white, with his own hand, so large and powerful. "God reward ye, sir, for we canna! Fareweel, sir! I'll expect ye the morn at two, if convenient," the smith whispered to the doctor as he opened the door to him.

"I'll be sure to come," he replied.

That evening, after Dr. McGavin's visit, there was a comfortable tea prepared by Jeanie for her friends, and the corporal was one of the party.

There is a merciful reaction to strong feeling. The highest waves, when they dash against the rock, flow furthest back, and scatter themselves in their rebound into sparkling foam and airy bubbles.

The corporal told some of his old stories of weariness and famine, of wounds and sufferings, of marches and retreats, of battles and victories, over the fields of Spain. Old Armstrong could match these only by Covenanter tales, of fights long ago, from "The Scots Worthies," but was astonished to find the corporal a staunch Episcopalian, who had no sympathy with "rebels." Yet so kind and courteous was the pensioner, that the elder confessed that he was "a real fine boddie, without a grain o' bigotry." Jeanie and her mother spoke of the farm, of the cows, and of old friends among the servants, with many bygone reminiscences. And thus the weight of their spirits was lightened, although ever and anon there came one little presence before them, causing a sinking of the heart!

No sooner had their friends left the house for the night than the smith did what he never did before. He opened the Bible, and said to Jeanie, "I will read a chapter aloud before we retire to rest." Jeanie clapped her husband fondly on the shoulder and in silence sat down beside him while he read again some of the same passages which they had already heard. Few houses had that night more quiet and peaceful sleepers than that home, under whose roof, beneath the shining stars of God, those parents and their child reposed.

The little black coffin was brought to the smith's the night before the funeral. When the house was quiet, Davie was laid in it gently by his father. Jeanie assumed the duty of arranging with care the white garments in which her boy was dressed, wrapping them round him, and adjusting the head as if to sleep in her own bosom. She brushed once more the golden ringlets, and put the little hands across the breast, and opened out the frills in the cap, and removed every particle of sawdust which soiled the shroud. When all was finished, though she seemed anxious to prolong the work, the lid was put on the coffin, yet so as to leave the face uncovered. Both were as silent as their child. But ere they retired to rest for the night, they instinctively went to take another look.

As they thus gazed in silence, side by side, the smith felt his hand gently seized by his wife. She played at first nervously with the fingers, until finding her own hand held by her husband, she looked into his face with an unutterable expression, and meeting his eyes so full of unobtrusive sorrow, leaned her head on his shoulder and said, "Willie, this is my last look o' him on this side o' the grave. But, Willie, dear, you and me maun see him again, and, mind ye, no to part; na, I canna thole that! We ken whaur he is, and we maun gang till him. Noo, promise me! vow alang wi' me here, as we love him and ane another, that we'll attend mair to what's gude than we ha'e dune, that—O Willie! forgie me, for it's no my part to speak, but I canna help it noo, and just, my bonnie man, just agree wi' me—that we'll gie our hearts forever to our ain Saviour, and the Saviour o' our wee Davie!"

These words, as she rested her throbbing head on her husband's shoulder, were uttered in low, broken accents, half-choked with an inward struggle, but without a tear. She was encouraged to say all this—for she had a timid awe of her husband—by the pressure ever and anon returned to her hand from his. The smith spoke not, but bent his head over his wife, who felt his tears falling on her neck, as he whispered, "Amen, Jeanie! so help me, God!"

A silence ensued, during which Jeanie got, as she said, "a gude greet," for the first time, which took the weight off her heart. She then quietly kissed her child and turned away. Thorburn took the hand of his boy and said, "Fareweel, my wee Davie, and when you and me meet again, we'll baith, I tak it, be a bit different frae what we are this nicht!" He then put the lid mechanically on the coffin, turned one or two of the screws, and sat down at the fireside to speak about the arrangements of the funeral.

After that, and for the first time in his life, William asked his wife to kneel down, and he would pray with her before they retired to rest. Poor fellow! he was sincere as ever man was, and never after till the day of his death did he omit this "exercise," which was once almost universal in every family in Scotland, whose "head" was a member of the church; and I have known it continued by the widow when the "head" was taken away by death.

But on this the first time when the smith tried to utter aloud the thoughts of his heart, he could only say, "Our Father—" There he stopped. Something seemed to seize him, and to repress his utterance. Had he only more fully known how much was in these words, he possibly might have gone on. As it was, the thoughts of the father on earth so mingled, he knew not how, with those of the Father in heaven, that he could not speak.

But he continued on his knees, and spoke there to God in his heart as he had never spoken before. Jeanie did the same. After a while they both rose, and Jeanie said, "Thank ye, Willie. It's a beautiful beginning, and it will, I'm sure, hae a braw ending." "It's cauld iron, Jeanie, woman," said the smith, "but it wull heat and come a' richt yet."

The day of the funeral was a day of beauty and sunshine. A few fellow-tradesmen and neighbors assembled in the house, dressed in their Sunday's best, though it was visible in the case of one or two, at least, that their best was the worse of the wear. The last of his possessions a Scotch workman will part with, even to keep his family in food, are his Sunday clothes; and the last duty he will fail to perform is that of following the body of a neighbor to the grave.

All those who attended the funeral, and about twenty assembled, were dressed with crape on their hats, and had weepers on their coats. The corporal wore, also, a war-medal on his. The smith, according to custom, sat near the door, and shook each man by the hand as he entered. Not a word, of course, was spoken.

When all who were expected had assembled, the minister, who occupied a chair near the table on which the Bible lay, opened the book, and after reading a portion of the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians, without any comment, he prayed with a fervor and suitableness which touched every heart.

The little coffin was then brought out. It was easily carried. The corporal was the first to step forward, and saluting the smith by putting his hand to his hat, soldier fashion, he begged to have the honor of assisting.

Slowly the small procession advanced toward the church-yard, about half a mile off; and angels beheld that wondrous sight, a child's funeral—wondrous as a symbol of sin, and of redemption, too. It at once speaks of the insignificance of a human being as a mere creature, and of his dignity as belonging to Christ Jesus.

As they reached the grave, the birds were singing, and building their nests in the budding trees. A flood of light steeped in glory a neighboring range of hills. Overhead, the sky had only one small, snow-white cloud reposing in peace on its azure blue.

When the sexton had finished the grave, and smoothed it down, William quietly seized the spade, and went over again the green turf carefully with gentle beats, removing with his hand the small stones and gravel which roughened its surface. Those who stood very near, had they narrowly watched him, which they had too much feeling to do, might have observed the smith give a peculiar, tender pressure and clap on the grave with his hand, as if on a child's breast, ere he returned the spade, and with a careless air said, "Here, John, thank ye; it's a' richt noo." Then lifting up his hat, and looking round, he added, "I'm obleeged to you, freens, for your trouble in coming."

And so they left "wee Davie," more precious and more enduring than the everlasting hills!

Several years after this, Dr. McGavin, when an old man, as he sat at his study fire, was conversing with a young clergyman who seemed to think that nothing could be accomplished of much value for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, unless by some great "effort," or "movement," or "large committee," which would carry everything before it. The doctor quietly remarked, "My young friend, when you have lived as long in the ministry as I have done, you will learn how true it is, that 'God fulfils Himself in many ways.' He is in the still, small voice, and that often when He is neither the earthquake nor in the hurricane. One of the most valuable elders I ever had—and whose admirable wife and daughters, and well-doing, prosperous sons, are still members of my church, and my much attached friends—told me on his dying bed, that, under God, he owed his chief good to the death of his first child, the circumstance which accidentally made me acquainted with him. On the last evening of his life, when enumerating the many things which had been blessed for his good, he said to me, "But, under God, it was my wee wifie that did it a'!"

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN.

S. Lesson for September 3, Mark 12: 22-44. Golden Texts, 1 John 4: 21; Deut. 6: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Commandment Little Understood—Love Includes Service—The Service of a Wife—No Reserves in Love—Offers of Half a Kingdom—How to Become all Love—A Love Perfect of its Kind—The Crucial Test of Love to God—The Critics Silenced—New Matter for Thought—The Test of Service—The Measure of Gifts.

IN that incident in our Lord's life which we are about to notice, there appears to be a discrepancy between the accounts of Matthew and Mark. The former seems to record the incident given in Luke as though it had occurred here; or could it be that two persons at this time, one "tempting him," the other "not far from the kingdom of God," asked Him the same question? The scribe, our subject, "having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that He had answered them well," asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength."

This is the first commandment: "Thou shalt love;" is this a hard saying? Yet how little we understand it. It is self-love, the human instinct of self-preservation, which drives the most of us to be Lord in the first instance. To escape that fearful unknown fate which God's Word calls "everlasting punishment," we turn to the Lord for safety. And even after we begin to know something about Him, O how our small legal, narrow hearts cling to the idea of service, and we fall into the place of servants, while we are called to that of sons.

What is the chief complaint we hear Christians make against themselves? "My service is so poor, I do so little for the Lord, and I do it so badly." How continually afflicted children of God say, "I want to be healed that I may serve God." Infinitely more blessed as this is than the meanness of a life lived for self, this is not rising to the great all of God, even in the Old Testament. He does not say, "Thou shalt serve," but "Thou shalt love."

LOVE INCLUDES SERVICE.

But service does not always include love. What service is there like that of a loving wife? What obedience equals that of a really loving child? The life divines and carries out the husband's wishes before they are expressed, and one expression of them gives the clue to a whole range of loving service which has never been required of her. The child feels in his very being the reflection of his father's character, and calls it out in involuntary unconscious service. And this is the meaning of "Thou shalt love." The question we so often hear, "Is there harm in this or that?" becomes impossible when love instead of service binds us to our God. Real love is always without limit, we may like a person in measure, but when we begin to love, it is as illimitable as eternal. Therefore the command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." The heart must all go out to Him, there can be no reserves for self, He has given His infinite heart of love to win it; let it go, and treat every thought of self as unfaithfulness to Him. This is the law of God, this is the privilege of man.

"With all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." Let there be but one key to lock or unlock all parts of thy being, God. In order to win thee, He has become even as thou, the Creator has been "made flesh, and dwelt among us;" in order to make thee pure, He has taken upon Him thine impurity; in order to heal thee, He has borne thy sicknesses; in order to give thee part in His own eternal life, He has gone through death. O God, when shall we understand Thy love! And what is there which such love does not deserve in return? Is it becoming that we should render to Him a part? Some few thoughts, some little service, some hours of our time? Is anything else reasonable than all our heart, and all our soul, and all our mind, and all our strength, i.e., our whole, our undivided being?

When the wicked Herod, probably under the influence of liquor, promised the voluptuous daughter of Herodias the half of his kingdom at her desire, and when the great Ahasuerus promised his Jewish queen Esther the same thing, thereby expressing the greatest and most magnificent of earthly generosity it was still but an offer of a divided kingdom. He who is the "King of kings and Lord of lords" offers us, not the half but the whole, Himself and all He has, Himself and all He is, that we should be one with Him as He is one with the Father (John 17: 21, 22), "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together" (Rom 8: 17).

O THE DISINTERESTEDNESS OF GOD!

What an appeal it makes to us to yield all we are and have to Him. He gives His fulness to win our emptiness, shall we withhold it? And His only claim is "Thou shalt love;" but there is implied in the terms of God, "Thou shalt do nothing but love;" to love demands heart and soul and mind and strength in their entirety.

How can we who are by nature all self, thus become all love? Only by giving up ourselves unreservedly as crucified with Christ, as being, willing, doing, desiring, nothing but God, that He may fully enter into and possess us; that He who is love may fill our whole being with Himself, with love.

How may I know whether I love God? is often asked. Let God answer, "This is the love of God, that we keep His commandments; and His commandments are not grievous." "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love Him, because He first loved us" (1 John 5: 3; 4: 18, 19). Now how are we with regard to God's commandments? Are they no longer grievous to us but the very joy of our hearts? Is His law put into our mind, and written on our hearts, so as to be a second nature, an impulse of the divine life within instead of a hard impossible bondage, the conditions of which we strive to fulfil and cannot? And is all fear of displeasing God gone? Are we living in the blessed consciousness that God has made and is making it His business to keep us in His ways, so that all fear and distrust of Him have vanished? Then, although our love may be most imperfect, we may praise God that it is there; yes more, that it is perfect of its kind.

And the second is like, namely, this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these." Let a man's whole being be filled to overflowing with the love of God, and it cannot but flow out toward man. And God has made it a crucial test of our love to Him, how we stand with respect to man. "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from Him, That he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 John 4: 20, 21). It is easy enough to love those who love us, but the privilege of those who are filled with God is to love those who do not love us, those who have injured us, even those who are our enemies. Love is always giving, and "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20: 35). Love never requires or exacts from another; He who is kind to the unthankful and the evil teaches us how to love.

The scribe who had been questioning Jesus had learned a great truth that to love God as God desires to be loved "is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices." He saw that if the heart is right, the mainspring of the whole machinery must be right, and all must work well together. "And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, He said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." But had he entered into it? We are not told. What was there in Christ's answer which silenced His opposers? Was it that all their guile provoked no tone of opposition in Him and that they felt they were fairly beaten? "No man after that durst ask Him any question."

He gave them, however,

MATTER FOR THOUGHT.

saying, "while He taught in the temple, How say the scribes that Christ is the son of David? For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, The Lord said to my Lord, Sit Thou on my right hand, till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. David therefore himself calleth Him Lord; and whence is He then his son?" O how He longed to lead them away from their carnal idea of a political Messiah, such as will be the latter day Antichrist, to God's own thoughts and words about the Messiah; from the human to the divine. But this was out of their depth, they could not understand it. No man accepted the challenge or attempted to answer.

They stood on false ground, on their hereditary superiority to the Gentiles, their head knowledge of the law of God, their drawing near Him with their mouths, and honoring Him with their lips, while the hearts which he sought for were far from Him, and their fear toward Him was taught by the precept of men (Isa. 29: 13). He knew His Father's heart was in His counsels, and He spoke as to stones. O how often have teachers of the Gospel felt the same; the breath of the Holy Ghost was wanting. Were His words then in vain? Never. They are treasured up for us; the fragments are gathered that nothing be lost.

Jesus went on to warn the people of the scribes: "Beware of the scribes, which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the market places, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts; which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive greater damnation." External religion which covers oppression and self-seeking, is abominable in the eyes of God and secures "greater damnation" than irreligion; the fate of Judas must be more terrible than that of one who had never known the Lord. God loves reality, and most surely "Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (1 Cor. 3: 13). God has made deeds not words the test of a man's state before Him. "By their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 7: 20, 21).

The eye of the Lord Jesus turned from the scribes to something which gave joy to His burdened heart. "Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury; and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. And He called unto Him His disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury." What is this? a farthing more than much money! Yes, far more. A man who has ten thousand dollars and gives one gives but the ten thousandth part of his possessions; a little child who has but one cent and gives that gives ten thousand times more. To God it is little matter of what our all consists, provided that that all is yielded unto Him. It may be that the Word of God, the "first great commandment" repeated by Jesus in the power of the Spirit of God, had called forth this full response from the poor widow, and we are sure that He accepted both her gift and herself to be His possession and His charge.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

General Sir Garnet Wolseley Arrived at Alexandria on August 15th, and assumed command of the British forces. He immediately issued a proclamation, with the authority of the Khédive, to the people of Egypt, representing the sole object of the British to be to restore the authority of the Khédive. It says all peaceful inhabitants will be kindly treated, the mosques will be respected and all supplies paid for. General Wolseley adds that he will be glad to receive all chiefs who are disposed to assist in repressing the rebellion. The queen has lent the expedition one of her sons, the Duke of Connaught, who calls on the Khédive every day, and is supposed to be commanding the Guards. On Saturday, August 19th, the whole of the British fleet except two vessels sailed from Alexandria with sealed orders. A large force was on board and it was generally believed that Sir Garnet Wolseley was about to attack Arabi in the rear in the hope of driving him from his entrenched position.

An Assault was Perpetrated on the United States Consul in Alexandria, Colonel Charles C. Long, on August 18th. He was surrounded by about forty natives, who stopped him as he was driving through the Gabarri Gate of the city, and would have seriously maltreated him, even if his life had been saved, but a number of British soldiers saw the attack and rescued the consul. Colonel Long is thoroughly acquainted with the country, having served under Major Gordon in his famous expedition to Central Africa, the object of which was to complete the work left unfinished by Sir Samuel Baker—that is, the extermination of the slave trade, the annexation of the Central African region to the flag of the Khédive, and the establishment of trading posts on the plateaux of Central Africa.

A Startling Rumor in Circulation in European capitals last week was to the effect that Russia was preparing to seize Asia Minor. No official confirmation was given to the report, which is probably premature. It originated in a despatch to the London Times, which stated that it was believed at Erzeroum, Armenia, that Russia is about to occupy the whole of Asia Minor to the Bosphorus. Owing to the undefended state of that part of Turkey the Russians could easily do this without much bloodshed. A despatch to the London Telegraph from Paris says it is no secret that Russia is concentrating a formidable army in the Caucasus. The army, it is estimated, will number 78,000 men.

A New Difficulty in the way of the Anglo-Turkish alliance against Arabi has arisen. A cable message says: "The Mussulman jurists, whom the Sultan frequently consults, explain that Arabi Pacha, in so far as he disobeyed the Caliph, is a rebel and may be unceremoniously treated as such; but in so far as he has been a defender of a Mohammedan country against the aggressive designs of Christians he has merely fulfilled the duties of a good Mussulman, and, consequently, the Caliph cannot make common cause with England. The Sultan may punish Arabi Pacha if some act of rebellion is proved against him, but he must not associate himself with those who wish to crush Arabi Pacha as the defender of Islam."

The Arrest of Mr. E. Dwyer Gray, who is a member of Parliament and a high sheriff, took place in Ireland on August 16th. Mr. Gray is one of the proprietors of the Dublin Freeman's Journal, and the offence with which he was charged was committed in the columns of that journal. Technically the charge was one of contempt of court, by publishing an article accusing crown officials of jury-packing in several recent moonlight trials and a letter of William O'Brien accusing the jury in a murder case in which the prisoner was convicted, of gross misconduct and drunkenness. Justice Lawson sentenced Mr. Gray to three months' imprisonment in Richmond Jail and a fine of $2500, and on his release to find heavy bail for future good behavior. Mr. Gray was astonished at the sentence, and asked time to arrange his private affairs. The judge said, "You will have plenty of time in prison." The warrant of commitment being usually made out to the high sheriff some difficulty was experienced in selecting a suitable officer to act as a deputy in incarcerating the high sheriff himself. Ultimately it was decided to address it to the coroner, who then took his superior officer to his cell.

The Presentation of the Honorary Freedom of the City of Dublin to Messrs. Parnell and Dillon took place on August 16th, a few hours after the arrest of Mr. Gray. The intelligence of the severe sentence passed upon that gentleman cast a gloom over the meeting, and Mr. Parnell having signed the roll of freemen said he should "return thanks in few words, as freedom of speech in Ireland had practically ceased to exist." Mr. Parnell expressed his conviction that measures of large reform might be expected for the masses of the people of Ireland. He had never believed in the possibility of maintaining an independent Irish party in the House of Commons for any length of time, but he thought it possible to increase its numbers and maintain it for such time as would enable them to gain the great object which always possessed the hearts of the Irish people at home and abroad—the restoration of the legislative independence of Ireland. The advance of popular reform could not be stopped for long even in Ireland. "It would be far better for the governing classes and those in the higher ranks of society to trust the people, and even at the eleventh hour join hands with them for the sake of their common country. If they could not do so the movement would go on without them, brushing them aside."

The Partial Restoration of Cetewayo the King of the Zulus, to his throne has been decided upon by the British Government. A Government official stated in the House of Commons on August 15th that the Government had determined to consider the possibility of Cetewayo's partial restoration, with proper safeguards. He said that no portion of Zululand would be annexed to Great Britain. The part of Zululand to be reserved for the chiefs and people who object to return under Cetewayo's rule will be guarded by safeguards similar to those imposed upon the thirteen present chiefs. A British resident will reside in the country, who will see that the restoration of the former military system is not revived.

The Bonapartist Fete Day was Celebrated with unexpected enthusiasm in Paris on August 15th. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald cables that a meeting of Bonapartists was called at a building near the Arc de Triomphe at which, although admission was only to be had by special invitation, fully five thousand persons were present. The proceedings throughout were orderly, though more than one fiery appeal was made to the meeting by orators. MM. Paul de Cassagnac and Jules Amigues addressed it. M. Amigues confined his remarks to a comparison of the Republic and the Empire, highly flattering to the latter. M. de Cassagnac's speech was a plea for the candidature of Prince Victor. The hall was unadorned save by a bust of the late Prince Imperial. The meeting broke up and dispersed without confusion, crying "Vive l'Empereur!" It would appear from this report that Imperialism is not so completely extinct as recent cablegrams have indicated.

Mr. Moody is Invited to Asia Minor by Missionaries, who believe that he might do good work there with the aid of an interpreter. It is not, however, likely that Mr. Moody will accept the invitation. He brought his labors in Aberdeen to a close on July 29th. He purposes spending some time in going through Scotland, after which he will rest a week or two prior to commencing work in Wales and various parts of England, finally settling for a long spell of work in London.

The Stolen Corpse of the British Nobleman, Earl Crawford, which was taken from the family vault at Dun Echt, Scotland, in May, 1881, with the object of obtaining a ransom, has been discovered in a wood about half a mile from the mansion. The discovery is due to a statement made by a professional poacher named Soutar, and conveyed by another person to the police. Soutar said he was poaching about midnight in the plantation in May, 1881, when he found to his horror a dead body lying on the ground, and simultaneously saw two men crawling near him. Frightened, started to run, but his progress was arrested by a heap of earth, over which he fell. Before he could recover himself the two men were upon him. He could see that their faces were blackened, and noticed that they spoke with an Aberdeenshire accent. They were immediately joined by two other men, who wore masks and spoke with English accent. One of the first two said that he ever breathed a word of what he had seen that night he would be "hunted to death," and the other unless he at once took an oath to keep their secret he would then and there meet his death. The speaker at the same time presented a pistol at his head, and swore him to secrecy.

A Roman Catholic Directory Recently Issued by the authority of the Pope furnishes evidence of the growing power and wealth of the Roman Church. The directory describes Leo XIII. as the 263d successor of St. Peter. The College of Cardinals, the full complement of which is 70, has only 65 members, six of whom belong to the order of bishops, 46 to the order of priests, and 13 to the order of deacons. Cardinal Schwarzenberg is the only one of these cardinals created by Gregory XV. 46 were created by Pius IX., and 21 by the present Pope. Four of the cardinals are over 80 years of age, 29 over 70, 15 over 60, and 13 over 50, while only two are under fifty. The Romish hierarchy consists of 1289 titles, including 65 cardinals. Since Leo XIII. came to the Holy See three archiepiscopal sees have been created and two episcopal dioceses have been raised into archiepiscopal sees while fifteen fresh bishoprics have been formed.

Liquor Sellers in Great Britain are becoming alarmed by the progress made by societies propagating the doctrines of prohibition. At a recent meeting of a liquor sellers' association one of the speakers lamented that there were associations which were strong, rich and powerful, which did not hesitate to use every means in their power to ruin their trade altogether. Another speaker said their body had been beset on all sides in every way. They were being "badly pressed now with the Sunday closing and the Local Option measure, and unless they could make a stand in some way or the other, and put their shoulders to the wheel they would simply go to the wall." If by "the wall" the liquor sellers mean an insurmountable obstacle to their trade of making drunkards, may be hoped they will soon arrive at the wall.

Land Grants to the Jews Driven out of Russia have been decided on by the Turkish Government. Free grants are to be made of vast tracts of land for Jewish refugees and other immigrants, situated in fertile districts in the provinces of Adana, Nicosia, Syria, and Mesopotamia (which three provinces are as large as France), specially adapted for agricultural purposes, and if facilities are afforded for opening up communications, the country will greatly benefited and the revenue improved by the addition to the present scanty population of the region. The only restrictions put upon intending colonists are that they shall be subject to the existing laws affecting land tenure, as well as future taxation and police, and that no village shall contain more than two hundred families. Liberal facilities are to be given for the first few years in the form of exemption from taxation and conscription.

GENERAL SIR GARNET WOLSELEY, who has been appointed commander of the British troops in Egypt is an Irishman by birth. He is the eldest son of the late Major G. J. Wolseley of the 25th Regiment. The family is one of the most ancient in the county of Staffordshire, the manor of Wolseley having been in their possession before the Norman Conquest. Some of Sir Garnet's ancestors were distinguished officers, and others were clergymen; his grandfather was rector of Tullycorbet. Sir Garnet is forty-nine years old, having been born on June 4th 1833, in County Dublin, Ireland. Educated at a day school near Dublin, and subsequently by private tutors, he was from childhood destined for the army, and was instructed in military science, surveying, and fortification. Toward the close of his nineteenth year, in 1852, he obtained an ensign's commission in the 80th Regiment, then engaged in the second Burmese war. He had scarcely joined the depot when he was sent out to Burmah with a draft of recruits, and in November he reached Rangoon. At the beginning of March, 1853, he arrived at Donabaw by sea, and on the 7th of the month went under fire in the operations against Myat-toon, a noted Burmese leader.

HIS FIRST BATTLE-FIELD.

On March 19th Myat-toon's stronghold was successfully stormed. The first attack was repulsed with some loss. Ensign Wolseley was well in front of his men, and had reached within twenty yards of the hostile works, when suddenly the earth gave way beneath his feet, and he found himself at the bottom of a concealed pit with a stake in it. When his men were beaten back he was in great danger, but he managed to escape without even a wound, though much shaken by the fall.

A second attack being decided on, the commanding officer of the 80th called for an officer to lead a storming party from that regiment. Ensign Wolseley at once stepped to the front, and hastily collecting such of his own men as were at hand, made a rush up the narrow path by which only the enemy's works could be reached. Another detachment had been sent on the same dangerous business from the 51st Regiment. It was led by Lieutenant Taylor, who raced with Ensign Wolseley for the honor of being the first man in. Only two could move abreast, and the gallant young officers evidently rushed on their destruction. Both were shot in the thigh.

Taylor bled to death in a few minutes, but Wolseley, pressing his fingers on the arteries of his thigh, checked the flow of blood. Grievously wounded and lying helpless on the ground (as shown on our frontispiece), Wolseley waved his sword and cheered his men on to the assault, which this time was successful. When he first fell, some of his men offered to carry him to the rear, but he refused all assistance till the position had been taken. After several months of suffering and danger he was sent home on sick leave, and was only convalescent just before the arrival of the ship in England. As a reward for his gallantry he was promoted to a lieutenantcy in the 90th Light Infantry.

ATTEMPT TO SAVE A COMRADE'S LIFE.

When Wolseley accompanied his regiment from Rangoon to take part in the hazardous operations against Myat-toon, a soldier who was bathing with some comrades in the river Irrawaddy, was carried away by the current. Seeing the man in imminent danger of drowning, young Wolseley plunged into the stream, which ran with great velocity, but notwithstanding all his exertions, the unfortunate soldier perished. (The panel in the left-hand corner of the upper portion of our frontispiece represents this episode.)

The winter of 1853 was a momentous period. Already were audible the distant mutterings of the tempest gathering on the Turkish frontier, which was destined soon to break over Europe, and deluge a remote corner of the continent with the blood of the bravest soldiers of three great Powers. It was the eve of a memorable contest in which was broken the spell of a forty years' peace, and which introduced an era of conflict and diplomatic unrest which in all probability will not close until the age itself has passed away, and the anticipated epoch of Millennial peace has been inaugurated.

Within the eight-and-twenty years which have since elapsed, how many and vast have been the changes which have occurred, and how stupendous the conflicts that have taken place in Europe. Prussia, a petty kingdom, has risen to the rank of a great Empire since 1870; France has been humbled to the dust by her ancient foe; but has now risen, phoenix-like, from her ashes under Republican government.

Wolseley's regiment sailed from Dublin, on November 19th, 1854, and landed at Balaklava on December 4th of that year. Three weeks later he was appointed acting engineer, and during eight months he served uninterruptedly with the Engineers, with the exception of a week spent at Balaklava on sick leave. He obtained his captaincy also at this period. On April 10th, 1855, he was slightly wounded though he remained at his post. Five days later he was giving orders to two sappers standing in front of him, when suddenly a round shot took one man's head off, and drove his jaw-bone into the other man's face, to which it adhered, bespattering the party with blood.

On June 7th he received a second wound in the thigh, after having been at his post for twenty-four hours, and was found by an officer of his regiment, lying on a heap of slain, covered with blood. So concluded what Wolseley himself emphatically declared was "the hardest day's work I ever did in my life."

On August 30th, he was assisting some sappers to fill with stones some gabions which the Russians had upset just before a sortie, when a round shot dashed into the middle of the group. He had just time to cry "Look out!" when the whole party lay prostrate on the ground. The round shot had struck a gabion, scattering the stones with resistless force. One of the sappers had his head taken off, and his companion was disembowelled. Both were killed instantaneously, and Wolseley himself, lying by their side senseless and covered with blood, seemed also a corpse.

GIVEN UP FOR DEAD.

A sergeant of sappers, finding that he still breathed, picked him up, and after a time he recovered sufficiently to be able, with the help of the sergeant and Prince Victor of Hohenlohe, to stagger as far as the doctor's hut. He then sank exhausted and half unconscious. Prince Victor asked the doctor to look at him. He did so, and curtly saying, "He's a dead 'un," was about to attend to other patients. Wolseley roused, and irritated by this cool way of dismissing him to the other world, turned round and said, "I'm worth a good many dead men yet," an opinion which was confirmed when he received the doctor's attention.

A detailed examination showed that if not dead he was very severely wounded. The doctor's report stated that "his features were not distinguishable as those of a human being, while blood flowed from innumerable wounds caused by the stones with which he had been struck. Sharp fragments were embedded all over his face, and his left cheek had been almost cut away. . . . Both his eyes were completely closed, and the injury to one of them was so serious that the sight has been permanently lost. Not a square inch of his face but what was battered and cut about while his body was wounded all over, just as if he had been peppered with small shot. He had received also a severe wound on his right leg, so that both limbs had now been injured, the wound in the left thigh, received in Burmah, rendering him slightly lame. For many years afterward the wound on the shin, received on this 30th of August, caused him much suffering, and when on duty in Canada, nearly ten years after the event, he was under the necessity of returning to England for medical advice regarding the bone, which was exfoliating."

SPENDS SEVERAL WEEKS IN A CAVE.

After the surgeon had dressed his wounds, Captain Wolseley was placed on a stretcher and carried by four soldiers to St. George's Monastery situated on the sea-coast, not far from Balaklava, and there he passed some weeks in a cave, as the sight of both eyes was too much injured to subject them to the light. While he was pent up in the gloomy cavern, meditating on the sad prospect of being totally blind for the remainder of his days, news arrived of the fall of Sebastopol. The great Russian stronghold which had, for so many months, defied the efforts of England, France, Turkey and Sardinia, was at length taken on September 8th, and Captain Wolseley had the additional mortification of feeling that all his devotion and suffering had not received the soldier's reward he most coveted—that of participating in the storming of the Russian stronghold.

VOYAGE TO CHINA, AND SHIPWRECK.

In November, 1855, Captain Wolseley was appointed Deputy-Assistant-Quartermaster-General, and during the following six months was employed in surveying the Crimea. On the evacuation, 1856, Captain Wolseley was one of the last men to embark for England. In the spring of 1857 the 90th Regiment embarked for China. Three companies, one of which was Captain Wolseley's, were conveyed in the Transit, which, after many mishaps, terminated her career by crashing on a coral reef off the island of Sumatra. Then was seen what discipline could effect among men whose lives were not passed, like sailors, amid the perils incident to a nautical profession, but who suddenly found themselves confronting a novel danger.

"The majority of the troops," says one of the officers, "were on the main-deck at the mess tables. On feeling the first shock they naturally rose en masse, and were about to rush on deck when Major Barnston, who was quietly writing in his cabin, appeared before them, and lifting his hand, said in his usual undisturbed voice, 'It all right, men; stay where you are!' These few words, coming from an officer who inspired confidence and was generally beloved, acted like a spell. The men, like so many children, obeyed and sat down." Happily all on board safely reached in boats the little island of Banca, about two miles distant, but with the loss of all the kit.

PERILS IN THE INDIAN MUTINY.

A few days later startling news arrived from Singapore, which altered the destination of the 90th Regiment, and opened a new chapter in the adventurous career of Captain Wolseley. This was the announcement that the Bengal Native Army was in full mutiny, and had inaugurated its movement by the destruction of Meerut and the seizure of Delhi, while atrocious massacres were perpetrated throughout the land. The troop destined, therefore, for the China expedition was urgently required at Calcutta, to which place they at once proceeded, and from thence to Cawnpore where they arrived at the end of September, 1857.

On the 27th of that month, Captain Wolseley arrived at Cawnpore, a city whose very name arouses thrilling reminiscences. Formerly one of the largest and finest military stations in India, it now presented a desolate appearance. On every side were burned cantonments and bungalows, and the company passed the entrenchment defended with so much pertinacity by Sir Hugh Wheeler and his handful of British troops, and the small the measure of the duration of certain momentous episodes in the history of the Israel of God, both natural and spiritual. It is prophetically announced as the chronological duration of the great Western Apostasy, the Papacy, and it is also given as the measure of the last stage of the long depression and affliction of the Jewish people—that during which Jerusalem is under the Mahommedan Antichristian power. The long oppression of the Jews has lasted in its widest measure nearly double that time, i.e., nearly 2520 years from the days of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Jerusalem—the commencement of

THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES.

Since then the Jews have never enjoyed an independent nationality. This prophetic period of 1260 years is the second half of the great "week" or "seven times" (Daniel 4 : 16), or 2520 years of the Gentile dispensation, which synchronizes with the depression of the Jews. It commenced with Nebuchadnezzar—the "head of gold" of the great image—and is to terminate with the Second Advent of Christ, to establish the kingdom of God on earth.

Already the history of the Western Antichrist, or Papacy, has fulfilled in a marvellous manner the chronological prophecies connected with this period of 1260 years, and now the history of the Eastern Antichrist, or Mahommedan power, is fulfilling them in a way no less remarkable.

We must premise that there are in nature years of three different lengths; years measured by the moon, years measured by conjoint movements of sun and moon, and years measured by the sun alone; i.e., there are—

1. Lunar years, of 354 days.
2. Calendar years, of 360 days.
3. Solar years, of 365½ days.

Hence 1260 lunar years equal only 1222½ of our ordinary (solar) years, and 1260 calendar years equal only 1242 (solar) years, and, therefore, lack 18 years of 1260 solar years, while they are about 20 years in excess of 1260 lunar years.

Had the events predicted to mark the close of the great cyclical and prophetic period of 1260 years, occurred at the close of any one of its three fulfilments, as lunar, calendar or solar years, we should have been entitled to point out the fact as a fulfilment of chronologic prophecy. But if these events occur in three stages and at the close of each of its three fulfilments, how much more confidently may we point to the fact as a triumphant demonstration of the inspiration of Scripture, and as an awe inspiring witness to the foreknowledge of God, and to His control of the events of history.

This is the way in which they have occurred, and are occurring. Such events must needs occur in stages, seeing systems and nations neither rise nor fall in a year, but generally in a series of years, of which some are marked years of crisis. And we must remember that there is no natural reason why these years of crisis should coincide with the close of 1260 years on the lunar, calendar and solar scales.

This 1260 years is linked in various forms with the rise and fall of the two peculiarly blasphemous and persecuting Powers, which are predicted as the final forms of Gentile rule in the prophetic earth (or sphere of the four great empires). These two Powers (symbolized by the two little horns of Dan. 7 and 8) are, as is well known, the Papacy in the West, and Mahommedanism in the East. Both these Powers have run peculiarly evil careers; both claimed authority on the ground of religion; both have blasphemed God, and both have persecuted His people. Both are destined to exist as false religions up to the Second Advent, and to be destroyed as such only by it; but both are to cease and fall as temporal, secular Powers, at the close of 1260 years from the era of their rise.

THE CRITICAL YEARS

in the rise of the Mahommedan Power were especially two, that of the Hegira, A.D. 622, the terminus a quo of the Mahommedan calendar, and that of the capture of Jerusalem by Omar, A.D. 637.

From the first of these, A.D. 622, 1260 lunar years (and the Mahommedan calendar employs only such) extend to A.D. 1844-5, the date of the issue by the Ottoman Porte of the Hattihamayoun, or edict of toleration, the first patent proof that its independence and its power were gone. This edict, extorted under threat of European interference, abolished executions for conversion to Christianity, and insured religious toleration. This compulsory sheathing of the sword of Islam was a marked epoch in its loss of independence, of a confession of its helplessness against the Christian nations of Europe.

It is from this same Hegira date, the 16th of July, A.D. 622, the starting-point of the Mahommedan calendar, and the notable era of the rise of Mahommedanism, that 1260 solar years lead down to the terrible and tragic scenes just enacted in Egypt in July, 1882.

The flight from Egypt of 78,000 European Christians from fear of Moslem massacres in July, 1882; the bombardment and destruction of all the forts of Alexandria by a British fleet, acting independently of Turkey and against her wishes; and the Conference now sitting, without his permission and against his will, in the city of the Sultan—in a word, the present crisis in the East, unexpected and almost sudden as its occurrence has been, comes thus in a remarkable terminal year, one which prophetic students had long anticipated as a year of crisis in the Mahommedan world. Surely this coincidence of actual facts with Scripture chronology ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed.

Measured from the second critical date in its era of rise, the capture of Jerusalem by Omar, and the erection of his mosque on the Temple site, A.D. 637, 1260 years run out on the three scales, as below:

	{ 1260 calendar.....	1878-9.
	{ 1260 solar.....	1897.

Now the year 1860 was, as we all know, the time of

of Christians at Damascus and on the Lebanon, at the instigation and with the assistance of the Turkish Government. This massacre led to the French occupation of Beyrout, and to the appointment of British and French commissioners to see to the government of Northern Syria, i.e., to the virtual cessation of independent Mahommedan rule in that province, 1260 lunar years after the capture of Jerusalem.

When, eighteen years later, the prophetic 1260 years ran out on the scale of calendar years, there came another marked crisis, in the fall of the Ottoman Empire. Turkish atrocities and massacres at Batak and sixty-five other towns and villages in Bulgaria and in the region of Philippopolis—massacres in which 15,000 Christians perished—roused Europe to remonstrances which were, as usual, vain and useless. The ambassadors were recalled from Constantinople, Russia declared war against Turkey in April, 1877, and waged it so successfully that in March, 1878, the Porte was forced to accept a humiliating peace, and, but for English and French interference, would have been virtually overthrown. By the treaties of San Stefano and Berlin, a large portion of Armenia (Turkey in Asia) was ceded to Russia, the Dobrudja was lost to Turkey, the complete independence of Roumania was recognized, the limits of Servia and Montenegro were extended, and Bulgaria became an autonomous Christian Principality. By a special convention Cyprus was ceded to England, which undertook, in return, to protect the helpless and ruined empire from further Russian aggression in Asia. This year 1878, would have completed the destruction of the Porte, but for Lord Beaconsfield's interference, which secured it a brief extension of existence.

The 1260 years will not run out on the third or full solar scale till A.D. 1897. We shall then, in all probability, if not before, witness the final downfall of Turkish rule in Syria, and the deliverance of Jerusalem from Turkish domination, the Jews having been previously restored to Palestine.

THE PAPAL ANTICHRIST.

From Justinian's decree, A.D. 533, 1260 years lead down to the French Revolution, that great upheaval of the waters in which the Papacy for a time perished, and Rome became the second city of Napoleon's Empire.

From the more important decree of Phocas, A.D. 607, 1260 years terminate thus:

A.D. 607	{ 1260 lunar.....	1830.
	{ 1260 calendar.....	1848.
	{ 1260 solar.....	1866-70.

Now each of these years were unmistakably years of crisis in the downfall of the Papal power, years of revolution and of anti-Papal movements on a great scale.

In 1830 occurred the revolution which led to the abdication of Charles X., and in 1848 there were revolutions in almost every country in Europe. Louis Philippe abdicated, a Republic was proclaimed in Paris, 16,000 persons perished in the conflict with the Red Republicans, and 8000 prisoners were taken. This revolution broke out in Paris on the 23d of February, and "before the 5th of March every country lying between the Atlantic and the Vistula had, in a greater or less degree, been revolutionized." On March 15th a Constitution was proclaimed at Rome itself, and the Pope fled to Gaeta before the close of the year. He was formally deposed from his temporal authority and a Republic proclaimed February 8th, 1849—1260 years from the decree of Phocas.

THE 1260 YEARS MEASURED BACKWARD.

We may measure from these central dates, backward into the hoary past, as well as forward into the actual present, with our triple standard of 1260 years, and when we do so we find ourselves landed in the midst of a series of events closely related to, though contrasted with, the present series—the events connected with the fall of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah and the rise of the kingdom of Babylon, to the commencement of the great week of 2520 years called "the times of the Gentiles," of which the 1260 years of which we have been speaking form the second half.

Measured back, for instance, from the Hegira date, A.D. 622, 1260 lunar years bring us to the original overthrow of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and measuring backward from the erection of the mosque of Omar, A.D. 637, the same period leads up to the burning of the Jewish temple by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 587—and so on.

Let us worship and adore, as we note the hand of God in history, and observe how its operations fulfil the intimations of the mind of God, given in prophecies, most of which are now twenty-five centuries old, and yet are fulfilling under our eyes.

Who but an omniscient and Almighty Being could thus foretell the end from the beginning, and thus foresee the course of action which should be adopted by agents—absolutely free to choose their own course—and acting without the remotest reference either to His will or purpose? "Oh! the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out."

And let us more joyfully than ever lift up our heads! Our redemption draweth nigh! Date after date turns out true, proofs accumulate with passing years; it is now a demonstrated fact that the historic system and the year-day chronology give the true interpretation of the prophecies of Scripture; and, if so, the vague uncertainty of early ages for us (the latest generations of the Church), is replaced by a joyous and divinely-given certainty. Chronologic prophecy, so long mysterious and incomprehensible, becomes, as it was intended to do, lucid and simple, in the light of its own fulfilment.

We are living in the closing years of the Christian age. Dated from Nebuchadnezzar, the "seven times" of the Gentiles, or 2520 years, have already run out in lunar years. It only remains for them to do so in full solar years in 1897, and then Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down of the Gentiles, for the times of the Gentile shall have been fulfilled! We know what follows! Luke 21 clearly reveals it, and if ever there was a generation that needed to ponder the parable of the fig-tree it is ours! Heaven and earth shall pass away, but Christ's words shall not pass away! "He is near, even at the doors" (Matt. 24 : 33). Let us watch. We know not the hour when our Lord doth come. And meanwhile, let us work as those who await His immediate Advent, and who covet their Lord's "Well done!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Offers for the new Three per cent Bonds received up to August 1st amount to about $200,000,000. The principal offers have come from national banks, and nearly all the national banks in the country have signified an intention of exchanging the 3½ per cent bonds for the new 3 per cents. The largest single application so far received is from a Philadelphia national bank. It is for about $2,000,000 of the new bonds. It has been decided to award the priority in numbers to the applicants whose offers arrived before noon on August 1st, before taking up the cases of packages forwarded since that time. It will take a week to perform this duty, and no more drawings for allotment will be made until this is done.

Secretary Teller has Given Expression to an important opinion on the vexed question of Indian civilization, in a communication to the National Educational Assembly in session at Ocean Grove. Mr. Teller said: I believe, with the changed condition of the Indians, that is by placing them on reservations, that they can now be made useful citizens if the government will make ample provision for putting the children in properly conducted schools—schools not simply teaching book knowledge, but educating them in the ways of civilized life. With additional labor-schools established within easy communication with the tribe, yet not near enough to allow the influences of savage life to counteract and undo the work of the school, we may hope to repeat on a large scale what Captain Pratt and Mr. Armstrong have so successfully done at Carlisle and Hampton. Heretofore we have confined our efforts to the education of a few, hoping to make such persons teachers and exemplars to their savage brethren; but experience has demonstrated that a few well-educated youths could not withstand the baleful influences of savage life, with which they were at once surrounded on their return to their tribe. We cannot hope for the speedy civilization of the Indian unless we can extend our educational efforts so as to include the great mass of Indian children. To do this now, as the Indians may be located on reservations easy of access, is only a question of "appropriation" and the cordial support of the administrative authorities.

A Second Application from Mr. Jay Hubbell for the voluntary contribution of office holders has been issued. In it Mr. Hubbell calls the attention of the recipient to the fact that he has failed to respond to the first application and hopes that the neglect arose from the pressure of other cares. He expresses the hope that two per cent of the employee's salary will be remitted by return mail. The receipt of the circulars has caused considerable distress, especially in New York, where the cost of living is very high and the salaries are not proportionate. Mr. Hubbell is quite right about the pressure of other cares, but it seems heartless to press for a contribution in some cases where it will be paid to avoid a worse evil. One feature of the circular is especially obnoxious; it is that the name of the notorious Mr. Robeson appears among the names of those for whom Mr. Hubbell speaks. It is felt to be an outrage for men receiving small salaries to be called upon to deny themselves in order that they may make contributions in the expenditure of which such a man will have a voice.

The National Prohibition Convention Assembled in Chicago last week. Several exciting discussions occurred, especially on the question of including in the platform the plank of female suffrage. There were 341 delegates present, including the delegation from Iowa, which was instructed to abstain from indorsing the organization of a third party. Mr. T. D. Knaus, of Wisconsin, was elected president, and numerous vice-presidents were elected. It was decided to adopt the name of the "Prohibition Home Protection Party." The convention finally adopted a platform of ten resolutions the most important of which are the following: I. The prohibition, as public crimes, of the importation, exportation, manufacture, sale, and supply and taxation of all alcoholic beverages. II. The prohibition of tax, license, regulation, or legal sanction in any form of them, or any other public crimes. III. Civil and political equality and enfranchisement of women. This, so far as it concerns the States severally, is remitted to the party in those States.

The Outbreak of Yellow Fever at Brownsville, Texas, still gives cause for alarm. The new cases average about sixty every day, and the type of the disease is growing more malignant. The local authorities and customs officials are laboring zealously and effectively to prevent the spread of the epidemic to adjacent towns, and are using every means known to science for the eradication of it.

A Scene at Dr. Cullis's Camp Meeting at Old Orchard Beach is thus described by an eyewitness: "Yesterday was 'all healing day,' and all who desired to be healed and had faith were invited into the tabernacle at 2.30 P.M. No others were admitted. More than 600 persons presented themselves at the appointed hour. They were seated on one side of the tabernacle. In the opposite corner Dr. Cullis stood by a chair. One by one, in the order of their coming, the afflicted ones were conducted thither. Dipping a finger of his right hand in oil, Dr. Cullis laid his hand upon the head of each, uttering a brief, fervent prayer.

From half-past two till five o'clock the procession filed along. All ages were represented, some tottering on crutches, some in invalid chairs, the dwarfed, the crippled, the blind, and diseased. Those waiting employed the time in singing hymns and listening to addresses from clergymen and others. A large proportion evidently belonged to the class of semi-invalids. Some came from the room declaring themselves perfectly healed. To-day numbers of men and women from all sections of the country and of all stations in life testified to being cured of their diseases. One old lady who had not walked a step in twenty years created a great sensation by discarding her crutches immediately after Dr. Cullis finished praying, and today she walked from her boarding place to the tabernacle. Three old gentlemen who have been lame for years were also apparently made whole in the sight of the assemblage."

A Young Man Seeking Employment at Rochester, N. Y., applied recently to the secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in that city for assistance. As the secretary at that time had nothing on his books suitable for him he advised the young man to canvass for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He took a copy as a sample and was able during the time he was without regular employment to maintain himself by obtaining subscribers for it, many of whom had never before seen a copy of the paper. He remained for some time in Rochester, when an application was made for men in a neighboring town, he being able to fill the requirements took a position. The Watchman of Chicago, the excellent organ of the Y. M. C. A., in relating the incident says: "We did not hear from the young man in some time, but on making inquiry found he was doing his work in a perfectly satisfactory manner, and had united with one of the churches in the town and was doing active work for the Master also." Secretaries of associations would find this hint worth taking. Young men for whom they have no immediate opening might easily earn sufficient money in almost any city in the Union to temporarily supply their most pressing wants by such a canvass.

A Passage from the Will of the Late Senator Benjamin H. Hill, whose death was mentioned last week, is published in an Atlanta journal. It deserves the attention, especially of young people, as the testimony of a man of pre-eminent sagacity and intellectual power. Senator Hill, it might be said, administered on his own estate during his lifetime. Most of his property was disposed of before he died. His will is short, merely disposing of the remaining part of his property and giving directions about things that he wished done and in which the public could feel no interest. In item six is the following: "I now give and bequeath to my wife and children that which some of them now possess, and which I assure them, in full view of death, is far richer than gold and more to be desired than all human honors. God is a living God and Christ came into the world to save sinners. I beg them to have faith in Jesus, for by this faith alone can they be saved."

The Death of Rev. George W. Musgrave, D.D., LL.D., occurred on August 24th. Dr. Musgrave was seventy-eight years of age, and has occupied some of the most important offices in the Presbyterian Church. He was born in 1804 in Philadelphia and studied at Princeton. He became a licentiate of the Presbytery of Baltimore in 1828, and in 1830 was installed pastor of the third Presbyterian Church of that city. He remained there twenty-two years, during which the church and congregation prospered so greatly that the building was enlarged three times to accommodate the increasing crowds attracted by his plain Gospel preaching. Dr. Musgrave was chosen a director of Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836, and was frequently re-elected. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the College of New Jersey in 1845, and in 1859 was elected a trustee of that institution. In 1852 he removed from Baltimore to Philadelphia to accept the secretaryship of the Board of Publication. Ten years later he received from the University of Indiana the degree of LL.D. For a number of years he was corresponding secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions.

A Railroad Bridge on Fire was Saved by the energy and sagacity of two ladies on August 2d. They were returning from a visit when, passing along a lonely road, they observed smoke rising from the railroad bridge which crosses Elk Creek, near Drain, Oregon. They went to the bridge and found that some hot coals dropped by a passing engine had ignited the timbers, and the bridge was being consumed. One of the ladies immediately set out for the town to stop the trains and obtain help. The other one remained behind, and removing some of her outer garments she dipped them in the creek and climbing to the bridge laid them on the smouldering wood, repeating the process until help arrived. She thus succeeded in checking the progress of the fire, the bridge was saved and a disastrous accident averted. If Christians displayed like energy and self-sacrifice in giving the alarm and checking the progress of conflagration which Satan kindles with grogshops, gambling-houses and other vicious resorts on the tracks of life many a life might be saved from wreck and many a soul rescued from perdition (James 1 : 14, 15).

The Discovery of Sunken Treasure Worth $150,000 is announced in a telegram from Pittsburgh, Pa. The message says: For some time a mine locator of New Jersey, has been cruising outside of Erie Harbor in the hope of finding the wreck of the schooner Vermillion, which, with 350 tons of copper, sank in a storm nearly fifty years ago. On August 24th he found the long-sought treasure by the aid of a magnetic rod. An ingot weighing fifty pounds has been brought to the surface. A huge diving bell is to be placed over the spot, and men are engaged to get up the long-concealed treasure, which is worth over $150,000. Patience and perseverance appear in this case likely to be rewarded with success. It must have needed not a little of both qualities to prosecute such a search when the searchers had probably no personal knowledge of its existence and only relied on the accounts given of the disaster by other people. It would be well if Christians would so constantly and earnestly testify of the value of the treasure they possess as to inspire others with a resolve to seek it diligently until they find it (Prov. 2 : 4, 5).

A Rescue from Niagara by Two Boys Caused some excitement a few days ago. The Niagara Falls Gazette states that: Last week a party of Germans were stopping at the Frontier House, Suspension Bridge, among whom was a wealthy brewer from Germany who landed for the purpose of taking a bath. At this point the current is very rapid, and to one not accustomed to the place it is perilous to venture in. The brewer, knowing nothing of the water's depth or the swiftness of the current, got out too far, and was being carried down the rapids. Happily the occurrence was witnessed by two boys, who both instantly swam to the rescue. One of them attempted to reach the drowning man, who grasped him by the neck with a death grip and drew him under. The other boy had by this time reached the scene, and, diving, managed to release the drowning man's hold of his brother, after which the boys succeeded in getting him ashore, the whole party being thoroughly exhausted. The courage and daring of the boys elicited much praise. Such a rescue we can admire and appreciate, but how few are moved by the narrative of the whole human race in peril far worse than that of Niagara, for whose rescue Christ came to die (Isa. 63 : 1).

Three Feet of Electrified Pavement Caused a curious exhibition at the junction of Ann and Nassau Streets, New York, on August 24th. About noon on that day a crowd of men were gazing intently at the paving stones. Close inspection showed nothing peculiar about the paving stones till a heavy truck turned up from Fulton Ferry. Then the crowd parted right and left and watched. As soon as the nigh horse, a heavy bay, set his foot on the charmed spot he plunged as if a hot iron had pierced the foot to the quick, and the throng laughed heartily. Next came the one-horse van of an express company. Again the crowd parted, making a lane in such fashion that the driver had to pass over the mysterious spot, and they looked innocently at the driver in response to the inquiring gaze he cast around. When he looked around after the horse had bolted and he had got him under control, the puzzle was still intricate. Street vendors' old horses, which had not been known to run for years, exhibited feats of agility that surprised their owners. The extraordinary feature of the affair was that people who walked over the spot felt nothing remarkable. It was conjectured at last that there must be a leak of electricity in the wires there, and Mr. Edison and his assistants spent the night in an investigation. They discovered that a wire attached to a chandelier was in contact with a gas pipe and had caused it "to become grounded and the iron shoes of a horse passing over the spot established an earth circuit and the animal received a shock." That explanation accounted for men being unaffected by an influence which so powerfully disturbed the horses. There are as great differences in moral susceptibility between one man and another as there was in the case between the men and the horses. A bad habit only partially conquered, a hereditary constitutional taint, or other causes may render a place or an amusement dangerous to one man which has no influence on another. This fact should make us cautious as to the example we set, and the places to which we introduce those liable to fall (1 Cor. 8 : 9).

A Wasp in a Pulpit led to an Unwonted display of vigor on the part of the clergyman preaching in a church at Hartford, Conn., a few Sundays ago. There was a large congregation and the windows were open to admit the air. The clergyman was in the middle of his sermon when he somehow became aware of a distraction near at hand, and glancing obliquely espied a colossal wasp perched upon his left shoulder. The wasp was humping himself in a way that meant mischief. The minister was in a difficulty, for to attempt to frighten the wasp away would be to invite distraction in the congregation and possibly lead to indecorous amusement. He was, however, equal to the occasion. Raising his voice to an unwonted strain, he swung his right arm around to the left shoulder, plucked the wasp therefrom, placed him upon the desk, and shouting in stentorian tones. "Yes, my beloved hearers," brought his clenched fist down upon that precise spot whereon his enemy lay with an energy that raised a cloud of dust from the cushion, and carried complete destruction to the body of the wasp. The minister had delivered himself and no one in the congregation knew anything of the circumstances except that the minister had been unusually energetic in his delivery that morning. It would be well if the schemes Satan devises for diverting the attention of hearers were always as completely foiled (Mark 4 : 15).

Lost on the Mountains in the Night was the fate of a young couple in Georgia two weeks ago. The Athens (Ga.), Banner says, One day last week an old gentleman from Atlanta visited the falls, bringing with him a charming daughter, just budding into womanhood. The young lady on the second day after her arrival started about three o'clock in the afternoon for a ramble with a young gentleman who was a friend of the family. The father began to grow uneasy about sundown as they did not return, and an hour latter, was in great distress, as a darkness as black as ink set in. The frantic old gentleman then explained the cause of his distress to the male visitors, and begged that they assist him in the search. Several squads were at once organized, equipped with torches, and the search began. One party, who decided to go out on the mountains, when near the top of one, discovered the lost couple sitting at the root of a large tree, and both crying. It seems that they got lost just as night set in. They wandered around in quest of a path as long as they could see, and then, fearing that they might stumble over some precipice in the dark, decided to remain where they were until daylight. It was a dreary prospect, but their decision was a wise one, for had they tried to find their way back they might easily have lost their lives. It is so with sinners lost on the mountains of sin and unbelief. Their own efforts would be in vain if the heavenly Father had not sought them (Isa. 53 : 6).

WHO IS THIS?

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"For who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto me? saith the Lord."—Jeremiah 30 : 21.

A Changed Tone—The Cause of it—The Problem of the Ages—God's Question—Its Object—I. The Mediator—One of Ourselves—A Prince—Priest—Divinely Chosen and Qualified—Voluntarily Pledged—II. His Work—The Descent—The Approach to God—Love the Motive—III. The Results of the Work—The Outcasts Received into the Family—The Old Roman Legend—Are You Engaged?—The Seraph in the Heavenly Choir.

I MENTIONED in the reading that there is a very remarkable change of tone in the Book of Jeremiah, at the thirtieth chapter. You read on through the twenty-nine chapters, and you hear nothing but "a weeping and wailing," while the prophet stands before you, girt with sackcloth, bidding Israel "lament and howl: for the fierce anger of the Lord is not turned back from us." When you come to the middle of the thirtieth chapter all is changed: you have left the dungeon for the pleasant meads, and you hear "thanksgiving, and the voice of them that make merry." Here flowers of promise glorify the fields, and birds of praise sweeten the air with music.

The reason of the change is not difficult to find. The prophet is led to speak of covenant promises, such as that in the twenty-second verse, "Ye shall be My people, and I will be your God." No wonder that his strain grew more cheerful and jubilant. Was there ever such a box of perfume as the covenant? Was there ever such a harp of golden strings, all tuned to the music of consolation, as the covenant? Inspired by this subject, he exclaims in the next chapter, "For thus saith the Lord; Sing with gladness for Jacob, and shout among the chief of the nations: publish ye, praise ye, and say, O Lord, save Thy people, the remnant of Israel."

Moreover, he introduces to us that glorious Messenger of the covenant whom we delight in. He speaks of the Messiah, who is the glorious One who has engaged his heart to approach unto God; and, as when the sun ariseth darkness flees, so when the Saviour appeareth his sorrows vanish, and Jeremiah becomes as eloquent with joy as Isaiah himself. Think no more of Jeremiah as exclusively the weeping prophet; for the flashes of his delight make the night of his sorrow brilliant with an aurora of heavenly brilliance.

The answer to the question of our text is the reason why Jeremiah put away his dust and ashes and girt himself with beauteous array. God had for awhile, on account of their great sin, put away His people, and wounded them with the chastisement of a cruel one for the multitude of their iniquities. They could not walk with Him, for they were not agreed with Him. He could not accept their sacrifices, for they were polluted; He could not listen to their prayers, for they were hypocritical; He could not dwell with them, for they were proud-hearted and rebellious. So Zion came to be called an outcast whom no man seeketh after. God Himself seemed to have given her a bill of divorce, and to have put her away; but it was in seeming only. In Jehovah's heart of hearts He was still bound to His people, whom He loved with an everlasting love. The Lord longed to see them approach to Him that He might comfort them and satiate their souls with His goodness.

How was this to be done? This was the problem of that age, as it is

THE PROBLEM OF ALL AGES.

How can guilty man return unto the Holy God? How can there be peace and amity, love and concord between the Judge of all the earth and His revolting and polluted creature man? It was necessary that one should arise who would approach to God on the behalf of the people, so that God might be well pleased with them for His righteousness' sake. But where was He to be found? The question was asked, and in man's ear it seemed to be asked in vain, for it is written, "There is none to plead thy cause; all thy lovers have forsaken thee."

"Who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto Me? saith the Lord." One was needed to bridge the chasm which divided man from God. Who could do it? God Himself asked the question because He had Himself found the Person, and would have us see Him and understand His glorious character. This inquiry is fitly the sinner's question, when, trembling and convinced of sin, and led to seek his God, he needs an interposer, one of a thousand, who can put his hand upon the offender and the offended, and reconcile the rebel to his Lord. Therefore, in love the Lord takes up the sinner's question and answers it by another. Behold a Daysman of Jehovah's own providing, who can lay his hand upon both: look at Him and answer, "Who is He?"

The inquiry is made, I think, with three great designs, upon which I shall speak as I am enabled of the Spirit of God. First, to direct attention to this glorious person—"Who is this?" Secondly, to excite admiration of his wondrous work, "that engaged his heart to approach unto me, saith the Lord;" and then, thirdly, to arouse our interest in the result of this marvellous approach unto God; for by it we are permitted and enabled to approach unto the Lord ourselves, and we become His people, and He confesses Himself to be our God.

I. The question of our text is asked to direct attention to this glorious Person. "Who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto me? saith the Lord." We read the chapter, and if you have read it attentively, or will do so, you will learn that the person who must draw near to God must be

ONE OF OURSELVES.

"Their nobles," or their glorious one, "shall be of themselves, and their governor shall proceed from the midst of them; and I will cause him to draw near, and he shall approach unto me." It is clear that a fit representative for men must be himself a man. If an angel were capable in all other respects of drawing near to God, yet it is clear that he could not do it on man's behalf; for an angel can only represent angels. Each order of beings must be represented by its own kind. Our Lord, as man, took not up angels, for He was not made in their nature; but He took up the seed of Abraham because He had assumed their nature. It needed a man perfect in his manhood to head us up, and stand as our federal head and representative, or otherwise we could not be restored by him.

Now, then, brethren, where is this man to be found? "Who is this?" If he is to come of ourselves, where is he? If the whole roll of history be searched, from Adam's fall to this moment, there is not one mere man to be found who could represent the race and make an approach for them to God on the ground of personal perfection; for this is God's own verdict—"All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." The Lord looked from heaven to see if there were any among the children of men that had not transgressed, but he found none, for "they are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one."

Nor is it merit alone that is needed, for he that would approach unto the Lord as mediator must be prepared with strength to suffer. Who can sustain the load of human sin? Who can endure the indignation of the Lord against iniquity? Assuredly none of us could do it: the fire would consume him as stubble. O for an interposer; but where can he be found? Who is this who can as man appear for men, and by his personal righteousness and sacrifice render man acceptable with God?

There was a Man of matchless birth, at whose coming angels sang, for they were told that He would bring glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace. Find Him in Bethlehem's manger: there He lies, the son of Mary, truly man, one of ourselves, partaker of our flesh and blood, subject to human wants, weaknesses, and woes, and able therefore to sympathize with us and have compassion upon us; that Man grew up in this world without taint or spot, free from sin whether natural or acquired, and yet he was in the truest sense one of ourselves, so that he is not ashamed to call us brethren. When the malicious eyes of Satan searched Him through and through, he found nothing of evil in Him. He was without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, and He it is that hath engaged His heart to approach unto God on our behalf.

Now look at the context, and you will see that the person who must approach to God for us must be

for He is called "their glorious One" and "their governor," and yet it is said of Him, "I will cause Him to draw near," which work of drawing near is in other places ascribed to priests, for these God had set apart for the service of His sanctuary. The Hebrew word "to draw near" signifies that peculiar action of a priest when he stands dealing with God on the behalf of men. The person, then, must be a priest and yet a prince. Who is he, and where is he?

Where shall we find one that even as a priest can really draw near to God for mankind? For remember, brethren, that the priests of old only drew near to God in figure and in metaphor; they could not actually and in very deed do so; for God is a consuming fire. Even when Moses went up unto the mount with God, and did draw near in a certain sense, yet he never saw the face of God; for the Lord said, "Thou canst not see my face and live." Neither among kings nor priests could the one man be found who could open the way to the Father, and certainly no king-priest could be found—the combination of the two offices falls not to the house of Aaron.

A reverend personage had passed before the camera of history, and left a shadowy trace of himself. But where now is he who was named Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God, to whom Abraham gave tithes of all. He was raised up for a special purpose, and no one has inherited his peculiar call. That vision taught us what to look for, but it did not supply the object of our search. It has prophesied the coming of the true Melchisedec, the man without beginning of days or end of years, the man without predecessor or successor, who is greater than Abraham, and abideth both priest and king forever, having once for all drawn near to God on our behalf. You know him—of God, not of the order of Aaron, and the king eternal, immortal, invisible, King of kings, and Lord of lords. It is He that engaged His heart to draw near to God on our behalf.

The question, however, may be answered in another way, so as to bring out more clearly the matchless Person whom our hearts adore at this moment. It was necessary that he who should draw near to God should be chosen to that office by God Himself, and should be qualified for it by divine power. "I will cause him to draw near, and he shall approach to Me." "There is one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." He it is that takes upon Himself our nature and our sin, and then goes in unto God and stands there amid the blaze of the ineffable light to represent manhood; but there is none else. On him rested the Spirit of God without measure.

Moreover, to close this description, he was not only appointed of God and qualified, but he was one who was willing to undertake the task and ready to pledge Himself to it. He voluntarily covenanted to do it, as it is written, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of Me, to do Thy will. O God: yea, Thy law is My delight." He engaged His heart to this gracious office, resolving to carry out to a happy issue the work of reconciliation. Moved by inconceivable, immeasurable love, and counting all the cost, He devoted Himself to the supreme effort. "Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it." Of His own free will He placed Himself before offended justice to meet its claims, and so He removed every barrier which stood between us and the throne of God. He is that Breaker who has gone up before us, that King who is at the head of all His chosen ones.

Now, where is such an One to be found unless it be the Lord Jesus? I trust many of us have given ourselves up to God and to His fear, drawn by almighty love; but it was never in our hearts to imagine that by giving up ourselves to holy service we could stand before God, and open a way to Him for our fellow-men; we are well aware of our incompetence for so grand a task. None of us have struck hands and covenanted with God to mediate, for we could not do it. I dread the thought of seeming to intrude into so divine a work. We are priests unto God, but not mediators for men. When I hear of men pretending to hear the confessions of their fellow-men and absolving them of their sins, I wonder that they sleep of nights after professing so tremendous an act. I wonder what the power of Satan over them must be that they can rest after having assumed to act as vicars of Jehovah, He having given them no warrant and no authority for such a mediatorial position. Brethren, this hugest of blasphemies may well become the Mother of Harlots, but the Bride of Christ abhors it. But oh, when my eyes rest upon Jesus, the only begotten Son of God, in human flesh, then I cry, "This is He!"

Though I have thus spoken to the best of my knowledge, I know that I cannot set out before you the full glory of the person of our covenant head. I shall go home saying to myself, "Who is this? Who is this?" and I shall have succeeded in my endeavor if you will each one say, "He could not tell us who He was: He could not reach the height of that great argument, but we shall all through time and in eternity go on wondering and saying, Who is this?" The more we wonder the more shall we love and praise the Lord Jesus with our heart of hearts and say, "He hath done all things well. We are made nigh by Him, never more to be separated from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

II. I come now to excite admiration of

HIS MATCHLESS WORK.

If Jesus Christ is to approach to God for us, it is clear that He must come down into our condition, for He must first descend or He cannot ascend. "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses." There He stands, even where we stood by nature. Where we lay in our blood, there He came and engaged His heart to deliver us. He stood at the judgment bar because we had brought ourselves there; He was rejected of the people because we were rejected as reprobate silver; He was condemned because we were condemned; and He was put to death because such was the sentence upon us. He descended into our depths to engineer a way from the lowest to the highest, to come back from Bashan, and from the depths of the sea, leading the van of the armies of his chosen as they return unto God with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads.

This lowly place being taken, behold our Lord actually approaching unto the offended Majesty on high. Though found in fashion as a man, and by reason of His becoming a curse for us, denied the presence of the Father, so that he cried in anguish, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" yet He did approach unto God: He did come near; nay, He remaineth near, able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him. He has bridged the great gulf which sin had made. "It is finished," said He, ere He bowed His head and gave up the ghost. The pathway is open; every gulf is filled; every valley is exalted, and every mountain and hill laid low. It is finished—the way from man to God has been already trodden by myriads of cleansed feet; for our glorious One has cast up the king's highway and made straight paths for our feet. Come, let us tread the road.

Our Lord with all His heart desired to do this: He "engaged His heart" to perform it. Before all worlds His master purpose was to approach unto God as man's representative. He is styled "the Lamb slain from before the foundations of the world," because this was the firm resolve and bent of His entire being, or ever the earth was. He had vowed in His soul that he would restore the banishment of the fall, and bridge the distance between man and God. When God would not have sacrifice and offering at man's hand, then Jesus said, "Lo, I come." He says of Himself, "The Lord God will help Me; therefore shall I not be confounded: therefore have I set My face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed." His heart was determined and resolved, for so the expression means, when the text saith, "He engaged His heart."

But why this readiness, this eagerness? Love is the one reply. His heart was occupied with love to God and love to man, and He could not rest till He had restored the broken concord between these divided ones. With all the forcefulness of His divine nature, and with all the energy of His perfect humanity, He was resolved to bring men back to God. While He was yet a boy He felt bound to be about His Father's business. When He first appeared among the multitude it was by submission to the Father's ordinance to fulfil all righteousness. He could not hold His peace or take rest, because His mission was urgent and His heart was in it.

Having thus determined that He would approach unto God on our behalf, He took all the consequences. A correct reading of the passage would be, "Who is this that hath pledged his heart or his life to approach unto me, saith the Lord?" If you take the meaning of the word "heart" to be life, since the heart is the source of life, then we read that our Lord pledged His life, put his life in surety that He would approach unto God, the Judge of all, and bring us near to Him. When He came as the representative of sinful men—then vengeance with its sword must smite Him, and He was willing to be smitten. His motto was, "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" He saved others, but Himself He could not save, because love held Him bound in her chains.

How intensely ought we to love Jesus, since He thus reckoned nothing too hard or heavy, that He might appear in the presence of God for us and make a way to God for poor sinners such as we are. He even delighted in suffering and dishonor for this end. "For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross, despising the shame." He made pledge, not merely of hand or eye, but of his heart and life; He came with His life in His hand before Jehovah's face, and gave up that life that He might remove from us the death penalty due to justice, and so reconcile us to the Lord of all. Who is this wonderful Saviour? Who shall declare the generation of Him who pledged His life that He might draw near to God for us, and endured all the consequences to the bitter end?

III. Let me try to arouse your interest in

of Jesus Christ's having approached to God for us.

The first result is found in the chapter. Read that twenty-second verse. Read it with your own eyes, and wonder that it should be put there. "Who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto Me? saith the Lord. And ye shall be My people, and I will be your God." That is, because our royal High Priest approached unto God for us, therefore we who were called outcasts, we whose wound was incurable and grievous, we that were utterly ruined and undone; we, believing in this Jesus, shall in Him become the people of God.

Let me speak plainly with you, beloved brethren: how many of you have realized this? It is all idle for me to talk about Christ making the way unless you run in the way. Are you the Lord's people? Many of you humbly rejoice in this high honor; but there may be a few here who are of another mind; you care nothing for having the Lord to be your God. Possibly you sneer, and call it cant. Yes, but if you knew the truth you would not do so. When we hear you speaking contemptuously of being God's people, all we can say is, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Will you mind thinking just for half a minute? Will you try to think justly and rightly? Must it not be good and right that the creature should love the Creator? Must it not be a wise thing that the children whom God has formed should love their heavenly Father and be on good terms with Him? Is it not likely that it would be a happy thing for you if you were one of God's people? You can never rest till you are. But you say, "How can I be?" Why, it all follows upon what I have been talking of. Jesus Christ went in unto the Father for us, that we might approach unto the Father in Him and through Him, that we might become the Lord's own people, and that the Lord might become our God.

I invite you to an honest, practical test. See if there be not joy in the salvation of God. Religion is with some people a sort of dreamy thing on Sundays: you sit in your pews and bear with us long-winded talkers about things which you do not care for. Oh, but if you did value and enjoy them! If you could but taste and handle them you would say, "Go on, preacher; go on! You are a poor hand at it, for your themes are so great and wondrous that you cannot reach to them; but, still, go on. Ring that bell again: open more doors, and let us peep in upon the secret treasures." This bliss comes to those of us who rejoice in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh, because Jesus said, "I will wait upon the Lord that hideth His face from the house of Jacob." The face of the Lord is no longer hidden from us, but we have access with confidence into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

I seem to see in my spirit

worked out in very deed. So saith the story: in the Roman Forum there gaped a vast chasm which threatened the destruction of the Forum, if not of Rome. The wise men declared that the gulf would never close unless the most precious thing in Rome was cast into it. See how it yawns and cracks every moment more horribly. Hasten to bring this noblest thing! For love of Rome sacrifice your best! But what, or who is this? Where is a treasure meet for sacrifice? Then Curtius, a belted knight, mounted his charger, and rightly judging that valor and love of country were the noblest treasures of Rome, he leaped into the gulf. The yawning earth closed upon a great-hearted Roman, for her hunger was appeased. Perchance it is but an idle tale: but what I have declared is truth. There gaped between God and man a dread abyss, deep as hell, wide as eternity, and only the best thing that heaven contained could fill it. That best thing was He, the peerless Son of God, the matchless, perfect man, and He came, laying aside His glory, making Himself of no reputation, and He sprang into the gulf, which there and then closed, once for all.

One great result of Christ's having died is to leave us a way of access, which is freely opened to every poor, penitent sinner. Come. Are you using that way of access? Do you use it every day? Having used it, and thus having drawn near to God, do you dwell near to God? Do you abide in God? Is God the main thought of your life, the chief delight and object of your being? If it be not so, I earnestly invite you by the Spirit's help to make it so. You must engage your heart to come to God in Christ. There is no coming to God without sincere resolve and eager desire. Are you engaged to such an end? Alas! it may be you are drawn elsewhere.

ARE YOU ENGAGED?

Alas! some are engaged to Madame Bubble; some are engaged to Belial; some are engaged to self; some are engaged to Mammon; some seem engaged to the very devil of the pit. Be wise, and break these unlawful engagements. Let your covenant with death be broken, and your league with hell be disannulled. Though you be weary of my words, yet would I stir you up to interest in this all-important matter. Break these deadly bands asunder. God help you, by a sudden energy which He shall give you, to snap your fetters once for all, and then at once firmly engage your hearts to Christ. Never such loveliness, never such love will you find elsewhere.

Come, say now, Whatever else I do or do not do, I will do this: I will approach to God by the way that Christ has opened for me: I will arise and go to my Father: I will throw myself at my Father's feet: I must be reconciled: I cannot live an enemy to him: I must be made a friend:

"I will approach thee—I will force
My way through obstacles to thee."

Jesus goes before me, and I gladly follow. I will not leave the throne till thou, O Lord, hast said, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." I shall be greatly happy, I shall be exceeding glad, if I may induce one spirit to come to God by Jesus Christ; but if the whole of you will come at once, if God's spirit shall now prompt all believers to come, and all unbelievers to become believers, and so to come, what a splendid company of us will enter into the golden gates, and what joy there will be in heaven over all of us as we approach unto the Most High.

I think I note a seraph, as he takes down his harp, stand in the centre of

and suggest to his fellow choristers that their theme should be, "Who is this that hath engaged his heart to approach unto the living God?" Hark how ten thousand voices say, "Who is this?" Let us in humble notes lift up our praises. Here is a verse which may serve our turn—

"Who is this that enters glory,
Clearing for his saints a way?
Who shall tell the wondrous story?
Who his glorious work display?
Jesus makes our access clear,
To the Father brings us near."

Thus the question, "Who is this?" admits of a second answer, for now in Christ Jesus all believers with engaged hearts are approaching unto God. Who is this? At first it is Jesus, Son of man and Son of God; and next it is His church with all her heart engaged approaching unto God by Jesus Christ. My hearers, can you join in the song of praise which is now rising from heaven and earth? Angels are waiting till you approach their God. Come, hurry up: hasten to be blest. At once approach your God by Christ Jesus, and as angels see you coming their song shall grow yet louder, till it shall excel the noise of many waters, and out-voice the last great thunderings. They come! They come! Sinners are coming to God! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen.

The Conversion of a Jewish Rabbi is thus described by the Rev. Mr. Jaffe, of Nuremberg: "A Jewish rabbi of very refined manners called to see me. I at once saw that I had to do with a man who was not only a thorough Talmudical, but also a first-rate Hebrew scholar, and yet with all his learning he was evidently a most unhappy man. He was laboring under a deep conviction of sin, and seemed to be as miserable as possible. 'I am very unhappy,' he said, 'and I am come to ask you to show me the way in which I can find the peace I am so earnestly longing for.' His suffering appearance called forth my deepest pity; he was evidently in a state of high consumption, which sickness he said he had contracted on the battle-field, and for which he hoped to gain relief in Italy, whither he was bound. He told me that he was formerly very orthodox, but that a circumstance that happened roused within him strong misgivings as to the truthfulness of the Judaism of the present day; he struggled hard against these feelings, but could not banish them any more. In his despair he purchased a Hebrew New Testament, and began to read it, and as he read, the light of Divine truth began to dawn upon his mind and with this a consciousness of his guilt and forlorn condition was awakened within him. In this state he came to me. He remained here eight days, and came daily to me for some hours, and, through God's help, I was enabled gradually to dispel the gloom that was hovering over his mind, and of leading him, step by step, to accept Christ as his Saviour."

The Egyptians During the Eclipse of the Sun in June last were seriously alarmed. The astronomers who went to Egypt to witness the eclipse all testify the fright of the natives when the mysterious darkness crept over the land, and the sun seemed to have been extinguished in the heavens. The excitement of the natives was increased when they saw on the right of the hidden sun the form of a flaming scimitar, or short sword. It was a new comet, whose existence had not been suspected before. It had been concealed in the sun's rays, and the sudden withdrawal of the light of the great luminary revealed its hiding-place. Many of the dwellers along the Nile are convinced that that sword-shaped comet was an omen of the warlike events that have since taken place and are now proceeding in Egypt.

ALEXANDRIAN PILLAGERS PURSUED BY SOLDIERS.

ALEXANDRIA, which, ever since the massacre of Europeans on June 11th, has been the topic of much conversation, and whose forts have since been destroyed by the bombardment by Admiral Seymour on July 11th, was described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 10th, and a brief sketch of its history was also given. This week we give a picture of a scene in the streets of the ancient city during the massacre of June 11th.

The ferocious attack on the Europeans began about two o'clock of that Sunday afternoon. It was undoubtedly premeditated on the part of the lower class of natives, as groups of them were seen loitering about early in the day, all more or less armed. There was a quarrel between a Maltese and an Arab; the latter was stabbed, and the commotion caused by the fight attracted a mob, and the desperate work immediately commenced. Many Europeans were killed about three o'clock, and then the mob increased rapidly, and began wrecking the shops, which in some cases were defended by the Europeans, who fired upon their assailants. This exasperated the mob, which was already excited, to a degree of fury approaching madness; and a desperate conflict ensued. The military appeared on the scene about five o'clock, and charged down the streets.

The terror was so great that thousands of destitute Europeans, Greeks, Maltese, and others precipitately quitted the city. The exodus is roughly estimated at about 50,000. The commercial and banking houses closed, and the clerks followed their principals on board the British ships.

pillagers taking flight at the approach of the military. After the streets had been cleared, and the dead and wounded removed, on the next day, Monday, June 12th, search was made for stolen property. Of this, much has been recovered, and wherever it has been found the holders were at once arrested. A large number of people of the lowest class, of such a character as is always to be found in large cities, and especially in the Levant, are now in prison awaiting sentence.

AN EXPERIMENT IN TEMPERANCE.

"Now, here's Jenny as obstinate about her glass of beer as if she were a confirmed old toper," said Ernest Laverack, addressing his sister, and pointing to the parlor maid of the vicarage, who had been helping the two young people to decorate the rooms with evergreens for Christmas.

"Is that really so, Jenny?" said Miss Laverack, looking up inquiringly.

"Well, Miss, I cannot say I'm obstinate, but I can't see any good in giving up beer. It does me good when I am tired, and I like it. It's all very well for Mr. Ernest, who has nothing to do when he is at college but read and write to do without it, though I don't know why he should; but I have not been to college to pick up any newfangled notions and I have a great deal of running around to do in a day, and when I sit down to supper I must say I enjoy a glass of beer." Jenny said this in rather argumentative fashion, but she was not clever in argument, and her employer's son and his sister were very much in earnest about making converts in the village. So the end of it was that Jenny was persuaded to try the experiment of living without beer for a month, with the understanding that if at the end of that time she did not like abstinence the beer was to be supplied again.

The next day Jenny had a holiday, and when she went to her home in the village she told her father of her promise. Old John Melton was not likely to approve of his daughter's arrangement, though scarcely any man in the village had more cause to do so. He was a great believer in beer and drank so much of it that his own comforts and those of his family were seriously curtailed in order to pay his score at the corner grocery.

"Turned teetotalers, eh?" said John. "Turned their brains, rather. Why, who ever heard of any one coming to harm through a glass of beer. It's nonsense! They'll be comin' to me next, an' axing me to give up getting my pint o' a night. I only wish they would; I'd show 'em a thing or two. Well, never mind, lass, we'll soon tak' thee away if thee's the worse for their stupidity."

The month quickly passed over, and John was obliged to acknowledge that Jenny looked as fair and buxom as ever.

"Shall we renew the bargain, Jenny?" asked Miss Laverack; "we will say two months this time."

Jenny smilingly agreed. At the end of that time it was renewed until Christmas. By that time a year had flown since Jenny had become a teetotaler. Not only was she still alive, notwithstanding her abstinence, but she was in excellent health and spirits. At any rate there was only one thing that troubled her, and that was her father's habits. John Melton, her dear father, was fast becoming bound in the drunkard's chains. His love of intoxicants had increased upon him, and more than once during the past year he had walked home unsteadily and his speech was thick and his temper ruffled.

Jenny summoned up courage to speak to Miss Laverack about it, and Ernest was called into consultation.

It was agreed among the three friends to invite Jenny's father to a Christmas supper. Jenny hastened to take the invitation to her parent. As she expected, she had not a little opposition to contend against.

"They wants to make me a teetotaler, that's about the ticket," said the old man; "but they ain't going to get over me with their fine talking. I considers I'm a match for either on 'em—br any man," he added, with a grand rhetorical burst.

"But, father," pleaded Jenny, "it'll only be right of you to accept their kindness. They've been very good to me, you know, and I'm sure they don't wish you any harm."

John was at length prevailed upon to go, and after a good deal of scrubbing and brushing and hair-oiling, he sallied forth. He was very affably received at Rosecliff, and sat down to supper with the master of the house. Nothing at all was said on the subject of Temperance during the meal—to which John did full justice—though there were no intoxicants on the table.

After supper the conversation was very naturally led by Mr. Laverack to Jenny, and her good qualities, a subject on which John was very willing to talk.

This, of course, brought up the subject of Temperance, and Ernest Laverack related how, twelve months ago, for the sake of his Blessed Master and out of love for his fellow-men, he had ceased, though only a very moderate drinker, to use that which was ruining so many thousands of his countrymen. Then he pleaded earnestly with John Melton to take the same course, showing him how physically, morally, and financially it would be a blessing to him.

John Melton always said after that night that he certainly had the best of the argument, but it was Mr. Laverack's earnestness and kindness that induced him to sign the pledge; and this view neither his child nor Mr. Laverack ever cared to dispute with him.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

Old Betty's Favorite.

"GOD the Father of heaven"—those words filled Silverdale Church with a full, solemn sound, and reached an unseen pair of ears, whose owner a few minutes since had dragged his tired, blistered feet, and his sun-scorched head, into the shelter of the deep church porch.

That roomy, shadowy porch was a very favorite resting-place with those who knew it, young and old, rich and poor. From its left-hand stone seat Mr. Copleston used to point out to his friends the most beautiful clump of his favorite silver birches, and from its right-hand stone seat there was a close view of the quiet, flowery little graveyard.

The farthest corner of this right-hand stone seat was the one that the wayfarer had chosen. There was less of the dazzling sun, and less of the dazzling sunlit landscape to be seen from that one than from the other; and as there are times for all things, so nature has aspects to suit all moods—sun, and sparkling rivers, and gay flowers for the joyous-hearted; and when we are sad and tired, or very sombre, black-green yew hedges and tree-shadowed graves. The stranger in the porch looked all three—very sad, very tired, and very sombre—as he gazed unconsciously at the dark boundary.

The second lesson had just begun when he sat down; but although in the great surrounding stillness every word was audible, he heard nothing. He heard nothing until, at the end of the third collect—the collect for grace—the organ pealed forth, and set every nerve in his body vibrating. And then he began to listen, but only to sounds. Even when many voices were joined to the tones of the organ in singing the hymn he could distinguish no words. But the sweet sounds touched him, and by degrees soothed him, and he began to wait with some longing for what was to come next.

nothing more. He dropped his head with a second low, bitter groan back again against the cool, shaded wall, and once more gazed out at the quiet graves with a dismal, hopeless feeling that there was nothing left for him in this world but to fill another such still green mound as soon as possible. And yet he could not have been more than twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, and looked as though he would have been a strong and healthy young man with proper food and rest. Now he was battered and beaten, and shrunken with privation and misery, and certainly appeared little likely to have to fight with his dreary life much longer if there were no improvement in it soon.

When the singing of the hymn roused him up, to listen to what was going on within the building, his eyes had brightened with a kind of hope, and there had been something quite attractive in the expression of his face in spite of its squalor. But the words which had sounded to him so stern and forbidding in their awfulness had banished all the new glimmering of gladness, and as he crouched in his

He lifted his head from the wall, and sat up with his two dust-grimed hands pressed on his knees. He had heard that religion helped people and made them happy, and if ever any one wanted a little help and happiness he did most assuredly. With every moment that passed his listening became more anxious. But he had only a few moments to wait, just long enough for the final vibrations of the organ to die away, and then Mr. Copleston's rich clear voice pronounced, slowly and very earnestly, those words with which our chapter begins—"God the Father of heaven."

No one had seen the ragged tramp sink down in his shadowy corner, and no one heard him groan with a sort of sick despair as those awful words smote his ears—"God the Father of heaven."

Aye! indeed, he remembered now, he had heard those words many a time before, many a long year ago. The great only God, the all-powerful Creator, was "God the Father of heaven." How then should He be expected to be the Father of a wretched, worthless, outcast vagabond! Thought is swift as the lightning flash, and this and much more had passed through that downcast mind, and sent it wandering far from its present surroundings, even in the pause of a second or two that Mr. Copleston made, according to his constant custom, before he completed the sentence—"Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners."

Old Betty Sharplin repeated the whole sentence with a feeling of most perfect thankfulness. She recognized the almighty power expressed by the invocation, but it only served to make her feel the more sure of the mercy. And so it was with many another among her companions in the church; but the unknown member of the congregation, crouching alone outside, did not even hear that cry in which his heart would willingly have joined had it dared—"Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners."

"God the Father of heaven," was all he heard. He listened to corner he felt and looked like one to whom hope has been finally denied, both here and hereafter. Meantime, he had at least found a cool corner in which to rest, and gradually he forgot hunger and pain and wretchedness, and his Father gave him the blessing of sleep.

The service ended, the people began to stream out of church with bright faces greeting the bright light. They were not toilworn, weak, weary, and dusty; on the contrary, they were all fairly well fed, healthy, and happy, and for folks in such circumstances a fine August is a month that has a very delightful holiday flavor about it. Mr. Copleston's sermon too had been very inspiring—full of bright encouragement; and the faces of his parishioners were pleasant to see as they gathered into knots about the door or on the grass-plot.

"Master Burton," said a farmer, nodding to a neighbor, "glorious weather for th' harvest then, isn't it? And a glorious good sermon from vicar to match it. There's no long-pulled faces and doleful doldrums with him, to damp the heart out o' one."

"Ah! you are right enough there," cried Sir Edmund Wright heartily, and pausing on his way to the outer gate to give his kindly answer to the remark he had overheard.

The speeches of both the farmer and the squire had been loud enough to be heard by those who were still lingering in the wide porch, among whom was Mrs. Balston, and she in a lower tone made her comment on them.

"It's true enough that vicar's sermon was quite Christmassy bright-like; but, gracious me! when he began the Litany I thought for certain something out of the common had happened. His voice seemed to go right down to one's feet."

"Mr. Copleston always is very solemn," said Betty Sharplin, "when he begins 'God the Father of heaven.'"

"Of course; I know that; but he was by ordinary solemn this morning. It gave me quite a turn; I felt frightened like. But, dear me, what's the matter with you, Bobby? What are you pulling that way at mother's gown for?"

"Only," very softly, "please, mother, talk gently, or you will wake him; and he does look so very drefful tired, poor man."

"Who looks so tired, my bonny?" asked Mrs. Balston, at the same time following the direction of her little boy's eyes, and thus obtaining an answer to the question for herself. Old Granny Sharplin turned too, and for the first time saw the sleeping tramp drawn up close against the wall in his corner. In passing onwards out of church no one had happened to turn and notice the stranger until Bobby Balston's eyes lighted upon him while the child stood waiting for his mother to give him her hand, and let them walk home together. The first thing Bobby had done when he saw the sleeper was to step noiselessly toward him, and pick up the old hat which had fallen to the ground. He laid it beside its owner on the stone bench with a very pitiful look on his rosy face, and then went back to his mother's side with his pleading request that she would speak gently, so as not to awaken the tired man.

"Bless you for your kind heart, my deary," murmured Betty, as she at once moved out of the porch, followed by her companions. "He do look rarely done; we won't waken him."

"And yet I don't know," said Mrs. Balston, standing still again, and looking back irresolutely; "I don't know as we are doing quite right by vicar, to leave a grimy, beggarly vagrant like this'n yonder snoring away on his stone bench like the sluggard."

She moved back a step, but Bobby clung to her. "Oh, mother, but I don't think he is like the sluggard! He hasn't got any garden, nor any bed, and he hasn't snored really once either."

"Oh, stuff and fiddlesticks, child! How you do take one up," returned his mother impatiently, but smiling in spite of herself at Bobby's literalness. Just then Mr. Copleston himself appeared at the inner door of the porch, followed by the clerk, and the little group of three before him waited anxiously to see if anything would happen with respect to their new object of interest.

At first the vicar passed on, as his parishioners had done, without observing the stranger close beside him; then some thought occurred to his mind, and he turned to speak to Williams, the clerk, and his glance fell upon the tramp.

"Why, who have we here?" he exclaimed in a low undertone, and bending forward toward the wanderer with eyes full of inquiry and interest.

The clerk stared, and bent forward too for a moment, then he drew himself up with a dignified air, and said disdainfully—

"Bless me, sir, there's no need to waste time or thought on such as that. It's easy to see as he's nothing more nor less than a low ne'er-do-well. You leave him to me, sir; I'll settle him fast enough when you are gone, and let him understand in double quick time as Silverdale isn't the parish to put up with pests like him."

As he ended, the clerk stretched out his hand as though to lay it on the sleeper's shoulder with some roughness. Bobby Balston started forward with quivering lips, but before he could say anything Mr. Copleston had caught back the outstretched arm, and rather by sign than deed led his companion out of the porch. He walked on rather quickly toward the gate, followed by Williams, Granny Betty, and Mrs. Balston and her child. Every one else had by this time gone on toward home and their Sunday dinner.

Five minutes ago Williams also had been rather extra impatient to get home to his Sunday dinner, but now his temper was ruffled. It did not take much sometimes to ruffle his temper, poor fellow, and he felt supremely indifferent for the minute whether he ever again had any dinner at all. He was rather elated than otherwise when he was still further detained from his beefsteak pie by his vicar blocking up the gateway before he had got through, and again giving his attention to that disreputable-looking encumbrance in the porch. It seemed to have as great an attraction for Mr. Copleston as for little Bobby.

Patched and tattered garments, covered with dust; two lean, bony hands, very grimy, and a long, lean face, with sunken cheeks and sunken eyes, surmounted by a matted mass of sandy hair—that was what the spectators saw as they stood at the churchyard gate looking back at the shady porch. To three, at least, of the five people at the gate the sight was a very sorrowful one. All kept silence for some minute or more, until at last Mr. Copleston said, rather to himself than others, and earnestly—

"How frightfully tired the poor fellow must have been to sleep through all the noise of the people coming out of church!"

"Silverdale folks are well known for being very orderly in coming out," grunted the clerk.

Mr. Copleston smiled. "Yes, yes, Williams, you are right; but in looking to ourselves we must beware of being too harsh to others. That poor, worn-out fellow there does neither the porch nor us any harm by having a sheltered rest in it. We ought to be glad that he has had the good sense and honesty to make such a choice. He might have preferred to take a night's sleep on the top of our strawberry-beds, as the gipsies did last year, and to follow their example further by spending the hours of service in robbing our orchards and hen-houses. But you may depend upon it, whatever misdeeds have brought him to his present miserable condition, theft has not been one of them, so we will not be the people to give him a bad lesson in that respect by robbing him of his sleep. If you see him there still, when you come to open the church in the afternoon, ask him to step over to the Vicarage, will you?"

"Yes, sir, if you wish, of course," said Williams. But nevertheless he shook his head angrily two or three times in the direction of the church porch, as he marched home to that beefsteak pie. He considered that his dignity as clerk of Silverdale Church was seriously compromised by beggars being allowed sleeping quarters in Silverdale Church porch. As for Bobby Balston, he felt so happy when Mr. Copleston motioned them all out of the churchyard, and softly shut the gate, leaving the tramp to finish his sleep in peace, that his face beamed as brightly as if he had got a second Sunday-school prize and his feet danced the whole of the way home.

"Well, little Lag-the-last," cried Bob the elder, laughing, and catching up Bob the younger as he ran into the cottage, "where have thee and mother been loitering so long, I'd like to know? We have been home afore thee a long quarter hour I'm bound, and if I have to go wi'out dinner much longer I'll be fain to set about munching your cheeks."

"Nay, father, they're too fat. You don't like all fat," laughed Milly.

"Then if he likes all lean he'd better dine off the beggar fellow we've been waiting to look at in the church porch," said Mrs. Balston; "for of all scarecrows that ever I see he beats them."

"Poor chap!" ejaculated Bob, and he looked gratefully at the table which his young daughters had just finished spreading for dinner. The Balstons were a frugal, honest, sensible family, not at all given to luxury or extravagance; but they always had what Mary Balston called their "bettenmost of everything" on Sundays. Their best clothes, their best books, their best cups and plates, and their best meals, and as Mary Balston was a first-rate manager and a clever cook, the "bettenmost meals" provided for her family were such as many of her "betters" in worldly station would have been glad enough to partake of. Bob Balston often dined off a huge hunch of bread and cheese, and never thought himself an object of pity for his fare; but he had a very sensible, healthy enjoyment of these nice Sunday meals, and as he looked at the present one, he heartily wished that every lean scarecrow had its equal.

But with slow-brained Bob wishes seldom passed into deeds without help from some one else, and therefore once more muttering "poor chap," he dismissed the lean stranger from his thoughts, and sat down to dinner. It was very different with little Bobby. He looked at his plate, and then he looked up in his father's face with an earnestness that of necessity attracted attention.

"What is it, little un? hasn't mother given ye the bit ye like?"

"Oh, father!" expostulated the little fellow, a smile breaking through the gravity, "you know mother always gives me what I like."

"Leastways, you always like what mother gives you. Well, but then, what is it troubling you?"

"Only —"

"Well then, my little chap ain't afeard to tell father what he wants?"

"N—no; it was only," and Bobby's voice sank to a whisper—"it was only I think, may be, that poor man hasn't got any baked potatoes for dinner."

"No, indeed; nor nought else, belike, poor wretch."

"Then, father," in a still lower whisper, "don't you think he would look nice and pleased if he found one of my potatoes beside him when he wakes up?"

Bob stared for a moment at his little boy in a puzzled way, and then such a pleasant smile brightened his heavy features that he looked almost handsome. "You are a rare good little chap, and clever at thinking, that ye are. An' I'll gie ye your wish, an' gladly. Hold out your hands, and now be off with you like the wind, and back again before I've time to take two bites."

Bobby waited for no second leave. With the two largest hot potatoes, one in either hand, and his dark eyes shining with unselfish joy, he jumped off his chair with a shrill cry of delight, and was out of the cottage before his mother could find voice to ask what her husband and youngest child were up to.

"If you've been sendin' off them potatoes to Granny Sharplin," she exclaimed at last rather sharply, "you'd best have learnt first whether they were wanted. Farmer Burton sent her in some o' the new sausages, she says, last night for her Sunday dinner. But you always are to wrong times wi' your gifts."

"Not this time, I think, Molly," was the slow, good-humored reply. "The little un has took a fancy to the chap you see in the church porch, and I knew ye'd not grudge him the pleasure of giving him a bit of food."

"No," was the answer in a quieter tone. "Mary Balston ain't the one to run her Sunday's dinner so close as to miss a couple of potatoes among eight eaters. But, bless that child, if he goes on like this he'll be giving the bit out of his own mouth one o' these days."

"Then be like," said Bob, with slow gravity, "be like Him as feeds the sparrows will put another bit in."

CALAMITIES FORETOLD.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 10, Mark 13 : 1-20. Golden Text, Prov. 22 : 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Coming Time of Trouble—Prophecy a Neglected Study—Antediluvian Indifference—Tendency to Boastfulness—An Important Question—The Lord's Answer—Persecution Certain—Deliverance Assured—How to Act under Persecution—Family Persecution—Persecution of Spiritual Brethren—The Indications of the End—Extended Publication of the Gospel—The Anti-Jewish Agitation—The Sign Unfulfilled—The Seventieth Week.

"A PRUDENT man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself : but the simple pass on, and are punished." So speaks our golden text, and it is indeed a word of wisdom in view of the time of tribulation which must be near, and may be closer upon us than many of us think. The prophet Daniel, speaking of this "time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time," says, "None of the wicked shall understand ; but the wise shall understand" (Dan. 12 : 1, 10).

Many there are who turn aside from all the prophetic part of Scripture as though it were not to edification, and excuse their ignorance of it on the plea that writers on prophecy differ so much that they think this subject only causes confusion. Now we may well be excused from reading expositions of prophecy, but have we any reasonable ground for believing that the prophetic Scriptures themselves are unprofitable? Paul tells us that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness ; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. 3 : 16, 17).

It may be an unpalatable truth to the man who has set his heart on riches or pleasure, that God is about to bring such judgments on the earth that all property will deteriorate, all investments become doubtful, and life itself be unsafe. Such was the preaching of Noah, and it did not hinder the men of his generation from the schemes of building, planting, marrying and giving in marriage for which they lived. They had heard as though they heard not, until the flood came and took them all away, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be" (Matt. 24 : 39).

"THEY KNEW NOT"

Jesus had concluded His last public teaching in Jerusalem, and "as He went out of the temple, one of His disciples saith unto Him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here !" Oh how the natural heart of man seeks for some occasion to vaunt itself ! Oh how national pride, pride of family, pride of citizenship, pride of wealth, pride of talent, pride of beauty, pride of intellect, even pride of old age is manifest among men ! Any little straw of distinction is laid hold of as a ground for self-glorying, and so fearfully is man under the power of this instinct that, rather than have nothing to boast of, many will be heard boasting of the length of sin to which they have gone. Jesus knew the hearts of His disciples, and He took occasion to tell them that these were not lasting things, for not one stone should be left upon another that should not be thrown down. This announcement worked upon the minds of the disciples, and as He sat upon the Mount of Olives, some of His disciples asked Him privately, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of Thy coming and of the end of the world [or age]?" (Matt. 24 : 3).

Our Lord's answer begins with a caution, "Take heed lest any man deceive you," as though He would warn us that there would be much deception about His coming. But He does not for this reason say that we are not to think about it at all. He then proceeded to say what would be the characteristic signs of the dispensation. There should be many coming in His name, saying, I am Christ ; there should be wars, earthquakes, famines, troubles, and persecutions. But He does not speak of these as the sign of the end, only saying to His disciples, "When ye hear of wars and rumors of wars, for such things must needs be ; but the end shall not be yet." Every generation, since our Lord left this earth, has experienced these things, and God has brought good out of them ; except for these troubles men would have been even more ungodly than they have been ; fewer probably would have called upon the Lord if all had gone smoothly with them.

BE YE NOT TROUBLED :

In no single place in the New Testament are the followers of Jesus promised exemption from persecution. While there is an absolute promise of deliverance from sickness in James 5 : 14, we find that tribulation and persecution are to be the portion of the followers of Jesus ; and this as a testimony against their persecutors. Only an indwelling Christ can make us endure grief suffering wrongfully, can make us really love our enemies, and when we are smitten on the one cheek turn also the other ; and this spirit manifested in a child of God is such a testimony for Him, and against those who know Him not, that they cannot stand against it. The standard of Christianity is, thank God, rising in our day ; and in measure as there is more of God in us and in our work, persecution will revive, and more, much more will be accomplished by it than by any amount of preaching.

Jesus teaches

HOW WE ARE TO ACT

in times of persecution. "When they shall lead you and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak : neither do ye premeditate ; but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye ; for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost." What a glorious word with which to go before councils, kings, synagogues, civil and ecclesiastical powers ! God has bound Himself to be my Counsel for defence, God makes my cause His, I have nothing to fear. Let us take this grand assurance equally for the family, social and church persecution which all of us now meet with, when in expenditure, in appearance, and social status we seek the interests of God alone. There is no need to seek for arguments that we may convince our persecutors : the Holy Ghost can do that better than we can.

Family persecution is especially mentioned here. "The brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son ; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death." These things have already occurred in past times of persecution, but they will reappear in the final time of trouble which is approaching. Oh what need there is for Christian parents to look to it that their children are saved, and fully saved, from the world and the flesh as well as from sin. Our Lord gives us no comfort on the side of the world : "Ye shall be hated of all men for My sake, but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved."

Many a child of God expects this on the part of the world, but when he finds Christians misinterpreting him, judging him, maligning him, manifesting almost hatred toward him, when he himself has been totally unconscious of giving any cause for such persecution, he is ready to say, "Lord, stay Thy hand : this last stroke is too bitter." Alas, the persecution in the family of God is the most sad of all ; the brother in Christ rises up against his spiritual brother, and the father in Christ against his own spiritual child ; spiritual children will refuse to worship with those who led them to the Saviour, and this is the most common and most bitter of all persecutions in our day ; but "he that shall endure [or remain under] unto the end, the same shall be saved." Never to take the matter into our own hands, but always to commit it to God—this is His rule, and this is real power ; for whoever we oppose we meet as an equal, but we conquer the man from whose hands we meekly accept a treatment which he would not endure from us, because in his own heart he feels we are superior to him.

The first indication of the time when the end will come is given in verse 10 : "And the Gospel must first be preached among all nations." Can we look at the marvellous way in which nations are being opened to the Gospel, and the marvellous way in which it is being carried to all classes, without feeling that this sign of the end is being accomplished before our very eyes? Another striking sign is the move among the Jews. Jesus said, "There shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people" (the Jews). And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations ; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until be fulfilled (Luke 21 : 23, 24). What means this great move of the Jews, driven out by persecution from Russia, but that the times of the Gentiles are nearly at an end? The Lord says, "The days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be said, The Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt ; but, The Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north. . . . I will send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them" (Jer. 16 : 14-16). Is not Russia "the land of the north," and is not the fulfilment of this prophecy a sign that we have no time to lose, that the times of the Jews are at hand, and that the times of the Gentiles are nearly fulfilled?

But there is one sign not yet fulfilled, for which we may watch. "When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not [in the holy place] (Matt. 24 : 15), (let him that readeth understand), then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains. . . . For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be. And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved." On referring to the book of Daniel we find that the angel Gabriel is sent in answer to the prayer of Daniel to tell him, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy" (Dan. 9 : 24). He then went on to say that from the commandment (in the reign of Artaxerxes to restore and build Jerusalem) unto Messiah the Prince should be "seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." Had these been literal weeks, Messiah would have come in the space of seven years from the command to build Jerusalem. But taking the weeks as weeks of years, the time specified was just that which elapsed before the ministry of our Lord began, about 483 years.

One week of years still remains to be fulfilled : it appears as though no mention were made here of the Christian dispensation, because God is teaching Daniel only about the future of his own people. But in ver. 27 of the same chapter we find the last week of the seventy when "the prince that shall come," probably "the man of sin" (2 Thess. 2 : 3), shall confirm a covenant with many of Daniel's people (the covenant spoken of Dan. 11 : 22, 23, 28, 30, 32), "and in the midst of the weeks he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease (i.e., the Jewish sacrifices, which will probably soon be restored at Jerusalem in a rebuilt temple) and (margin) "upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolator." This, then, is the abomination of desolation, and it may be the very image of the beast mentioned in Rev. 13 : 14, 15.

Very blessedly the Lord adds that for the elect's sake He has shortened these days of great affliction. The time of their duration is repeatedly given in Scripture as three and a half years (Dan. 12 : 7 ; Rev. 11 : 2, 3 ; 12 : 6, 14 ; 13 : 5). Our next lesson will treat of this subject in its practical application to Christians.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Expedition with Sealed Orders Despatched by Sir Garnet Wolseley was not destined for Aboukir, as was supposed, but for Port Said, at the Mediterranean extremity of the Suez Canal, and distant one hundred and forty miles from Alexandria. The British forces immediately occupied the town and Ismailia, a central point on the canal. Sir Garnet Wolseley thus secures a base of operations from which it is expected he will march toward Cairo before attacking Arabi in force. This plan of operations is considered by European military authorities to be good strategy. The Germans, though critical and not ready usually to praise the military tactics of other nations, highly compliment England upon the completeness of her preparations and the excellence of the plan of the campaign. The British general ordered the canal closed against merchant vessels, a proceeding which is a violation of the treaty to which England was a party. M. de Lesseps, the constructor of the canal, formally protested against its being closed, but Sir Garnet Wolseley visited him and explained the action of the British in regard to the canal. He said everything would be over in a few days, but that the English must use the canal for the present. M. de Lesseps expressed himself as fully satisfied with General Wolseley's explanation, and said he regretted that there had been any misunderstanding on the subject.

An Engagement between the British Forces and those of Arabi took place on August 25th at Shaluf. The object of the advance was to protect the fresh-water canal, which supplies the troops with water. The British general, telegraphing an account of the battle which ensued, said: "I advanced this morning before daybreak, and after some skirmishing took possession of the dam which the enemy had constructed across the canal between the villages Magfar and Mahuta. During the operations two squadrons of the Household cavalry charged the enemy's broken infantry very gallantly. I soon found that the enemy were being largely reinforced from Tel-el-Kebir. I could see trains arriving. I thought it inconsistent with traditions of the Queen's army to retire before any number of Egyptian troops, and so decided to hold the ground until reinforcements arrived. All day long I have had an Egyptian force of 10,000 men, with ten guns, in my front and on my right flank." On the following day the British made a further advance, Arabi retiring before them. The affair was evidently little more than a skirmish, and Sir Garnet Wolseley has been ridiculed for sending so egotistical and vainglorious an account, especially as people have not forgotten that there is a very recent precedent for the English troops retiring before an enemy in Southern Africa.

An Effort on the Part of the Ladies of England to commence philanthropic work in Egypt has been checked by a telegram from the correspondent of the London Times. He said that he had heard that "some ladies in England propose starting for Egypt to relieve the native poor in Alexandria and elsewhere. It may prevent a useless mission if it is stated that such people do not exist. The natives here are of the lowest class, and are enriched with plunder. Respectable natives are not allowed to enter the city. When the difficulties are settled they will return to a quarter of the town quite uninjured, and the necessity of rebuilding the European quarter, with an increased demand for all sorts of labor, will considerably raise wages and probably place the natives in more flourishing circumstances than they have been for the last ten years."

Still Another Difficulty has Interposed to delay the departure of the Turkish troops to Egypt. The Sultan proposed that the proclamation relative to Arabi Pasha, instead of declaring him a rebel should summon him to submit to the Khédive. No answer was made to the proposal, but as to the other objections of the Sultan to the British terms, Lord Dufferin, the British ambassador, said that his government was prepared to waive the demand that any movement of the Turkish troops must be first approved by the British. Lord Dufferin, therefore, proposed that the English and Turkish commanders shall first deliberate together, and if the English general shall not approve the proposed operations the Turkish commander would still be at liberty to carry them out. Said Pasha, the Turkish minister, then urged that the landing of Turkish troops in Alexandria was indispensable for the future combined action of the two armies. He suggested that the Turks would make Alexandria, which the English would evacuate, their base of operations, while the British base should be Ismailia. To this Lord Dufferin objected, and firmly maintained that Turkish troops should only be allowed to disembark at Rosetta, Damietta or Aboukir, and categorically refused to permit their landing at Alexandria, Port Said or Suez. It is obvious that Turkey is indisposed to act cordially with the British, but is, nevertheless, unwilling to leave the settlement of Egyptian affairs wholly in British hands. It is generally believed that Russia and France are encouraging Turkey to resist the demands of England.

The Loss of the Eira, the Vessel on which Mr. Leigh Smith sailed on his voyage of Arctic discovery, has been attended with happier results than those of the Jeannette. The steamer Hope picked up Mr. Leigh Smith and his crew after they had been conveyed by a Dutch schooner from Nova Zembla. The Eira sailed from England on June 14th, 1881. Two months afterward, on August 21st, she was caught in the ice and so severely nipped that she sprang a leak and sank, the crew having barely time to save clothing or food. They made their way over the ice to Cape Flora, where with a sail they made a tent and lived on bear meat and walrus until June 21st, 1882, when the shipwrecked men made their way in four boats to Nova Zembla, a journey which, owing to the icebergs encountered, occupied forty-three days. The men suffered severe hardships, but escaped the sad fate of the majority of the Jeannette's crew.

A Missionary's Opinion of the Movement in Egypt incited and led by Arabi is especially valuable at the present time, when politicians and daily newspapers throughout the country, as well as a large part of the religious press, are representing Arabi as a patriot fighting for the liberties of his country, which England is said to be endeavoring to enslave. The Rev. Dr. Lansing, the chief superintendent of the American United Presbyterian Mission to Egypt, speaking at Liverpool the other day, said it would be impossible for any Europeans to live in safety in Egypt until the power of Arabi Pasha had been broken; and unless the spread of Mahomedan fanaticism was crushed, they would have it breaking out in Syria, India, Turkey, and the whole Mahomedan world.

A Revival in Turkey is Going on Among the Armenian Christians there. It may be called an extraordinary revival. Dr. Burns, an American missionary, writes: "Every morning at sunrise, a prayer meeting is held, and it is always full; at noon two meetings are held, one for women and the other for men, both in separate buildings. In the evening another prayer meeting is conducted by me, the great difficulty being to find time for all those who desire to pray. One night seven prayed after I stood up to close the meeting. These people are so poor that they cannot afford to lay down a wood floor, nor lay mats to cover the damp earth; they have, therefore, to sit on the bare ground. But the meetings are full of proof that Christ is present to bless."

A Frank Statement of the Difficulties to be encountered by England in her Egyptian enterprise is published in the London Record, a journal of the Episcopal Church. The Record says: "The coming storm is presaged by the present lull. Turkish intervention, if it does actually take place, will complicate matters to an extent hardly at present fully realized. It cannot be too often repeated that there is all but positive proof that Arabi has been from the first stimulated by Turkish intrigue, and inspired by influences from Constantinople. No love has ever been lost between the Suzerain and the Khédive of Egypt since the days of Mehemet Ali. To the Porte the Khédive is a nuisance. A Turkish army on the soil of Egypt now will be nothing short of a thorn in the side of England. It cannot be left unwatched in the rear of our advance. Yet it cannot be relied upon as an assistance to our forces if it is permitted to go to the front. Its leaders will be in constant communication with Arabi, and will have no scruples at all in keeping him informed of all our plans and movements. The commandant of our expeditionary force will need to be a diplomatist even more than a general. Of wearisome delay, of frivolous pretexts for obstruction, of foul play whenever it can be practised without the certainty of detection, he is certain to have his fill. The enterprise which we have undertaken may be, and probably is, a political necessity. But it is an enterprise in which little honor can be gained and in which England has much to lose."

A Letter of Condolence has been Sent by Queen Victoria to the widow of the warrant officer Shannon, who was killed at the bombardment of Alexandria. It seems Mr. Shannon leaves a widow and seven children, whose only means of support is the dead officer's pension, worth $175 a year. It was very kind of the Queen to sympathize with the widow, but if the penurious old lady had sent the widow a few bank-notes to buy bread with, it would have done more good than a royal letter.

America it Appears does not hold a Monopoly in bogus work. Some amusement has been caused in London by a discovery in connection with the ridiculous edifice set up between Fleet Street and the Strand, to mark the site of the old Temple Bar. It was erected in November, 1880, and unveiled with great pomp by the youngest son of Queen Victoria. The base of the monument was ornamented with bronze relief. It was found that the bronze reliefs were only clay, to the great amusement of the boys, who carried away the heads of the figures. The mutilated friezes were replaced by granite tablets, which now turn out to be wood. The boys are waiting to discover what will be the next material employed. It may be hoped that the contractors for the Brooklyn Bridge, who must by this time have nearly exhausted their store of peculiar devices, will not hear of this remarkable affair.

Four Colored Missionaries have Sailed from England for Central Africa. They were sent out by Mr. and Mrs. Grattan Guinness, whose portraits appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 19th, 1882. They were trained in the Missionary Institute in the East of London, where many other colored students are now being educated. This new departure has been suggested by the serious loss of life which has happened among the white missionaries Mr. and Mrs. Guinness have sent to Central Africa.

Mr. George Muller, of the Bristol Orphanages, whose projected visit to this country was anticipated with pleasure by his many friends, has been prostrated by illness. His health has been the cause of considerable anxiety to his friends for some time previous to this attack. He is now somewhat better, but for the present he has been compelled to abandon his intended visit to America.

I. R. H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT and SIR A. ALISON.—Embarkation of British Troops for Egypt.

H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT.

Born in 1850—Military Training—Visit to Canada in 1869—Reception by Mohawk Indians—Parliamentary Grant of $125,000 a Year—Fall Through a Window in 1871—His Public Services—Marriage to Princess Louisa of Prussia, in 1879.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ARTHUR WILLIAM PATRICK ALBERT, DUKE OF CONNAUGHT, who has gone to Alexandria, Egypt, in command of the Guards' Brigade, was born at Buckingham Palace, May 1st, 1850, and is the third son of Queen Victoria. He was named Arthur, after the great Duke of Wellington, and the Irish name of Patrick was given to him in compliment to Ireland, which it may be hoped the Irish people appreciated, though it appears the cheap honor was not sufficient to purchase their loyalty. The young Prince during his earlier years was under the care of private tutors, but in his sixteenth year he entered as a cadet at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.

He had been about two years in the Academy when his abilities are supposed to have been publicly tested. On the day fixed for the distribution of prizes to the cadets, the Duke of Cambridge went down to Woolwich to inspect the companies. Prince Arthur led in the march past, and was afterward called to the front to drill the cadets, and to put them through a few battalion movements, in order to test his knowledge in this direction. He did this most satisfactorily, and at the close was presented with his commission as an officer of the Royal Engineers. By way of completing this period of his military history it may be added that in 1869 he became a lieutenant in the Royal Artillery, and in the same year received a similar appointment in the Rifle Brigade.

In 1869, the English public became far more interested in the visit of the Prince to Canada, and in the enthusiastic welcome there accorded him, than in any detail of his life, which had previously been made known. While as the Queen's son he had every reason to be gratified with the attention paid him by the Canadians, they, on the other hand, were quite as well pleased with the heartiness with which he entered into all their schemes for his entertainment. The Prince himself said that in consequence of the glowing descriptions he had received from his brother, the Prince of Wales, who visited that country in 1863, of the loyal feeling in Canada toward the Royal Family of England, he had been led to expect much, but the welcome given him had far exceeded his expectations.

HIS RECEPTION BY MOHAWK INDIANS.

One incident connected with the Prince's visit to Canada is too interesting to be passed over—his visit to a Mohawk village. This village was situated near Brantford. On reaching the Mohawk church the party was received by two chiefs. A large number of warriors in full fighting costume, gorgeous in paint and feathers, had assembled, and with them their squaws. A good deal of time was consumed in handshaking with the squaws, but after a while the party entered the church, and were shown the communion service presented to the Indians by Queen Anne. An aged chief of the Six Nations, addressing Prince Arthur in the Mohawk language, said: "We are glad to meet you in this holy house. We hasten to wipe the dust off your forehead. We hope that prosperity may attend you. We remember your mother, whom we all love. Your Royal Highness desires to be a member of our tribe, and we are pleased to go through the ceremony of making you an Indian chief. You will always be remembered by us. May you be like the great sun which shines over all, and may your path in future be as bright!"

GRANT OF $75,000 A YEAR.

On attaining his majority in 1871, Parliament voted him an annuity worth $75,000 per annum. Mr. Gladstone, in moving the resolution in the House of Commons, took occasion to remark that this arrangement was apt to be misunderstood, and might give rise to unjust comments being passed upon the Royal Family.

In justification of its necessity he said, "No doubt that amount is a large sum to grant; but is it large relatively to the former precedents, relatively to the justice of the case, and to the standard of income in England? There are in this country numbers of persons possessed not only of that but of a much larger income, among whom royal persons are to move, but above whom they ought somewhat to tower. Let it be recollected here, that just as the Queen's income is much less her own than a corresponding one of a given amount in the hands of a private person, so the incomes of royal persons are much less their own, no inconsiderable portion of their incomes being absolutely preappropriated and anticipated by public claims upon them."

He might, however, have said that Queen Victoria receives an enormous sum every year in consideration of her performing certain duties which she does not perform, and that she hoards the money she receives instead of spending it for the purposes contemplated. She also expects the people to support her children. The vote, however, was passed in due course. Subsequently, in 1879, a further grant worth $50,000 a year was made to him on the occasion of his marriage, raising the income he receives from the British taxpayers to $125,000 a year, besides which he draws a liberal salary for each of the offices he holds. His brothers and sisters are also supported by the people, the entire family, excluding the Queen, costs the people $550,000 a year, besides the amounts paid down on the occasion of their marriage and beside the sums they receive as salary.

HIS FALL THROUGH A WINDOW.

It was during this year, in May, 1871, that a somewhat extraordinary and very painful accident occurred to Prince Arthur. Just before a State Ball at Buckingham Palace he was leaning against the window of the billiard-room, which had been left unfastened; the window suddenly gave way, and the Prince fell through it to the pavement below. When it is remembered that the distance was about eight feet, it will be evident that the consequences of such a fall might have been dangerous. He happened to fall in such a manner, however, that though the back of his head was badly bruised and slightly wounded, the force of the fall was distributed along the whole length of his body, and though the shock was necessarily very great, no other specific injury except that to his head occurred, and in an effort to save himself the great toe of one foot was dislocated. Although the dislocation was treated with the best surgical skill, he still at times feels its effects.

HIS PUBLIC SERVICES

Prince Arthur has been exceptionally active in discharge of public duties when his services have been sought. In 1872, for example, he performing the not very fatiguing ceremony of cutting the first turf of the railway at Hythe. The story goes that, according to custom, a silver spade was handed to him wherewith to cut the first sod. The Prince is said to have plied it so clumsily that the oaken handle broke; but this did not in the least disconcert him, for, using the blade alone, he performed the ceremony in a rather peculiar fashion.

In 1874 the Prince was created Duke of Connaught and Strathearn and Earl of Sussex, and took his seat in the House of Lords, on June 8th, to assist in passing laws for the kingdom. It is simple justice to mention the praises which his mother's loyal subjects have lavished on him both in Canada and in Ireland. He has received, even from so excellent a judge as Lord Napier of Magdala, the high commendation of showing a steady determination to make himself in all points a thoroughly efficient soldier.

His staff services are: Brigade-Major at Aldershot in 1873, Brigade-Major to the Cavalry-Brigade at the same quarters in 1875, in the October of which year he was appointed Assistant-Adjutant-General at Gibraltar, which post he held until April, 1876. In 1880 he was made a General of Brigade at Aldershot. The salary attached to that post is $10,375 per annum. Besides holding other appointments, the Duke is Colonel-in-Chief of the Royal Rifle Corps, and personal Aide-de-Camp to the Queen. His Royal Highness has never before taken part in active service, and he has now gone to Egypt in command of the Guards' Brigade in the First Division. It will be remembered that the Duke of Cambridge commanded the Guards in the Crimean War. He is the Queen's cousin, and he receives a pension worth $60,000 a year and a salary of $30,000 a year more as Commander-in-Chief, besides holding other offices all liberally paid.

On March 18th, 1879, His Royal Highness was married to the Princess Louisa Margaretha of Prussia, in the St. George's Chapel, Windsor. It was a scene of imposing and memorable splendor.

It is understood that the Duke of Connaught expressed a wish to go to Egypt with the army. It may be hoped that the soldiers will take better care of him than they did of that other royal youth, Prince Napoleon, or their chances of promotion will be small.

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, BART., K.C.B.
Parentage—Birth in 1826—University Education—Enters the Army—Loses an Arm in the Indian Mutiny—Succeeds to a Baronetcy.

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, BART., K.C.B., who has been appointed to the command of the 3d Brigade of British troops in Egypt, is the son of Sir Archibald Alison, the first baronet, the world-renowned author of the "History of Europe," a most voluminous production, which, among other events, chronicles the various wars and revolutions in Egypt from 1790 to the present time.

He was born at Edinburgh, on January 21, 1826, and is therefore now fifty-six years of age. His education was received in the famous Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, in both of which his unusual talents and studious industry were rewarded by the unstinted commendation of his tutors, the admiration of his fellow-students, and high academical honors; and the opinion was universal that if he had determined to court the Muses or devote himself to literature, he would have taken a prominent rank, and proved himself to be "a worthy son of a noble sire."

APPOINTMENTS AND SERVICES.

But entering the military service of his country in the year 1846, he passed rapidly through the various initial grades, and in 1853, was appointed a Captain in the 72d Highlanders. His promotion was rapid. In 1856 he was created Brevet Major; Lieutenant Colonel in 1858; and Colonel in 1867. He served with his regiment throughout the agitating period of the Crimean War, and was present at the prolonged siege and ultimate fall of Sebastopol.

When the Indian Mutiny broke out, he was appointed Military Secretary on the Staff of the late Lord Clyde. At the relief of Lucknow, Sir Archibald had the misfortune to lose an arm, which was carried away by one of the balls of the mutinous Sepoys. In the Ashantee Expedition of 1873-4, he was nominated second in command and Brigadier-General of the European Brigade on the Gold Coast. His bravery commanded universal praise, and resulted in significant and valuable services. He commanded his men in person at the battle of Amoafu, he seemed not only fearless but invulnerable at the costly capture of Bequah, he largely determined by his calm courage the decisive action of Ordashu, and materially contributed to the fall of Coomassie and the humiliation of the inhuman King Coffee.

On the death of his father in 1867, he succeeded to the baronetcy, and was Deputy-Adjutant-General in Ireland from October 1874 to 1877, when he was promoted to the rank of Major-General, and for some time past has been Chief of the Intelligence Department at the War Office.

EMBARKATION OF THE SCOTS GUARDS AT ALBERT DOCKS, LONDON, FOR EGYPT.

THE departure of the first battalion of the Brigade of Guards, which is represented in the lower portion of our frontispiece, to take part in the Anglo-Egyptian Expedition, was, on the morning of July 30th, made the occasion of a popular demonstration. The troops fell in on parade at seven o'clock in their white undress serge jackets, but with white Indian helmets and pugreese, instead of the bearskins. They were in heavy marching order, with valises, greatcoats, rifles, and full pouches, each man carrying, besides, a white canvas bag with clothing for use on ship board. They numbered in all 700 rank and file, 30 officers, 46 sergeants, and 21 drummers and pipers. The men were in a state of some excitement at the prospect of foreign service. Being formed into square, the commanding officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Knox, read the following letter from Sir A. F. Ponsonby:

"The Queen regrets that she is unable to be present at the embarkation of the 1st Battalion of the Scots Guards to-morrow. Her Majesty knows that the Scots Guards will do their duty as gallantly as they have always hitherto done, and commands me to convey to you her best wishes for their welfare."

To this, he said, he had replied as follows:

"Will you kindly inform Her Majesty that the 1st Battalion of Scots Guards are deeply grateful for the interest which she has taken in their welfare, and that they hope in any position to do their duty as Queen's Guards should."

Colonel Moncrieff, who was present to witness the departure of the 1st Battalion, then took the opportunity, in brief soldierly phrase, to wish them God-speed, which Major-General Higginson emphasized by a gesture of adieu. As the men were wheeled into column the massed bands of the Coldstreams and Scots Guards marched up and led them off to the effective march of "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," and as the column defiled from the Wellington Barracks into Birdcage Walk, the troops passed through a throng of friends and admiring spectators, the whole mass moving together in the direction of Westminster Bridge. The troops soon embarked in the three steamers, the "Albert Victor," the "Vesta," and the "Osprey." As the boats moved off from the pier the crowds on the bridge and along the Embankment raised a succession of cheers, which were heartily reciprocated by the soldiers.

When London Bridge was passed, the crews of the vessels in the Pool and the denizens of the warehouses and stores along both banks took up the duty of wishing them God-speed. The run down the river was a perfect ovation, and kept the men fully employed until the entrance of the Royal Albert Dock was reached shortly after ten A.M.

The lock gates were promptly opened, and the three steamers were admitted, and "locked up" to the level of the basin where the "Orient" was lying alongside the quay. The noble vessel herself and other transports near her were decked with bunting, and there was a considerable crowd of spectators outside the dock premises gazing wistfully from the distance; but no one except those on business was allowed near the point of embarkation, and as a consequence the work of getting the men on board after they had landed from the river boats and formed up on the quay was carried out with a rapidity and precision that left nothing to be desired.

The "Orient" is one of the finest of the fine ships owned by the firm from which she takes her name, being over 450 feet long, of a gross internal cubical measurement exceeding 5000 tons, and driven by engines of 1000 horse power.

As soon as a tug had hold of the stern of the "Orient," the immense ship floated away from the quayside. Cheer after cheer broke from her crowded decks, and every full-hearted shout was returned in a broadside by the crowds who lined the sides of the dock. The land cheers, however, took a deeper note when it was presently understood that the little steamer yonder, the "Firefly," crowded with ladies and gentlemen, had the Duke of Connaught aboard. His Royal Highness was accompanied by his wife, the Duchess of Connaught, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Mr. Childers, and Sir John Adye. In a very short time the Duke stood upon the decks of the "Orient;" and, with cheer after cheer breaking from her sides, the noontide sun full upon her, and giving a clear brilliance to the uniforms, and her sparkling scuttles flashing lines of light into the water under her, the great ship glided into the river and started on her voyage to her destination in the East.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE following incident is taken from a letter sent in February last to Miss Carrie F. Judd from a lady in Brooklyn, N. Y.: I have been an invalid for many years and have tried various ways and means for a cure, but without avail. At last, I was given up by the best physicians as incurable, and when all earthly means failed, then the Lord took me up, and He has made me every whit whole.

In September, 1879, I first began to look to God for the healing of my body, and from that time I improved, but very slowly. In January, 1880, I went to see Miss M. H. Mossman, and she prayed with me. I tried to claim the promise (Jas. v. 14, 15), but my faith was very weak and I lost courage after a few days. Still I kept looking to Jesus for a cure, and it was shown me that it was not altogether my body that wanted healing, but my soul. I wanted to be altogether the Lord's.

I had been a professing Christian for a number of years, but had got into a lukewarm state. I can now say that "I sought the Lord and He heard me and delivered me from all my fears." On April 27, 1880, He healed me of one of my most aggravated troubles, and it was done instantaneously, and two days after He gave me the assurance that He did accept me, and that I was altogether His, soul, body and spirit.

But still I was suffering in body, for I had a complication of diseases; I procured Dr. Cullis' book on faith-healing, and wrote to Mrs. Mix, and also to you, requesting prayers. It was so hard for me to claim the promises for myself that it seemed as though I never should be healed. Finally I was taken very sick with congestion of the brain and stomach, and I thought that would be my last sickness, but the dear Lord willed otherwise. As soon as I was able to travel He made the way clear for me to go to Ocean Grove. I went to the Faith Home, and the dear sisters prayed for me. The Lord heard and answered prayer, and I am now rejoicing. He does make me every whit whole, soul and body. Bless His holy Name forever. I willingly give this testimony, hoping it will encourage some poor suffering one.

A LADY CURED OF DYSENTERY.

Mrs. C. S. Whitney, a Christian worker in New York, writes to the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: I was taken sick with dysentery on Thursday night August 3d, after preaching in the tent on Broadway and Fifty-fifth Street, and was so prostrated that it was with great difficulty I reached home. I could not afterward sit up five minutes without fainting. My mind was impressed with this word from the Lord: "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God" (John 11:4).

On Sunday, as my family became much alarmed; the word was given, "Call for the elders of the church," (James 5: 14, 15). Rev. A. B. S., came, and at 7 P.M., offered prayer, anointing with oil in the name of the Lord, and immediately I was healed. I arose, dressed myself, and went about my usual domestic duties. I was called to Ocean Grove on Monday, and the trip was made and the Gospel work resumed in the tent, with no discomfort whatever. To God be all the glory!

D. A. Norton, city missionary, writing from Chicago to Miss Carrie F. Judd, editor of the monthly magazine Triumphs of Faith, incloses the following letter from in the Hospital, Missouri Penitentiary. Through the efforts of some Christian ladies, I was persuaded to seek relief from my suffering, having used opium, in the form of morphine, for three years. I was shut off from the drug and was suffering, oh, so terribly! The great trouble with me was unbelief; but one Sabbath morning, not long ago, I was suffering more than common. I became completely out of heart. I went into my cell and fell down upon my knees, and these were my very words, for I felt a power upon me: "O, Lord, have mercy upon me. Forgive my sins. O God, ease me of my pain, and help me to conquer the great adversary in the shape of a drug which is killing both soul and body. Do this in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ!"

As I uttered the words underscored, the tears rolled down my cheeks, as I believed, and, lo, it was done! And then in my cell I rejoiced that not only my body was healed, but, glory to God, my sins were forgiven! And when I get out I shall tell the glad news to all the world.

A TWELVE YEARS' INVALID

writing from Sandwich, Ill., on July 18th, 1882, says: For twelve years I have been an invalid, helpless at times, then would gain for a short time, only to be brought to my back again. I suffered constantly and would have been glad to have gone home, but the dear Lord knew best and gave me strength to bear it all.

Last summer I was much worse than usual; I went to Kansas to live, and the climate did not agree with me, so as soon as I was able to be moved, my husband brought me home, carrying me in his arms. At that time I was able to sit up long enough to eat my meals, but could not stand alone, nor did I seem to gain any strength. The prayer cure had been brought to my notice at different times, but I could never accept the promises as my own until two years ago Miss M. D. Hand, of the "Bible Reading and Prayer Alliance," wrote to me about it. I then made up my mind I could be cured if I would only have faith, and I was helped; I had not been so well for years, but my going to Kansas brought me down again.

Last year my husband became a Christian, and he wanted me to pray for health, said he knew I could be entirely cured if we would only have faith. So much faith in a new convert shamed me, and I commenced studying the Word for help.

The cure of Peter's mother-in-law made a great impression on my mind; it says she arose and ministered unto Jesus, and I wondered if I could do that. I prayed over it a good deal, but it was several days before I could say, "I will minister unto Him, with His strength and guidance." I then began to improve, and gained rapidly, so that people that knew my condition wondered what made me take such a start.

Many times I have failed and lost faith, but I found when I trusted "Jesus only" and did not go in my own strength, then I could walk and work, but when I trusted in myself I failed every time. I have attended church three or four times, but did not walk, as it is quite a distance from our house; expect to walk it soon; can go all around to the neighbors and do a great deal of work.

HEALED IN BODY AND SOUL.

F. J. Duggan, writing from Newark, N. J., on August, 1882, says: You know that after trying almost every doctor and medicine without any good effect for my head and eyes, I was led through the reading of your little book to look to the Lord Jesus, and was made every whit whole. And not only my head and eyes, but my soul and spirit, and I have obtained such a peace as I never had before. To Him be all the glory forever!

I would like to say we can trust Him not only for a perfect salvation, and for a perfect healing, but also for every trouble in our everyday life. If we in perfect faith cast our burden on the Lord, leaving it with Him; not taking it back again; if we do this He will surely bear it all for us. I pray that God may so help me to write this that it may prove a blessing to some dear one, and to the honor and glory of the Master's dear name.

The Work Among the Railroad Employees of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company is still making hopeful progress under the charge of Miss Jennie Smith. Mr. George A. Hilton, who has assisted in the work from the commencement, in the course of a letter describing the movement summarizes the results of four months' labor. He states that during that period as the result of God's blessing on the various services, "there rejoiced in the conscious knowledge of pardoned sin, and acceptance by a reconciled God: In Martinsburg 275 precious souls; in Keyser 200; in Piedmont 165; in Cumberland 230; in Grafton 225, and thousands have been brought under conviction of sin through the exhortation and prayers of those who, waiting for no special endowment or the laying on of hands, trusted in the Holy Spirit to do His own work."

THE POPULAR CHRIST.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
September 3, 1882.*

"Unto him shall the gathering of the people be."
—GENESIS 49: 10.

Jacob's Prophescope — Discovery of Christ's Death-Warrant — Caricatures on the Walls — The Most Popular Name on Earth — The Gathering of the People — I. For Pardon — Records Obliterated by the Blood — Half and Half Sinners Easily Pardonable — The Pardonable Sinners of the Bible — II. For Sympathy — Grief for those who never Come Home — The Mother's Welcome to the Wanderer — The Sunken Continent of Atlantis — The Inventions Seized for Christ — Instantaneous Communication of Creed Universal — The Final Triumph.

THROUGH a supernatural lens, or what I might call a prophescope, dying Jacob looks down through the corridor of the centuries until he sees Christ the centre of all popular attraction and the greatest Being in all the world, so everywhere acknowledged. It was not always so. The world tried hard to put Him down and to put Him out. In the year 1200, while excavating for antiquities fifty-three miles northeast of Rome, a copper plate tablet was found containing of the Lord Jesus Christ, reading in this wise: "In the year 17 of the Empire of Tiberius Cæsar, and on the 25th of March, I, Pontius Pilate, Governor of the Praetore, condemn Jesus of Nazareth to die on the cross between two thieves, Quintus Cornelius to lead him forth to the place of execution." That death warrant was signed by several names. First, by Daniel, rabbi pharisee; secondly, by Johannes, rabbi; thirdly, by Raphael; fourthly, by Capet, a private citizen. This capital punishment was executed according to law. The name of the thief crucified on the right hand side of Christ was Dismas; the name of the thief crucified on the left hand side of Christ was Gestes. Pontius Pilate describing the tragedy says the whole world lighted candles from noon until night. Thirty-three years of maltreatment. They ascribed His birth to bastardy, and His death to excruciation.

A wall of the city, built about those times, and recently exposed by archaeologists, shows a caricature of Jesus Christ, evidencing the contempt in which he was held by many in His day—that caricature on the wall representing a cross and a donkey nailed to it, and under it the inscription: "this is the Christ whom the people worship." But I rejoice that that day is gone by, and Christ is coming out from under the world's abuse.

The most popular name on earth to-day is the name of Christ. Where He had one friend Christ has a thousand friends. The scoffers have become the worshippers. Of the twenty most celebrated infidels in Great Britain in our day, sixteen have come back to Christ, trying to undo the blatant mischief of their lives—sixteen out of the twenty. Every man who writes a letter, or signs a document, wittingly or unwittingly honors Jesus Christ. We date everything as B.C. or as A.D. B.C., before Christ—A.D., anno domini, in the year of our Lord. All the ages of history on the pivot of the upright beam of the cross of the Son of God, B.C., A.D. I do not care what you call Him—whether conqueror, or King, or Morning Star, or Sun of Righteousness, or Balm of Gilead, or Lebanon Cedar, or Brother, or Friend, or take the name used in the verse from which I take my text, and call Him Shiloh, which means His Son, or the Tranquilizer, or the Peacemaker, Shiloh. I only want this morning to tell you that "unto Him shall be

THE GATHERING OF THE PEOPLE."

I. In the first place, the people are gathered around Christ

FOR PARDON.

No sensible man, or heathfully ambitious man, is satisfied with his past life. A fool may think he is all right. A sensible man knows he is not. I do not care who the thoughtful man is, the review of his lifetime behavior before God and man gives to him no especial satisfaction. "O!" he says, "there have been so many things I have done I ought not to have done, there have been so many things I have said I ought never to have said, there have been so many things I have written I ought never to have written, there have been so many things I have thought I ought never to have thought, I must somehow get things readjusted, I must somehow have the past reconstructed; there are days and months and years which cry out against me in horrible vociferation."

Ah! my brother, Christ adjusts the past by obliterating it. He does not erase the record of our misdoing with a dash of ink from a register's pen, but lifting his right hand crushed red at the palm, He puts it against His bleeding brow, and then against his pierced side, and with the crimson accumulation of all these wounds He rubs out the accusatory chapter, He blots out our iniquities. O! men anxious about the future, better be anxious about the past: I put it not at the end of my sermon, I put it at the front; mercy and pardon through Shiloh, the sin-pardoning Christ.

MERCY FOR YOU.

"O!" says some man, "I have for forty years been as bad as I could be, and is there any mercy for me?" Mercy for you. "O!" says some one here, "I had a grand ancestry, the holiest of fathers, and the tenderest of mothers, and for my perfidy there is no excuse; do you think there is any mercy for me?" Mercy for you. But says another man: "I fear I have committed what they call 'the unpardonable sin,' and the Bible says if a man commit that sin he is neither to be forgiven in this world nor the world to come; do you think there is any mercy for me?" The fact that you have any solicitude about the matter at all proves positively that you have not committed the unpardonable sin. Mercy for you. O! the grace of God which bringeth salvation. The grace of God!

Let us take the surveyor's chain and try to measure God's mercy through Jesus Christ. Let one surveyor take that chain and go to the north, and another surveyor take that chain and go to the south, and another surveyor take that chain and go to the east, and another surveyor take that chain and go to the west, and then make report of the square miles of that vast kingdom of God's mercy. Ah! you will have to wait to all eternity for the report of that measurement. It cannot be measured. Paul tried to climb the height of it and he went height over height, altitude above altitude, mountain above mountain, then sank down in discouragement and gave it up, for he saw Sierra Nevadas beyond and Matterhorn beyond, and waving his hand back to us in the plain he says: "past finding out—unsearchable, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence."

You notice that nearly all the sinners mentioned as pardoned in the Bible were great sinners. David, a great sinner. Paul a great sinner. Rahab, a great sinner. Magdalen, a great sinner. The prodigal son, a great sinner. The world easily understood how Christ could pardon a half and half sinner; but what the world wants to be persuaded of is that Christ will forgive the worst sinner, the hardest sinner, the oldest sinner, the most inexcusable sinner. To this sin-pardoning Shiloh let all the gathering of the people be.

II. But I remark again: The people will gather around Christ

AS A SYMPATHIZER.

O! we all want sympathy. I hear people talk as though they were independent of it. None of us could live without sympathy. At this season of the year we come home from our summer absence and perhaps we leave a portion of our family away until the cool weather is established, and how lonely the house seems until they all get home. But alas me! for those who never come home. Sometimes it seems as if it must be impossible. What, will the feet never again come over the threshold? Will they never again sit with us at the table? Will they never again kneel with us at family prayer? Shall we never again look into their sunny faces? Shall we never again on earth take counsel with them for our work? Alas me! who can stand under these griefs?

O! Christ, Thou canst do more for a bereft soul than any one else. It is He that stands beside us to tell of the resurrection. It is He that comes to bid peace. It is He that comes to tell us of future reunion. It is He that comes to us and breathes into us the spirit of submission until we can look up from the wreck and ruin of our brightest expectations and say, "Father, not my will, but Thine be done." O! yes, ye who are bereft, some of you have gone through the

DEEP WATERS OF TROUBLE

—ve anguish-bitten, come into this refuge. The roll of those who come for relief to Christ is larger and larger. Unto this Shiloh of omnipotent sympathy the gathering of the people shall be.

O! that Christ would stand by all these empty cradles and all these desolated homesteads and all these broken hearts, and persuade us it is well. The world cannot offer you any help at such a time. Suppose the world comes and offers you money. You would rather live on a crust in a cellar and have your departed loved ones with you than live in palatial surroundings and they away. Suppose the world offers you its honors to console you. What is the Presidency to Abraham Lincoln when little Willie lies dead in the White House? Perhaps the world comes and says: "Time will cure it all." Ah! there are griefs that have raged on for thirty years and are raging yet. And yet hundreds have been comforted, thousands have been comforted, millions have been comforted, and Christ has done the work. O! what you want is sympathy.

The world's heart of sympathy beats very irregularly. Plenty of sympathy when we do not want it, and often, when we are in appalling need of it, no sympathy. There are multitudes of people dying for sympathy. Sympathy in their work. Sympathy in their fatigues. Sympathy in their bereavements, sympathy in their financial losses, sympathy in their physical ailments, sympathy in their spiritual anxieties, sympathy in the time of declining years. Wide, deep, high, everlasting, almighty sympathy. We must have it, and Christ has it. Christ is it that is the cord with which He is going to draw all nations to Him.

At the story of punishment a man's eye flashes and his teeth set and his fist clenches and he prepares to do battle, even though it be against the heavens, but what heart so hard but it will succumb to the story of compassion. Even a man's sympathy is pleasant and helpful. When we have been in some hour of weakness to have a brawny man stand beside us and promise to see us through, what courage it gives to our heart and what strength it gives to our arm. Still mightier

A WOMAN'S SYMPATHY.

Let him tell the story, who when all his fortunes were gone and all the world was against him, came home and found in that home a wife who could write on the top of the empty flour barrel: "The Lord will provide," or write on the door of the empty wardrobe: "consider the lilies of the field; if God so clothe the grass of the field, will He not clothe us and ours?" Or let that young man tell the story who has gone the whole round of dissipation. The shadow of Blackwell's Island is upon him and even his father says: "Be off—never come home again." The young man finding still his mother's arm outreached for him, and how she will stand at the wicket of the prison to whisper consolation, or get down on her knees before the Governor begging for pardon, hoping on for her vagrant boy after all others are hopeless.

Or let her tell the story, who under villainous allurements and impatient of parental restraint has wandered off from a home of which she was the idol into the murky and thunderous midnight of abandonment, away from God, and further away until some time she is tossed on the beach of that early home a mere splinter of a wreck. Who will pity her now? who will gather those disheveled locks into her lap? Who will wash off the blood from the gashed forehead? Who will tell her of that Christ who came to save the lost? Who will put that weary head upon the clean white pillow and watch the day and watch the night until the hoarse voice of the sufferer becomes the whisper, and the whisper becomes only a faint motion of the lips, and the faint motion of the lips is exchanged for a silent look, and the cut feet are still, and the weary eyes are still, and the frenzied heart is still, and all is still? Who will have compassion on her when no others have compassion? Mother! Mother!

* Dr. Talmage returned last week from his vacation and preached in the Brooklyn Tabernacle to overflowing congregations on Sunday morning and evening. This sermon was the one he delivered in the morning. It was reported, as are all the sermons of Dr. Talmage published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by his own reporter, and revised previous to publication by Dr. Talmage.

O! there is something beautiful in sympathy, in many sympathy, wifely sympathy, motherly sympathy, yea, and neighborly sympathy. Why was it that our city was aroused with excitement last week when a little child was kidnapped from one of our streets? Why were whole columns of the newspapers filled with the story of a little child. It was because we are all one in sympathy, and every parent said: "How if it had been my Lizzie? how if it had been my Mary? how if it had been my Maud? how if it had been my child? how if there had been one unoccupied pillow in our trundle bed to-night? how if my little one, bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, were to-night carried captive into some den of vagabonds never to come back to me? how if it had been my sorrow looking out of the window, watching and waiting, that sorrow worse than death?" Then when they found her why did we declare the news all through the households, and everybody that knew how to pray said: "Thank God!" Because we are all one, bound by one great golden chain of sympathy.

O! yes, but I have to tell you this morning that if you will aggregate all neighborly, manly, wifely, motherly sympathy, it will be found only a poor starveling thing compared with the sympathy of our great Shiloh who has held in His lap the sorrows of the ages and who is ready to nurse on His holy heart the woes of all who will come to Him. O! what a God, what a Saviour we have.

THE SORROWS OF THE NATIONS.

But in larger vision see the nations in some kind of trouble ever since the world was derailed and hurled down the embankments. The demon of sin came to this world, but other demons have gone through other worlds. The demon of conflagration, the demon of volcanic disturbance, the demon of destruction. La Place says he saw one world in the northern hemisphere sixteen months burning. Tycho Brahe said he saw another world burning. A French astronomer says that in three hundred years fifteen hundred worlds have disappeared. I do not see why infidels find it so hard to believe that two worlds stopped in Joshua's time, when the astronomers tell us that fifteen hundred worlds have stopped. Even the moon is a world in ruins. Stellar, lunar, solar catastrophes innumerable.

But it seems as if the worst sorrows have been reserved for our world. By one toss of the world at Trinburo, of 12,000 inhabitants only twenty-six people escaped. By one shake of the world at Lisbon, in five minutes 60,000 perished and 200,000 before the earth stopped rocking. A mountain falls in Switzerland burying the village of Goldau. A mountain falls in Italy in the night when 2000 people are asleep and they never arouse. By a convulsion of the earth Japan broken off from China. By a convulsion of the earth the Caribbean islands broken off from America. Three islands near the mouth of the Ganges, with 340,000 inhabitants—a great surge of the sea breaks over them and 214,000 perish that day. Alas! alas, for our poor world.

THE SUNKEN ISLAND OF ATLANTIS.

It has been recently discovered that a whole continent has sunk, a continent that connected Europe and America—part of the inhabitants of that continent going to Europe, part coming to America over the table lands of Mexico, up through the valleys of the Mississippi, and we are finding now the remains of their mounds and cities in Mexico, in Colorado and the table lands of the west. It is a matter of demonstration that a whole continent has gone down, the Azores off the coast of Spain only the highest mountain of that sunken continent. Plato described that continent, its grandeur, the multitude of its inhabitants, its splendor and its awful destruction, and the world thought it was a romance; but archæologists have found out its history and the English and the German and the American fleets have gone forth with archæologists, and the Challenger and the Dolphin and the Gazelle have dropped anchor and in deep sea soundings they have found the contour of that sunken continent and given us a map of it. The Australian archipelago only the mountain tops of another sunken continent.

O! there is trouble marked on the rocks, on the sky, on the sea, on the flora, and the fauna. Astronomical trouble, geological trouble, oceanic trouble, political trouble, social trouble, domestic trouble, and standing in the presence of all those stupendous devastations, I ask if I am not right in saying that the great want of this age and all the ages is divine sympathy and omnipotent comfort; and they are found, not in the Brahma of the Hindoo, or the Allah of the Mahomedan, but in the Christ unto whom shall the gathering of the people be.

Other worlds may fall, but this morning star will never be blotted from the heavens. The earth may quake, but this Rock of Ages will never be shaken from its foundation. The same Christ who fed the five thousand will feed all the world's hunger. The same Christ who cured Bartimeus, will illumine all blindness. The same Christ who made the dumb speak will put on every tongue a hosanna. The same Christ who awoke Lazarus from the sarcophagus will yet rally all the pious dead in glorious resurrection. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and that "to Him shall the gathering of the people be."

Ah! my friends, when Christ starts thoroughly and quickly to lift this miserable wreck of a sunken world, it will not take Him long to lift it. I have thought that this particular age in which we live may be given up to discoveries and inventions by which through quick and all cities and all communities and all lands will be brought together, and then in another period perhaps these inventions which have now been used for worldly purposes will be brought out for Gospel invitation, and some great prophet of the Lord will come and snatch the mysterious, sublime, and miraculous telephone from the hand of commerce, and all lands and kingdoms connected by a wondrous wire, this prophet of the Lord may through telephonic communication in an instant announce to all nations pardon and sympathy and life through Jesus Christ; and then putting the wondrous tube to the ear of the Lord's prophet, the response shall come back, "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth, and in Jesus Christ His only begotten Son."

You and I may not live to see the day. I think those of us who are over forty years of age can hardly expect to see the day. I expect before that time our bodies will be sound asleep in the hammocks of the old Gospel ship as it goes sailing on. But Christ will wake us up in time to see the achievement. We who have sweated in the hot harvest field will be at the door of the garden when the sheaves come in. That work for which in this world we toiled and wept and struggled and wore ourselves out, shall not come to consummation and we be oblivious of the achievement. We will be allowed to come out and shake hands with the victors. We who toiled in the earlier battles will have just as much right to rejoice as those who red-dened their feet in the last Armageddon. Ah! yes, those who could only give a cupful of cold water in the name of a disciple, those who could only scrape a handful of lint for a wounded soldier, those who could only administer to old age in its decrepitude, those who could only coax a poor waif of the street to go back home to her God, those who could only lift a little child in the arms of Christ, will have as much right to take part in the ovation to the Lord Jesus Christ as Chrysostom.

It will be

YOUR VICTORY AND MINE

as well as Christ's. He the conqueror, we shouting in His train. Christ the Victor will pick out the humblest of His disciples in the crowd, and turning half around on the white horse of victory He shall point her out for approval by the multitude as He says: "She did what she could." Then putting His hand on the head of some man who by his industry made one talent do the work of ten He will say "Thou hast been faithful over a few things—I will make thee ruler over ten cities." Two different theories about the fulfilment of this promise.

There are people here to-day, who think Christ will come in person and sit on a throne. Perhaps He may. I should like to see the scarred feet going up the stairs of a palace in which all the glories of the Alhambra and St. Marks and the Winter Palace are gathered. I should like to see the world pay Christ in love for what it did to Him in maltreatment. I should like to be one of the grooms of the chargers, holding the stirrup as the King mounts. O! what a glorious time it would be on earth if Christ would break through the heavens and right here where He has suffered and died have this prophecy fulfilled. "Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be."

But failing in that I bargain to meet you at the ponderous gate of heaven on the day when our Lord comes back. Garlands of all nations on His brow—of the bronzed nations of the south and the pallid nations of the north—Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, and the other continents that may arise meantime from the sea to take the places of their sunken predecessors. Arch of Trajan, Arch of Titus, Arch of Triumph in the Champs Elysées all too poor to welcome this King of kings, and Lord of lords, and Conqueror of conquerors in His august arrival.

Turn out all heaven to meet Him. Hang all along the route the flags of earthly dominion, whether decorated with crescent, or star, or eagle, or lion, or coronet. Hang out heaven's brightest banner, with its one star of Bethlehem and blood striped of the cross. I hear the procession now. Hark! the tramp of the feet, the rumbling of the wheels, the shouts of the riders. Ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands. Put up in heaven's library right beside the completed volume of the world's ruin, the completed volume of Shiloh's triumph. The old promise struggling through the ages fulfilled at last, "Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be."

"While everlasting ages roll,
Eternal love shall feast their soul,
And scenes of bliss forever new Rise in succession to their view."

An Important Conference was Held in London on August 2d. It was summoned by Mr. Booth, the chief of the Salvation Army, to give an opportunity to those who have criticized the methods of the Army to attend and receive explanations. Among the speakers was Mr. F. A. Bevan, who alluded to some of the Salvation Army posters, on which appeared announcements the irreverence of which shocked Christian men. He also dwelt on the preaching of entire sanctification, and said, boys and girls say they have been converted for two or three weeks, and have not sinned all that time. I feel myself that everything I do is defiled with sin. We have been and seen the Army, and we won't let one of our children go near them. You have children setting at nought their parents, and saying they do not care, and that they can go to the captains and cadets of the Salvation Army. I cannot find anything in the Word of God to justify them calling themselves "Generals" and "Captains." If it was the simple preaching of Christ crucified, we should only be too glad, and I would go with them. In one of the suburbs of London they had interfered with the regular worship of the place. The friends of a poor woman who was very ill besought them to go away and not make a noise; but the only reply was a smile. They had stopped the real work of God by ordinary means through these tremendous noises. Mr. T. A. Denny, who replied for the Army, said, Mr. Bevan has spoken manfully, and many people think as he does. The best way to judge of this Army is to go and look at it. I often wonder if people in high places in England know the depth of infamy and vice to which people have sunk. These people were reached by the Salvation Army.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Lunatic and the Officer.—At the Noon-day meeting on August 3d, Mr. Sloan said: "A friend of mine, an officer in the army, was walking along a quiet street one day when a man approached and put his hands upon my friend's shoulders, saying, 'Man, have you ever thanked God for your reason?' The officer tried to get away, but again the same question was put to him, and in a more imperative way. 'No; I have not,' he at length replied. 'Then go down upon your knees at once and do it; I have lost mine!' Then the poor lunatic and my friend kneeled down and thanked God for the reason one of them still had. This prayer was the means of the officer's conversion to Christ, and he has been successfully working for many years in the Lord's service."

A Suicide Stopped.—Mr. Lakin said: "I lately heard of an interesting case of a young man who had the previous day been dismissed from his employment, owing to his bad conduct, combined with some previous things in his life which his employer had found out. His wife was away at the sea-side, and he was so depressed on Sunday that he wrote a letter stating he intended to kill himself and who and what he was, so that when his body was found there might be no uncertainty as to his identity. In the evening, as he was passing the Gospel tent, on his way to the river, to kill himself, he was attracted by the singing, and went inside. One of the brethren spoke to him, and after a little came and asked me to shake hands with the man, as he was now rejoicing in a crucified Saviour. Last Sunday he was in Morrison Street Hall, his face beaming with joy."

A Lunatic Railway Signalman.—Mr. Johnstone said: "There was a man in a lunatic asylum in America, whose constant cry was, 'Oh, if I only had!' The explanation was that he used to be a pointsman on the railway, and had charge of the raising and lowering a bridge. One day a friend asked him to turn the bridge to let him pass, and thus save a few minutes of his time. Although the express train was signalled, and it might be there in a few minutes, he risked it and turned the bridge, and at the same moment the train dashed into the gulf, and among many deaths and injuries this man lost his reason. And will not this be the burden of the cry of those who die impenitent and unregenerate? In memory of a despised Gospel, a rejected Saviour, and means of grace gone by forever, will they not exclaim, in unspeakable bitterness of soul, 'Oh, if I only had!'"

Visit to a Condemned Murderer.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting, at Cowcaddens, on August 2d, Rev. Mr. McDougall said: "I once went into a prison to visit a young man who was condemned to die for murdering another man. The turnkey took me along the bare passages, which seemed to strike a chill through me as I walked along. At last I was shown into the condemned cell. There lay the murderer on a bare form with a ball of iron, and chains on his legs. I bent over him and asked, 'Did you ever expect that you would take a knife, and plunge it into another man's side?' Looking up he groaned out, 'No, sir; I never did; the thought would have horrified me; but it was the drink that made me a murderer.' If that man had been a total abstainer, it was not probable that he would have been lying in prison waiting for an ignominious execution. May God deliver us from this, and from all the fatal seductions of the devil."

Dying Jeanie and Her Mother.—One Sunday lately a man came to the Gospel Temperance meeting in Cowcaddens very much agitated, and asked that an experienced worker might go with him to see his dying daughter, as the "wee ane" longed to see some one before she died. At half-past eight at night one of the lady-workers accompanied the man to his home, and on reaching the place she was led through a little shop into a small back room, and there saw a woman and a young girl lying on the bed beside the door. Going to the bedside the lady spoke to the girl, who, although she heard and understood all that was said, could only reply in very faint whispers. Opening her Bible, the visitor read slowly and clearly the tenth chapter of John, and pointed out in a few words the only hope of our salvation. As the lady rose to go Jeanie whispered, "Be sure and come back," and when a promise was given to be there next day, God willing, the thin, pale face lighted up with pleasure. The woman who was lying beside Jeanie was the lassie's mother, and had been helplessly ill for six weeks. The husband and father was just out of the infirmary, and only able to earn enough to buy food for them. On the following Wednesday Jeanie was "gathered home" from the mother's side to the arms of the dear Saviour, whom for some time she most cordially loved, and whom she had hoped to be able to glorify by earthly service.

On the Look Out for a Prisoner.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting, August 4th, Mr. R. Hunter Craig said: "I was lately much cheered by the earnest, eager spirit shown by a man whom I asked to go to Greenock, for the purpose of bearing testimony to the preserving grace of God, at Mr. Moody's meeting there. He replied, 'I fear that I can't go.' 'Why not?' I asked. 'Because I can't get back to-night,' he answered. 'I have to meet a man at the Duke Street Prison door early to-morrow morning. He has just finished his time, and I want to get at him before his chums are round him again.' This is the sort of work the 'Mizpah Band' is doing. We made inquiry into the case of the discharged prisoner, and found that he had been punished for beating his mother, and learned that he had been drinking heavily at the time and was not conscious of acting so brutally toward her. When he discovered it his grief was bitter. Tearing his hair he declared that death would be better for him than anything else. This man has signed the pledge and given his heart to Christ, and is now living a steady, exemplary life, trying to win others from the hurtful influences of intemperance."

A Scotch Lad's Proofs.—Mr. Simpson said, at the same meeting: "A gentleman lately had a parcel to take to the train one afternoon, and as he was leaving his counting-house, he saw a ragged barefooted boy, and asked him if he wanted to earn a penny or two. The lad eagerly agreed, and carried the parcel to the station, where they had ten minutes to wait for the train. The gentleman was a Christian and took the boy into the carriage to have some conversation with him. 'Do you go to Sabbath school, my boy?' he inquired. 'Na, sir, I dinna; but a'm converted, though,' was the unexpected answer. 'Converted, are you? Do you know what that means?' asked the gentleman. 'Aye, a dae ken,' said the boy, with a beaming face. 'When and where?' was the next inquiry. 'In th' Surkis, mair than a month syne,' the lad said. 'But, my boy, how do you know—how old are you?' asked the gentleman, anxiously. 'A'm twal yers auld, an a ken weel that God has changed ma hert, 'cause I eesed to drink, smoke, sweer, an' gae wi' bad companions. Noo'a dinna dae ony o' the things.' Yes, this ragged lad was a son of God by faith in Christ. His proofs were unimpeachable."

An Infatuated Musician.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting, Cowcaddens, on August 3d, a broken-down looking elderly man came into the meeting and stayed to be spoken with. The Rev. Mr. McDougall pointed out the way of life to him, and he professed to accept Christ as his Saviour. Inquiry was made into his past life, and it was found that when he was a young man he showed great aptitude for music and musical instrument making. In due course he became an expert musician in almost every part of his profession, from the merely mechanical work to the most abstruse theory. It took him many years hard steady work, but the result paid him well until the craving for stimulants became so imperative that he would lose the most important engagement he had made for the sake of a drinking bout with congenial friends. Gradually he found that many men, his inferiors in education and ability, were being preferred to himself, and he made an effort to retrieve his position; but so powerful was his infatuation and bondage to strong drink, that he fell farther down into the filthy slough than ever, till at last he was obliged to do anything whatever to earn a living; but all he managed to get was spent to gratify his unquenchable craving for whiskey. When he entered the meeting he had neither money nor home. One of the workers was sent to a lodging-house with him, and it is resolved that, if after due trial, the man shows himself to be in earnest, means will be devised to secure him an opportunity to earn his own living honestly.

The Coachman's Christian Son.—An Evangelist in the west of London, narrated the following incident: "A coachman was taken ill suddenly, and we called at the house, and quietly ascended the staircase leading to the room where the sick man lay. There bent over the prostrate form of the man his eldest son, deeply affected and weeping bitterly. His face was close to that of the father's, and we heard him in an agony of earnest words, amid his deep grief, say, 'Father, this is a faithful saying, "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." Oh, my father, do only trust Jesus! "His precious blood cleanseeth from all sin." Only believe, my father! Oh, God, save my father!' Then followed other precious Scriptures. The hot tears and intense earnestness and anxiety we shall never forget. We had watched the scene for some minutes almost transfixed at the door. At length, approaching the bed, we observed that the man was dead. Tenderly we raised the young man, and quietly said, 'He is gone; you cannot reach him now!' Poor fellow, he had been speaking into the ear of a corpse, and as we sought to comfort the son, we prayed that our efforts to make the living hear should be as ardent and earnest as that we had just witnessed."

AMID PERILOUS TIMES.

By the Rev. Dr. Sinclair Patterson.

PROPHECIES of the world's progress and improvement widely accepted thirty years ago have been strikingly falsified. At the time of the first Great Exhibition in London in 1851, it was a current article of faith that the world was entering upon a new era of brotherhood and peace. Commerce was destined to charm away all thoughts of conflict from the hearts of men, and to command the fullest employment of national energies in deeds of mutual service. The millennial hour of rest looked and longed for by ancient seers had already dawned. In the kindly emulation of skill and science, and in the helpful interchange of crops and merchandize, there appeared the happy promise of a bright and beneficent future.

That this statement is no exaggeration, the following extract from a widely-circulated book by one of the most popular preachers of that time plainly proves: "It (the Great Exhibition) may be a contribution to the peace of nations by showing a nobler rivalry than arms, better trophies than banners and garments rolled in blood, and a warfare whose field is the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park—whose artillery are steam engines and hydraulic presses—whose soldiers are philosophers and engineers, and spinners and dyers—and its protocols treatises on science, and its traces good feeling, amicable rivalry, and social and universal advancement."

"Such great movements have always been connected with the elevation and progress of mankind. It was when the Medes and Parthians and dwellers in Mesopotamia—and I speak it with a deep sense of the solemnity of that event—were assembled at Jerusalem, that the Holy Spirit came down, and made them the ambassadors of God and the benefactors of mankind. It may be that during this great assembly of the nations of the earth, of Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, bond and free, God may have in store unknown to us—I pray that it may be so—social blessings that the world shall not be able to exhaust."

In the light of subsequent history how satirical such writing seems! It is certain that from that time onward to the present hour there have been wars and rumors of wars; and these, perhaps not altogether untraceable to that great display of riches and skill; there has also been ever since a steadily rising wave of Materialism which seriously threatens to overwhelm industry no less than religion.

How sadly and sternly the three decades following give the lie to these confident predictions of human foresight all the world knows. Again and again has the trump of war summoned hosts to carnage; the plains of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America have been repeatedly deluged with blood, and now, when the generation so hopefully inaugurated is nearing its close, there remains perplexity of nations, and men's hearts are failing them for fear.

A few years more, and in 1893 the centenary of the great French Revolution of 1793 will be reached. What has been the result of the varied experiments in democracy which owe their origin to that startling crisis! Is government safer and stronger to-day than it was before that wild volcanic outburst? Is there greater reverence for law, and do rulers more fully command the respect and obedience of their subjects? These are questions to which thoughtful men are slow to give reply. They are discouraged by the manifest presence and prevalence of lawlessness wherever they look, and they find little of that loyal submission to authority which is the only guarantee of order and progress.

The nations which form the very vanguard of civilization are threatened from within. In America the rights of labor are clamorous for a favorable settlement. France, having suppressed insurrection with a strong, firm hand, is still anxious about the near future. In Germany, Bismarck's stern will has hitherto held in check rebellious spirits, but it is no secret that the fatherland is filled with Socialistic theories which only wait a favorable season to ripen into action. The Czar of Russia scarcely dares to hold with firm grasp the reins of government, and his assumption of the emblems of autocratic power by coronation has been barred by Nihilistic threats and terror. The minor States of Europe, with hardly a single exception, are pervaded by a visible unrest; and our own country, which we have proudly called the home of freedom, is face to face with an organized and secret rebellion in Ireland against both liberty and law.

Nor is the outlook more hopeful when we consider the attitude in which the powerful European nations stand in relation to each other. Armed to the teeth, they exhibit a distrust and suspicion of one another which they are at no pains to conceal. Yet each one of them fears to provoke an explosion. They all dread the extent and consequences of the conflagration which the least spark might kindle. The whole forces of their diplomacy are combined to secure a hollow and deceptive peace. Their consciousness of internal weakness makes them fearful of external troubles.

These circumstances occasion us no surprise. We see in them a fulfilment of the sure word of prophecy, and we are even prepared for the issues. Events are ripening the nations for judgment.

[The above sentiments strikingly agree with what many commentators hold—viz., that we are at the close of the Sixth Vial and on the margin of the Seventh, see Rev. 16 : 12 to 17.—ED.]

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE JEWISH NATION AND LAND.

By the Rev. G. H. Pember, M.A.

Causes in Operation Favoring the Return of the Jews to the Holy Land—The Sultan of Turkey's Firman in 1840—Additional Concession in 1867—Exodus of Russian Jews—Emigration to Germany and their Exodus therefrom—Schemes for Colonizing the Holy Land—The Centre of the Eastern Question—Imminent Troubles for the Jews.

It is clear that the first great sign of the end of the age must be the return of the Jews in considerable numbers to their own country, and the subsequent rebuilding of the temple. Now this return has actually commenced, and various causes already in operation seem likely to favor it. In the first place, we may mention that Jerusalem itself is gradually becoming a centre of civilization and is assuming the appearance of a modern city; villas are being erected in its neighborhood, and no less than three exclusively Jewish building societies have been for some time carrying on their work.

Again, during the last ten or twelve years the Jewish population has doubled itself, so that at the present time it outnumbers the remainder of the inhabitants. Such a condition of things has not previously been known in Jerusalem since its destruction by Hadrian. Various causes have contributed to bring about this result, and seem likely to extend it. Among them are the following:

In 1840, at the request of Sir Moses Montefiore, the Sultan of Turkey issued a firman for the relief of his Jewish subjects. After stating in the preface that the various accusations—such as that of sacrificing a human being to make use of his blood at the Passover—which were popularly brought against the Jews, were pure calumnies, he declared that thenceforth the Israelitish nation should be protected and defended, and should possess the same advantages, and enjoy the same privileges, as the numerous other nations under his sway. Thus one great obstacle to the return of the Jews to Palestine was removed.

In 1867, the Turkish Government made an important concession in regard to their land laws, and gave permission to the subjects of foreign powers to purchase land in their own name. It is easy to see how favorable this change is, indirectly, to immigration; since any rich European Jew can now buy up property in Palestine, and let it as he chooses to families of his own nation. And not a few have availed themselves of the opportunity.

EXODUS OF RUSSIAN JEWS.

In 1874, Russia—in which vast empire there are between two and three millions of Jews—adopted the German military system, so that all Hebrews became liable to service in the army. This was very distasteful to them; and about the same time they were subjected, especially in Poland, to divers persecutions, such as are frequently raised by the Greek Church. It is reported that, for these reasons, nearly the whole of the Jewish community resolved to leave Russia; and certainly from that time emigration has been continually going on.

Many families have arrived in Palestine, to the great increase of the Hebrew population; still larger numbers have poured into Germany, where, however, they find no ease, neither rest for the sole of their foot; but seem likely to be driven on to seek another home, and possibly even to cause the departure of their brethren who had previously settled there. For, within the last few years, the ancient hatred of the Jews has been revived in Germany, their wonderful prosperity and rapidly increasing power having excited jealousy and prejudice, and induced a persuasion that many of the ills of the country are to be referred to their presence in it.*

In all probability it would never have occurred to the Jews, had they been unmolested, to abandon their prosperity in the rich countries of Europe and return to their own land. But the jealousy and hatred of those among whom they sojourn may be God's means of driving them back to the place where He will deal with them; just as, in the days of old, their hard bondage made them glad to leave the flesh-pots of Egypt, and to set their faces toward the desert.

Meanwhile, the general interest—and especially that of British Christians—which is awakened in regard to Palestine, the frequent journeyings of Europeans and Americans through the length and breadth of it, the exploring and surveying expeditions, and the exertions of Sir Moses Montefiore and other Jews, have done much to ameliorate the condition of the country, and remind us of the prophecy—

"Thou wilt arise, and have mercy upon Zion;
For it is time to favor her;
For the set time is come.
For Thy servants take pleasure in her stones,
And favor the dust thereof."—Psa. cii. 13, 14.

COLONIZATION SCHEMES.

Among the many striking incidents of the last few years, we may mention the proposal for the colonization of Eastern Palestine suggested by Mr. Theodore Oliphant,† who, in common with the majority of thoughtful and unprejudiced Englishmen, has viewed with alarm the rapid southward advance of Russia, and felt the necessity of checking it before the British route to India becomes seriously endangered. For the results of the late war have placed some important military positions in the hand of the Czar, and have extended the Russian Empire into Armenia; while Turkey, owing to her continued inadministration, which is ceaselessly fostered by Russia, can no longer be regarded as a reliable barrier, and indeed, unless reforms be introduced, must soon collapse, and leave for the Muscovites an open road to Jerusalem and to the Suez Canal.

Should the English discover—before their opportunity has passed—the necessity of opposing a barrier to Russian advance into Palestine, it is not improbable that the establishment of a large and influential Jewish colony would form a part of their plan. That such a project has received much consideration may be inferred from the fact that a second gentleman, Mr. Cazalet, elaborated a scheme similar to that of Mr. Oliphant, which was published about the same time as the latter.

THE CENTRE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.

We are now, in all probability, able to discern, in dim outline, the manner in which the nations will unconsciously work out the will of Him who knows the end from the beginning; but, whether this be the case or not, certainly the progress of events has at last made Palestine the centre of the great Eastern question. Nor are signs wanting that its soil is destined before long to be the battle-field of the nations, though not, probably, until the Jews have been settled in it. Then the conflicts of opposing armies, like the ancient struggle of the kings of Syria and Egypt, may, perhaps, form no small part of the discipline through which the kinsmen of the Lord have yet to pass during "the time of Jacob's trouble."

It would seem, then, that we may be very near to the times of which it is written, "And it shall come to pass on that day that I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone to all the peoples; all that lift it shall be wounded; and all the nations of the earth shall be gathered together against it." The grand swoop of the Russian eagle appears to be described in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel, in which it is now almost universally admitted that the name and titles of the northern king should be rendered, "Gog of the land of Magog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." The kingdom of this leader can be identified in no dubious manner with the present dominions of the Czar, and, as Dean Stanley remarks, "this early Biblical notice of so great an empire is doubly interesting from its being a solitary instance. No other name of any modern nation occurs in the Scriptures."

IMMINENT TROUBLES FOR THE JEWS.

There is, then, bitter tribulation awaiting the sons of Abraham in the immediate future. The curse which the miserable people called down upon their own heads is not yet exhausted; the blood of Him whom the Father sent is still upon them and upon their children; there is no fountain as yet opened to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness; they are still bearing every one his own iniquity. But the hour of decision is approaching, when that which can be saved shall be saved, and that which will perish shall perish; the time is near when the people shall be gathered in unbelief into their own country as men "gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it."*

The day is not far distant in which the inhabitant of Jerusalem shall indeed say, "I am sick," and all the cities and fields of the devoted land shall be anguished with pain, and sorrow, and crying, and death. For the last end of the indignation, like the closing trouble of Joseph's brethren, shall be the worst of all; but its fruit will be the broken and contrite heart; and then mercy will take the place of judgment, and He shall appear, who is able to save to the uttermost, and who "turneth the shadow of death into the morning."†

CURRENT EVENTS.

Rumors of Changes in President Arthur's Cabinet have been freely circulated during the past week. It is generally expected that Secretary of the Treasury, Folger, will be a candidate for the Governorship of New York, and that Mr. Teller, now Secretary of the Interior, will be a candidate for the seat of his State in the United States Senate. If these expectations are fulfilled the Cabinet will be reconstructed, an event which the President is said to desire. Secretary Folger being appealed to in reference to the course he would pursue if a nomination should be tendered him, said: "Should the convention see fit to nominate me I shall accept, and enter heartily into the canvass. I am not ashamed to say that a nomination for Governor of my own State is an honor of which I would be proud, and which I would accept without hesitation." It is understood that Mr. Folger would have the support of the administration in the canvass, but recent events have shown that such support might not be an unalloyed advantage. It is no secret that many Republicans desire a renomination for Mr. Cornell, while others advocate the nomination of Mr. Wadsworth. It is a remarkable development of events that the Governor's most implacable opponents are those who contributed most effectively to his nomination three years ago. The machine is out of gear in New York as in other States, and it is believed that if the choice of the Democrats should be a wise one they will carry the State and so influence the next Presidential election.

The Elections of this Month which are Attracting the interest of politicians are those of Arkansas, Maine, and Vermont. In Arkansas there are three tickets in the field for Governor and State officers—Republican, Democratic, and Greenback. In Maine, the most closely contested election of the three, the election will be held on Monday, 11th inst. For Governor, the only State officer to be chosen, the candidates are: Republican, Frederick Robie; Greenback-Democratic-Fusion, Harris M. Plaisted, the present incumbent; straight Greenback, Solon Chase; Prohibition, William T. Eustis, and Independent Republican, Warren N. Vinton. Vermont elects Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, State Treasurer, Legislature, and two Representatives, and there three tickets are also in the field.

The Prohibition Wave is being felt in Illinois. A Press correspondent in that State writing to a New York journal says: The Prohibitionists have undertaken to question every nominee of both parties for the Legislature as to how he would vote on the submission of a liquor amendment to the people. When the answer has been unsatisfactory, or none has been given, a Prohibition candidate has at once been placed in the field. This course has been pursued to such an extent as to alarm the Republicans. The Democrats are drawing much encouragement from the situation; Governor Culom has said: "While I do not think it wise for the Republican party to incorporate a prohibition plank in its platform, I think there will be enough good men in the next Legislature who will favor submitting the amendment. I would favor it myself, because I think the people have a right to be heard upon all great questions when they demand the opportunity."

The Subject of Civil Service Reform is Discussed in a letter to the New York Times by Dr. McCosh, the President of Princeton College. Dr. McCosh says: "I lived in Great Britain when civil service reform was discussed and carried there, and before I left the country I saw the good effects that followed immediately and visibly in the elevation of the public servants. It so happened that I was one of a commission of twelve or fifteen persons appointed by the crown to organize the system, on the first application of it, which was to the civil officers sent out to govern the great Territory of India; and I had to take part in conducting the first examination." Dr. McCosh concludes by observing that civil service reform "is the great political—I would rather say the great national—question of the day, in comparison of which every other is insignificant. It is not only good in itself, but is the only means of stopping that political corruption of which every party is complaining. What we need at present is a combined movement among thinking and educated men to overbear the influence of those politicians who, for selfish, for personal and party ends, are practically opposing a measure so palpably for the benefit of the country."

The Liquor Question will be the Most prominent one in Ohio during this campaign. A correspondent in Cincinnati of a leading independent journal thus describes the situation: There is now practically free trade in liquor in Ohio. In 1854 a clause was inserted in the State constitution prohibiting the licensing of liquor dealers. Some laws have since been passed attempting to regulate the traffic, but they were either feeble or unconstitutional and have never been enforced. There is nothing to prevent any dealer from setting up a liquor shop anywhere in the State. They are therefore to be found in greater numbers and they are of a lower order in the State of Ohio than within the limits of any other State in the Union. Last winter, however, the Republican Legislature did essay to regulate the evil, and passed two laws—one taxing the sale of liquor and the other prohibiting its sale on Sunday. The first, because of certain defects, was declared unconstitutional. The second has been so far practically inoperative. The issue that the Republicans are endeavoring to make in Ohio this year is to secure a majority in favor of at least one of their candidates that shall be regarded as an expression of the popular will that the Legislature shall perfect the Tax bill at its session this winter, and that the Sunday law shall be rigidly enforced. The Democrats claim that their party is not opposed to taxation of the traffic of a proper Sunday law, and that as neither the Legislature nor important State officers are to be chosen this fall, the liquor question cannot be considered a factor in the contest.

Another Distinguished Advocate of Civil Service Reform has appeared in the person of Senator Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, who in a speech at Indianapolis on August 30th, said: "My brief experience at Washington has led me often to utter the wish, with an emphasis that I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens, and long to be able to give my time and energy solely to those public affairs that legitimately relate to the honorable trust that you have committed to me." He strenuously advocated the inauguration of civil service reform of a most radical kind.

A Garfield Fair is to be Held in Washington in November next, and the committee in charge of the arrangements, which includes members of the Supreme Court, Senators, members of Congress, army and navy officers of high rank and the first citizens of Washington, have issued a circular in which they say: "A national bazaar, art and industrial exposition will be held in the rotunda and adjacent halls of the National Capitol at Washington, D. C., November 25th to December 3d (inclusive), 1882, as authorized by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, August 7th, 1882. The object of this undertaking is to raise funds with which to erect a statue in this city to the memory of General James A. Garfield, late President of the United States, which work is in the hands of a committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, who have already collected for this purpose some $20,000, and expect, with the results of the exposition, to have a sufficient sum with which to erect a work befitting the great name it is proposed to commemorate."

The Yellow Fever Ravages at Brownsville, Tex., and the neighborhood show no signs of abatement. During the week ending Sept. 2, 425 new cases of fever were reported. The official report for the twenty-four hours ending at 10 a. m., on Friday gives sixty new cases and two deaths. Subscriptions are being received from numerous sources for the sick. Some of the new cases are in Fort Brown, among them Major Witherell, of the 19th Infantry. Dr. Murray is doing everything possible to prevent egress from this city and county. The mail to Rio Grande City has been ordered stopped until further notice. A slight improvement is reported from Matamoras, Mex.

Gratifying Intelligence of the Industrial Prospects in the Cotton States was given at the session of the American Bankers' Convention at Saratoga, N. Y., on August 17, by Mr. W. H. Perkins, of Mississippi. The crop prospects there, he said, were good. The cotton crop will be larger than last year. The farmers are getting clear of debt and abandoning the idea of planting cotton alone. In the past two years railroad enterprises have been begun and are being prosecuted that will cause an expenditure within the State of Mississippi of fifteen to twenty millions of dollars within the next two or three years. The directors of the Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad have resolved to build a road from Jackson to Yazoo City, and the work will be commenced some time this fall. During the twelve months just passed Mississippi has paid more money into the United States Treasury from the sale of her public lands than any State in the Union, and that is without a parallel in the history of that State.

A Billiard Player was Startled by one of the balls used in the game taking fire recently. During the progress of a friendly game at Toronto on August 29th, one of the players happened to touch a ball with a lighted cigar, when to his amazement it immediately caught fire and was quickly consumed. It was made of celluloid, a fact of which the players were not aware or more caution would have been observed. The damage done could easily be repaired, but there have been cases in which smoking and billiard playing have led to irreparable mischief and that too, owing to a mistake as to the strength of what has been destroyed (1 Cor. 10 : 12).

Two Little Girls were Forgotten on a Ferry boat last week by their intoxicated father. They were found crying bitterly in the cabin of one of the North River boats in its New York slip about ten o'clock at night. The children were taken to the police station and the case was set down as one of abandonment. But soon after midnight a man arrived at the station-house and asked for the two girls, of whom he said he was the father. He was very drunk, he said, when he went on to the boat with his children, and when he reached New York he was half asleep and forgot that they were with him. He entered a horse car and rode to his home, and it was not till his wife asked him where the girls were, that he realized the fact that he had lost them. He at once returned to the ferry and there learned what had become of them. It is not every case of forgetfulness that ends so satisfactorily. It is to be feared that at the last great day many parents will realize with horror that their children are hopelessly lost through the neglect of those who should have trained them in the fear of the Lord (Prov. 22 : 6).

Thirteen Hours of Peril were Endured by a young man from New York last week. A fishing party while sailing off Merwin's Point on the Connecticut shore, found a young man sitting on the submerged hull of a cat-boat and rescued him. He said he had been in that position thirteen hours. He and a companion were sailing in the boat on the previous day, when it was capsized by a sudden squall and lay on its side with the mast and sail flat on the water. They climbed on the vessel's side, and observing that she was drifting toward New Haven harbor they hoped that they would find a refuge there. But when about one hundred and fifty yards from the lighthouse the current changed and they were drifting out to sea again. Then they decided to try to swim ashore. In this effort one of them was drowned and the other, after much difficulty, succeeded in getting back to the boat. There he remained through the night, shouting to passing vessels, but unable to make them hear on account of the roaring of the sea. When the fishing yacht took him aboard he was utterly exhausted. How many a poor man shipwrecked in the voyage of life has had a similar experience of futile efforts at self-rescue, and vain calls on other barks until the Gospel boat has come to his relief (Rom. 1 : 16).

A Purchaser's Perversity is said to have Led to a disaster which was near ending in the destruction of his house recently. The incident was narrated in a Detroit journal by a second-hand dealer who purchased four stoves, all alike. In cleaning them it was found that one of them had a crack in the bottom and the dealer concluding that if a plate were laid over the crack, it would do for his own use, had it set by itself in his store to be taken to his house when the wagon could be spared to take it up. Soon afterward a purchaser entered and asked the price of the stoves; he was answered and invited to take his choice. He looked them carefully over and then caught sight of the cracked one standing apart. He inquired what that one was, and being informed that it was put aside for the dealer, said he would have that or none. "But it is cracked," said the boy. It was no use, "That is the stove I will have," said the man, and so fearful was he that another might be sent instead, that he waited to see it placed on the wagon. The first time he lighted a fire in his new stove the crack opened right up, and before night it burst and but for energetic measures his place would have been burned down. It would have been better for him if he had been prevented having what he had set his heart on. Some men have had cause to come to the same conclusion in more serious matters, and not a few late in life have acknowledged the goodness of God in not granting them boons for which they had prayed in their youth (1 John 5 : 14, 15).

A Valuable Medical Discovery Appears to have been made by Dr. MacGuire, of New York, who described it at a meeting of physicians at the Oriental Hotel, Coney Island, last week. It appears that hitherto the disease known as cancer-moris, or gangrenous ulcer, has been regarded as practically incurable, statistics showing that not one in twenty persons afflicted with it recovered. The disease broke out in an institution attended by Dr. MacGuire, and he was led to devote special attention to it. The disease is more loathsome than leprosy, and Dr. MacGuire noticed that all the sufferers were in a weak and debilitated condition occasioned by bad and insufficient food furnished them, and by the polluted atmosphere in which they had been confined. The doctor tracing all clues at length found that sub-nitrate of bismuth applied to the affected parts produced an immediate improvement, and eventually a complete cure. He accounted for the success of the remedy on the ground that it acted as a "germicide," destroying the germs of the disease, and he expressed the belief that it might be used with like effect in kindred diseases. The description of the disease and its treatment is a remarkable figure of that spiritual disease which affects all men (Isaiah 1 : 6 ; Zech. 13 : 1).

A Newly Arrived Immigrant is to be Re-turned to England. She is now in the Tombs serving a sentence of ten days for drunkenness. She gives the following account of herself: "I arrived last week by the Amsterdam. My passage was paid by the authorities in London. I was arrested two years ago by the Kensington police for being drunk. When I became sober they told me that I had attempted suicide. I was tried at the Westminster Sessions, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. I was sent to Tuthill jail. The authorities came to me about a month ago and told me they would give me the benefit of four months' good conduct if I would sign a paper consenting to go to America. I did so, and was shipped on the Amsterdam. My passage was paid and I was given a sovereign." The authorities have decided on sending her back to her own country, as we have already too many of that class here, of whom they cannot get rid. They are a burden to any country, and our government justly resents the attempt of the old world to shuffle its burdens on to our shoulders. Such additions to the population of a country are never welcomed by any king or government on earth, but it was to such lost outcasts Christ came and for their salvation He bled and died (Matt. 9 : 13).

A Fight Between Tarantulas was Witnessed at the store of a dealer in natural curiosities in Denver, Col., recently. The vicious disposition of these venomous spiders was well known, but it was not supposed they would wage war on each other. The curiosity dealer therefore put two full grown specimens in the same glass case. No sooner did they recognize each other than they rushed together, viciously twining their long, hairy legs about each other, and rolled over and over in the sand, biting each other savagely. Incredible as it may seem, this sort of warfare was kept up for six hours, during most of which time it could not be seen that either was gaining the slightest advantage, and neither seemed willing to end the fight except by the death of his adversary. At last one succumbed, and rolled over dead on the sand, while the victor immediately proceeded to reap the spoils of his long battle. Seizing his vanquished enemy in his stout horns, or pincers, he rapidly tore him limb from limb, and coolly proceeded in true cannibalistic fashion, to make a meal of him. There have been contests in the battle field and in the law courts and in society which this fight vividly typifies in its ferocity and its issue. The Apostle Paul explicitly warns Christians against such a spirit of strife (Gal. 5 : 15).

BROUGHT UP FROM THE HORRIBLE PIT.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"I waited patiently for the Lord; and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord."—Psalm 40 : 1-3.

The Messiah Speaking—In His Greatest Trouble—I. Our Lord's Behavior—Waiting under the Rod—With Patience—With Prayer—Patience in Waiting as well as in Suffering—II. Our Lord's Deliverance—Out of a Horrible Pit—A Dungeon in Rome—The Oubliettes—Our Lord Quite Alone—In Total Darkness—Full of Distress—Out of the Miry Clay—Set upon a Rock—Jesus Singing—III. Our Lord's Reward—Many shall See—And Fear—And Trust—IV. The Lord's Likeness—Waiting in a Great Man's Lobby—A Predicted Entry in a Diary.

THIS passage has been used with great frequency as the expression of the experience of the people of God, and I think it has been very rightly so used. It is a very accurate picture of the way in which sinners are raised up from despair to hope and salvation, and of the way in which saints are brought out of deep troubles, and made to sing of divine love and power. Yet I am not certain that the first verse could be truthfully uttered by all of us; I question, indeed, whether any of us could thus speak. Could we say—"I waited patiently for the Lord." Think ye, brethren, might it not read—"I waited impatiently for the Lord," in the case of most of us? All the rest may stand true; but this would need to be modified. We could hardly speak in our own commendation if we considered our conduct in the matter of patience, for that is, alas, still a scarce virtue upon the face of the earth.

If we read the psalm through we shall see that it was not written exclusively to describe the experience of God's people. Secondly we may regard it as David's language, but in the first instance a greater than David is here. The first person who uttered these words was the Messiah, and that is quite clear if you read the psalm through; for we fall upon such language as this: "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required. Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do Thy will, O my God: yea, Thy law is within my heart."

I shall ask you, then, at this time, to observe our divine Lord when in His greatest trouble. Notice, first, our Lord's behavior—"I waited patiently for the Lord; and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry;" then consider, secondly, our Lord's deliverance, expressed by the phrase, "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay," and so forth; then let us think, thirdly, of the Lord's reward for it—"many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord;"—that is His great end and object, and in it He sees of the travail of His soul and is satisfied. We shall close, fourthly, by perceiving the Lord's likeness in all His saved ones; for they also are brought up from the pit of destruction, and a new song is put into their mouths. He is not ashamed to call them brethren, since in each one of them His own experience is repeated though upon a smaller scale.

I. First, let us think of

OUR LORD'S BEHAVIOR.

"I waited patiently for the Lord." Here we greatly need the teaching of the Holy Ghost; may it be given us abundantly. First, our Lord's conduct when He was under the smarting rod was that of waiting. He waited upon the Lord all His life, and this waiting became more conspicuous in His passion and death. He went down into Gethsemane, and there He prayed earnestly; but with sweet submission; for He said, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Complete submission was the essential spirit of His prayer. He rose up from prayer all crimson with His bloody sweat, and He went to meet His foes, delivering Himself up voluntarily to be led as a sheep to the slaughter.

When they led Him away to crucifixion through the streets of Jerusalem He did not even encourage the lamentations of the sympathizing women who surrounded Him; but in His wondrous patience He said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me." He did not refuse to bear His cross, or to let the cross bear Him. He did not complain of contempt and contumely, since these were appointed Him.

When they nailed Him to the tree, and there He hung in the burning sun, tortured, fevered, agonizing, the words that escaped Him were not those of murmuring and repining, but those of pity, pain, patience, and submission. Till He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost, He bowed his whole being to His Father's will, waiting His time and pleasure. He steadily took a long draught at the appointed cup, and drained it to the bitter end. He was willing in the hour of His passion to be treated as the scum and scorn of all mankind, nor did He hurry the hour when all the shame and scorn should blossom into glory and honor. He went down in His waiting even to the utmost of self-denial, and truly proved that He came not to do His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. Never man served and waited like this man.

Our text adds to this word "waited" the word "patiently." "I waited patiently." If you would see patience, look not at Job on the dunghill, but look at Jesus on the cross. Job, the most patient of men, was assuredly impatient at the same time; but this blessed Lord of ours gave Himself up completely, and showed not the slightest sign of repining. Not a speck of impatience can be detected in the crystal stream of our Lord's submission. His soul was all melted, and it all flowed into the mould of the Father's will; no dross was in or about Him, nothing which refused to melt and to run into the mould.

We are in such a hurry when we are in trouble; we hasten to escape from it at once; every minute seems an hour, and every day an age. "Help me speedily, O my God!" is the natural cry of the child of God under the rod; but our Saviour was in no ill haste to get from the chastisement which came upon Him for our sakes; He was at leisure in His woe. So thoroughly was He resolved to do His Father's will that even on the morning of His resurrection He arose with deliberation, and quitted the grave in order, folding His grave-clothes and laying the napkin by itself. He steadily persevered in all His work of holiness and sorrow of sacrifice, never accepting deliverance till His work was done. "I waited patiently for the Lord," saith He; and you know, brethren, how true was the declaration.

But while the Saviour thus waited, and waited patiently, we must not forget that for the text speaks of a cry which He lifted up, and of God's inclining Himself to it. That patience which does not pray is obstinacy. A soul silent to God is apt to be sullen rather than submissive. A stoical patience hardens itself against grief, and asks no deliverance; but that is not the patience which God loves, it is not the patience of Christ. He used strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death. Let Gethsemane tell of that wrestling which infinitely excelled the wrestling of Jacob; Jabbok is outdone by Kedron. His was a wrestling, not to sweat alone, but unto sweat of blood; he sweats who works for bread, the staff of life; but he sweats blood who works for life itself. What prayers those must have been under such a fearful physical, mental, and spiritual agony which were so fervent that they brought an angel from the throne, and yet so submissive that they are the model of resignation.

Now, brothers and sisters, look at your pattern, and see how far short you have come of it. At least, I will remember with regret how far short I have come of it. Have we waited? Have we not been in too great a hurry? Has it not been too much our desire that the Lord might make His will like our will rather than make our will like His? Have you not had a will of your own sometimes, and a strong will too? Have you not been as the bullock unaccustomed to the yoke? Have you not kicked against the pricks? You have not waited, but you have worried. Can we say that we waited patiently? Oh, that patience! Every man thinks he has it until he needs it, but only let his tender point be touched, and you will see how little patience he possesses. It is the fire which tries our supposed resignation, and under that process much of our palace of patience burns like wood, hay and stubble.

OLD CROSSES FIT THE SHOULDER,

but let a new cross be laid upon us and we writhe under it. Suffering is the vocation of a Christian, but most of us come short of our high calling.

Our Lord Jesus has joined together reigning and suffering, for we read of "the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ;" He was the royal example of patience, but what are we? Remember, again, that Jesus prayed importunately while He waited: "being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly." Have we not at times restrained prayer? Have we not pleaded as an excuse for our feeble petitions the very facts which ought to have been a spur to our earnestness? "I felt too ill to pray." Couldst thou not pray for health with all the more fervency? "I felt too burdened to pray." Shouldst thou not pray for help to bear thy burden? Can we ever safely say to ourselves, "I may be excused from supplication now, for my sorrow is great." Talk not so. Here is thy balm and benediction, thy comfort and thy cordial; here is thy strength and succor, thy constancy and confidence.

Even in the midnight of the soul let us arise and pour out our hearts like water before the Lord. O tried believer, get thee to thy knees, and from above the mercy-seat the glory of the Lord shall shine forth upon thee. Pray even as Jesus did, and as all His saints have done, so shall you in patience possess your soul. To bear a great weight for an hour or two is nothing compared with carrying a load for many a day. Patience knows its letters, but waiting reads the page, and praying rehearses it in the ears of God. Let us add to our patience waiting, and to waiting prayer.

II. We come, secondly, to consider OUR LORD'S DELIVERANCE.

In due time, when patience had had her perfect work, and prayer had at last prevailed, our suffering Lord was brought up again from the depths of sorrow. His deliverance is set forth under two images.

First, it is represented as a bringing up out of a horrible pit. It is a terribly suggestive metaphor. I have been in the dungeon in Rome in which, according to tradition, Peter and Paul were confined (though, probably, they were never there at all). It was indeed a horrible pit, for originally it had no entrance but a round hole in the rock above; and when that round hole at the top was blocked with a stone, not a ray of light nor a particle of fresh air could possibly enter. The prisoners were let down into the cavern, and there they were left. When once the opening was closed they were cut off from all communication with their fellow men. Even in modern times we have seen what they call oubliettes, or dungeons in which prisoners were immured, to be forgotten as dead men out of mind, buried so as never to come forth again. Such unfortunates as were doomed to enter these tombs of living men bade farewell to hope. They were inhabitants of oblivion, dwellers in the land of death shade, to remain apart from their kind, cut off from memory. These worst of dungeons may illustrate our text—"He brought me up also out of an horrible pit."

Just notice, first, that our Lord was like a man put into a pit, and so made to be quite alone. Imagine yourself now confined in one of those caverns, with the big stone rolled over the mouth of it. There would be neither hearing nor answering. Now will you know the dread solemnity of silence. You may speak, but no gentle whisper of sympathy will reach your ears in return; you may cry again and again and make the dungeon's dome echo to your voice, but you are speaking as to brass—no man cares for your soul. You are alone; alone in a fearful solitude. Thus it happened to our Saviour. All His disciples forsook Him and fled, and what was infinitely worse, His God forsook Him too. He cried, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Can any man tell me all that was meant by that infinite lament?

Of course, a prisoner in such a pit as that was in total darkness. He could not see the walls which enclosed him, nor so much as his own hand. No beam of sunlight ever wandered into that stagnant air; the captive would have to grope for the pitcher of water and the morsel of bread which a cruel mercy would allot to him. Our Lord was in the dark; midnight brooded over His spirit. He said—"Now is My soul troubled." "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." His was a pit of gloom, the region of the shadow of death, a land of darkness as darkness itself.

When a man is shut up in a pit he is, of course, full of distress. If you were, any of you, to go into one of the solitary cells of our own jails, I warrant you a short sojourn in it would be quite enough. These cells some years ago were thought to be wonderful cures for all sorts of evil dispositions in men, but probably they have oftener destroyed reason than conquered depravity. Go in, if you dare. Ask the warder to shut to the door, and leave you in the dark all alone, that you may try the solitary system for yourself. No, I should not advise you to try it even for five minutes, for you might even in that short space inflict such an injury upon your nervous system as you would never recover.

In our Lord's case, the grief and sorrow which He felt can never be described, nor need it be conceived. It was something tantamount to the miseries of damned souls. The holy Jesus could not feel the exact misery which takes hold on abandoned rebels, but He did suffer what was tantamount to that at the judgment-seat of God. He gave a quid pro quo, a something which in God's esteem, reckoning the dignity of His mighty person, stood instead of the sinner's eternal suffering. He felt woe upon woe, night blackening night. Do not try to realize His agony; He wills that you should not, for He has trodden the winepress alone, and of the people there were none with Him, as if to show that none could understand His sorrows, and that we can do no more than speak of His "unknown sufferings."

But, oh, change the strain, and sing unto the Lord awhile, as we read the verse, "He brought me up out of an horrible pit." The Lord Jesus Christ was lifted up from all sorrow of spirit at that moment when He said so bravely, "It is finished," and though He died yet was He lifted up from death, as it is written, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption." His spirit ascended to God, and by-and-by, when the third day had blushed with morning light, His body rose from the tomb, to ascend in due time to glory.

A second figure is, however, used here to express our Lord's grief and deliverance from it—"Out of the miry clay." Travellers tell us that wherever pits are still used as dungeons they are damp, foul, and utterly loathsome; for they are never cleansed, however long the prisoner may have been there, or however great the number of victims shut up within them. You know what the prisons of Europe were in Howard's days, they were even worse in the East in periods further back. The imprisoned wretch often found himself sinking in mire; he found no rest, no hope of comfort, and when extricated he needed a hand to drag him out of the thick clay. So did the Saviour sink in the miry clay of our sin and misery until the Lord Almighty lifted Him out.

THE CLAY OF SORROW

clung to Him; it held to Him while He was performing the great work of our redemption. But the Lord brought Him up out of it. There is no mire upon His garments now; His feet no longer sink, He is not held by the bands of death, He slides not into the grave again. He was dragged down, as it were, by bearing our sin, but that is over, and He hath ascended on high; He hath led captivity captive, and received gifts for men. All honor be unto Him, and to His Father who delivered Him.

Then we are told He was set on a rock, and oh, the glory of our blessed Lord in this matter, for now He stands on a firm foundation in all that He oes for us. Judgment and truth confirm His ays, and the Judge of all the earth approves His oings. Christ has no sandy foundation for His ork of mercy or His word of comfort. When He ives He has a right to save; when He puts away n He does it on indisputable grounds; when He elps and delivers His people He does it according law, according to the will of the Highest. As istifier, Preserver, and Perfecter of His people, e stands upon a rock.

And now the goings of our glorious Christ are ablished. When He goes out to save a sinner, e knows that He can do it, and has a right to do it. When He goes up to His Father's throne to ake intercession for sinners, His goings are estab-shed, and the desire of His heart is given Him.
When He comes in among His church, or marches orth with His people to the ends of the earth, His oings are established. "For the king trusteth in e Lord, and through the mercy of the most High e shall not be moved." He shall surely come a second time without sin unto salvation, for so has e Father decreed; His glorious goings are as urely established as were those of His labor and ffering. We shall never be without a Saviour:
e shall never have a fallen or a vanquished aviour; for His goings are established for continance, certainty, and victory. Such honor have ll His saints; for "the steps of a good man are rdered of the Lord;" and again, "none of his eps shall slide."

Best of all, there is a new song in the mouth of ur Well-beloved. It is grand to think of JESUS SINGING.

Read the twenty-second Psalm, and you will ind Him doing it, as also in the Hebrews: "In he midst of the church will I sing praise unto Thee." Toward the end of His earthly career you ear Him bursting into song. Was not that a rand occasion just before His passion, when He was going out to die; we read that "after supper hey sang a hymn." If we had been bound to die hat night, as He was, we should rather have wept or prayed than sang. Not so our Lord. I do not now what psalm they sang; probably a part of e great Hallel, usually sung after the Passover, which consists of those Psalms at the end of the book which are so full of praise. Think of Him singing when near His hour of agony! Going to scorn and mockery, singing! Going to the thorn-crown and the scourge, singing! Going to death, even the death of the cross, singing! For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross, despising the shame!

III. Such is the exalted condition of our Lord at this hour; let us turn and look upon

THE LORD'S REWARD.

The Lord's reward for having gone down into the horrible pit, and having sunk in the miry clay for us, is this—that "many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord." "Many!" Not all mankind, but "many" shall look to Jesus and live.
Alas! vast numbers continue in unbelief; but "many" shall believe and live; and the Lord's
"many" means very many. As I was thinking over my text, I thought, "I hope there will be some at the Tabernacle this morning that belong to the 'many' who shall see and fear and trust in the Lord." "Many shall," for the Lord hath promised it. But, Lord, they will not. "But they shall," says God. Oh, but many refuse.
"But they shall," says God, and He hath the key of men's hearts, and power over their judgments and their wills. "Many shall."

Do you, oh ye unbelievers, think that Jesus shall die in vain? Oh sinners, if you will not have Christ, others will. You may despise Him, but He will be none the less glorious. You may reject
His salvation, but He shall be none the less mighty to save. He is a king, and ye cannot pluck a single jewel from His crown. If you are so foolish as to provoke His iron rod so that He shall break you in shivers with it, yet He will be glorious in the sight of God, and He will save His own. Notwithstanding your hardness of heart, be this known unto you, oh House of Israel, that "many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord."

What shall the many do? They shall "see."
Their eyes shall be opened, and they shall see their

Lord in the horrible pit, and in the miry clay; and as they look they shall see that He was there for them. What joy this will create in their spirits!
If they do not see the Lord Jesus as their substitute they shall, at any rate, be made to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin. If when Jesus only takes imputed sin, and has no sin of His own, yet He must be cast into the horrible pit and sink in the miry clay; then what will become of men who have their own sins about them, provoking the fierce anger of the Lord?

"Many shall see." Do you wonder that it is added, "and shall fear?" It makes men fear to see a bleeding Christ, and to know that they crucified Him. It makes men fear, however, with a sweet filial fear that is akin to hope, when they see that Jesus died for sinners, the just for the unjust, to bring them to God. But best of all—and this is the chief point—they come to "trust in the Lord." They build their hope of salvation upon the righteousness of God as manifested in Christ Jesus. Oh, I would to God that some of you would trust Him at once. Beloved friend, are you trying to be saved by your own works? That is a delusion. Are you hoping to be saved by your own feelings? That is a lie. But you can be saved, you shall be saved; if you will trust yourself with that blessed One who was alone in the dark pit of noises for the sake of sinners, and slipped in the miry clay for the ungodly, you shall assuredly be saved from wrath through Him. Trust Him, and as surely as He liveth you shall be saved, for He that trusteth in Him cannot perish. God's truthfulness were gone if the believer could be lost.
Hath He not said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." The throne of God must rock and reel before the cross of Christ shall lose its power to save those that believe.

IV. Fourthly, let us see

THE LORD'S LIKENESS

in His people. This whole passage, as I said in the beginning, has often been used by individual believers as a description of their own deliverance.
It is a true picture, because we are made like unto our Head, and all the brethren are partakers of that which the Head has endured. Do I speak to any of my Master's servants in sore trouble? Dear friends, are you made to wait, though your trial is sharp and severe? Is it so that your prayer has not yet been answered? Then remember the waiter's place was once occupied by the Lord Jesus, for He says, "I waited patiently." If the Lord keeps you waiting for a certain blessing year after year do not despair. He will give it at length if it be truly for your good, for He hath said
"no good thing will I withhold from them that walk uprightly." He kept His Son waiting, and He may very well keep you in like posture, for how long did you delay, and cause the Lord of grace to wait on you! "Blessed are they that wait for Him."

I have seen people very uppish when they have called on a public man and have had to wait a little; they feel that they ought not to be kept in the lobby; but suppose some young man said to them, "I am his own son, and yet I have been waiting an hour." Then they are more patient.
So when God keeps you waiting do not be proud, and say, "Wherefore should I wait for the Lord any longer?" but remember "It is good for a man both to hope and quietly wait for the salvation of God." Jesus waited—"waited patiently." Seek to be like Him, and in patience possess your soul.

"I cannot see how I am to be delivered."
Wait. "Ah, this is such a heavy burden." Wait.
"But I am ready to die under this terrible load."
Wait! Wait on! Though He tarry, wait for Him; He is worth waiting for. "Wait" is a short word, but it takes a deal of grace to spell out its full meaning, and still more grace to put it in practice. Wait: wait. "Oh, but I have been unfortunate." Wait. "But I have believed a promise, and it has not been fulfilled." Wait; for you wait in blessed company; you may hear Jesus saying, "I waited patiently." Blessed be His name, He is teaching us to do the same by His gracious Spirit.

Next, the Lord may send you, His dear child, a very heavy sorrow; you may fall into the horrible pit, and see no light, no comfort, and no one may be able to cheer you or help you. Some that have a touch of despondency in their nature have been brought so low as almost to despair of life. They have sat in darkness and seen no light; they have felt the walls of their prison and have not discovered a crack or cranny through which escape was possible; they have looked up, and even then they have seen nothing to console them. Ah, well, here is a word I commend to you—the Saviour says it: "He brought Me up." The Lord God can and will bring up His troubled ones. You will have to write in your diary one of these days, "He brought me up." I was in the dark, I was in the dungeon, but "He brought me up."

"Ah," say you, "but I do not know how to stand, for I sink as in miry clay, through faintness of heart; I cannot find the slightest foothold for my hope." No, you are sinking in the miry clay like your Master; but in answer to prayer the Lord will bring you up out of your hopeless state, and He will set your feet upon a rock, and establish your goings, and give you joy, and peace, and delight. Wherefore see, and fear, and trust in God, and give glory to His blessed name.

Lastly, do I address any seeking one who finds no rest for the sole of his foot? Dear friend, are you sinking in the deep mire of your guilt? The Lord can pardon you, for "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin." Are you shut up by conscience in the prison-house under a just sense of deserved wrath? Jesus will give you immediate rest if you come to Him. Do you feel as if you cannot kneel to pray, for your very knees slip in the mire of doubt? Remember, Jesus makes intercession for the transgressors.

Do you seem as if, every time you move, you are burying your hope, and slipping deeper and deeper into ruin? The Lord hath plenteous redemption.
Do not despair. You cannot deliver yourself, but God can deliver you; you cannot stand of yourself, but God can make you to stand. You cannot go to Him nor go abroad among your fellow-men with comfort, but the Lord can make you to run in His ways. You shall yet go forth with joy and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Only see Christ, and fear and trust your God, and you too shall sing unto Jehovah your deliverer, and this shall be your song:

"He raised me from a horrid pit,
Where mourning long I lay,
And from my bonds released my feet,
Deep bonds of miry clay.
Firm on a rock He made me stand,
And taught my cheerful tongue
To praise the wonders of His hand
In a new thankful song."

Card-sharpers at Races.—At the Recent Good-wood Races, in England, some card-sharpers said to an open-air missionary after he had been warning them of the baneful consequences of a sinful life, and expressing deep concern for their eternal welfare, "Sir, you don't know what we are; we are returned convicts, ticket-of-leave men. We must do something for a living." "My father," said one, "was a Congregational minister. I broke his heart. One Sunday, after he had preached his sermon, on reaching the vestry of the chapel, he fell down and expired." Another said, "My mother was a pious woman. I killed her with my cruel conduct." Alas! these characters are types of many, who know the truth and are familiar with Scripture teaching, but who have been enticed by Satan into wicked ways and have passed by stages almost imperceptible to themselves into a state of awful depravity.

A Letter Strangely Directed.

Dick Foster Consols his Mother.

MABEL SPENCER'S LOVER.

IN an upper room of a farmhouse a lady was restlessly pacing the floor. She was young, tall, and graceful of step and movement. As she walked to and fro she passed two windows framed in ivy and woodbine, which, twining together, almost covered the old house. Every time she came to the windows in her walk she paused to direct a longing glance down the path that led from the farm to the village. Along that path she knew that soon an old man would be seen walking and carrying a bag of letters. It was for the first sight of that old man she was watching so eagerly. The time was that of the Franco-German war, and it was from the scene of that sanguinary conflict that she expected a letter. Her lover was in the scene of a carnage, and her heart bled to think of the risk to which he was exposed. He was a young surgeon, and he had volunteered to go with the German army that he might gain experience and engage in the labor he loved best of all, that of relieving pain and mitigating the suffering of brave men.

But Mabel Spencer was anxious. She counted the days that must elapse before a letter could arrive, and this morning she was looking out for the letter which might come as she had been every morning for a week past. After a time she descried the old man with his letter-bag leisurely treading the path. Instantly she was on the stairs and running through the garden stood at the gate to await his coming.

"Have you a letter for me, Williams?" she asked, eagerly.

"Well, Miss Spencer, I dunno," he said; "mayhap I have, and mayhap not. There ain't one, so to say, addressed to you, but I ha' got a furrin' letter that perhaps is meant for you. I'll read what it says," and adjusting his spectacles the old man produced a long, narrow envelope, and held it before him. But Mabel Spencer could not wait for him to spell it out, but glanced eagerly over his shoulder. It was addressed to "Mabel, writer of a letter to Surgeon Ernest Fielding, Ingle-nook, Hampshire, England." "Yes, yes," she exclaimed, "that is mine; give it me," and she clasped the letter and hurried toward the house. There she opened it and with a sinking heart read the dreadful news. The writer did not know her name, but he too, was a surgeon, and he told how young Fielding was on the field and while stooping over a fallen soldier to adjust a bandage the fragment of a shell struck him on the head. He was carried to the hospital insensible and apparently dying. But he still lingered, and though the surgeons gave no hope of him, the writer of the letter believed that if he were taken to some quiet place and carefully nursed he would recover. He therefore resolved to write to the injured man's friends and relate the circumstances. Looking for some clue to the address of these friends he found in the pocket of the wounded man a letter from Ingle-nook and signed "Mabel." So he had written in the hope that even the incomplete address would be sufficient.

Mabel read the letter with many tears. She had no mother to advise with, and her sisters were unsympathetic. She knelt down and begged for wisdom to be given her of God that she might know what she ought to do. As she arose her mind was made up. She would go to her lover and nurse him back to life if God so willed. She sought her father and from him received a reluctant consent to her scheme, and the money necessary for her journey. It was a trying ordeal, but the young girl who undertook it has the gratification of knowing that the good man who is now her husband owes his life to her devotion.

DICK FOSTER'S TROUBLES.

"So she has thrown you over, Dick? We never mind, man! Don't put on that hang-dog look! There are as good fish in the sea as ever were caught!"

The speaker was a young man of twenty summers, or thereabouts, who, dressed in rather slovenly fashion, lay at full length on a luxurious couch, smoking a meerschaum pipe and reading a novel. His companion, who looked about the same age, was differently attired. Dick Foster means were not the same as those of Francis Beresford, neither were his tastes.

They were both graduates at college, and it was in Foster's rooms that they were sitting on the afternoon when our story opens. The post had brought a letter for Dick, and that young gentleman, although he tried hard to repress any sign of feeling when reading the epistle, still betrayed agitation.

"Wrong again, old boy!" retorted Dick, with forced laugh; "quite off the scent!"

"Not I," persisted Beresford, "I can see it is lady's hand from here. Own up to it, old man and don't be stupid."

Frank Beresford was not a genius, but he was a good-tempered youth. Moreover, he had a strong affection for his friend; so, seeing by Dick's manner that something was amiss, and that he did not want to talk about it, he turned his attention once more to his book, and was soon oblivious of both Dick and his troubles. And Dick's troubles were

l enough. The letter, which Beresford had noticed, was from Dick's mother, and its contents were enough to justify his agitation.

Dick's father had been a successful merchant, and amassed a considerable fortune. Dick, the only boy in the family, had been at school and was now at the university, intending, when he left, to study for the bar. Unfortunately for Mr. Foster's family that good gentleman lived some three years too long to die affluent. Three years before his death, he was worth a hundred thousand dollars at least; on the day after his funeral, his widow had to call her creditors together to tell them her husband had not left enough money to satisfy their claims. Everybody was very sorry, but nobody was surprised. Mr. Foster had made his money by steadiness, sobriety, and attention to business; he lost it through habits acquired late in life, of negligence, inattention and drunkenness. It took him thirty years to make his hundred thousand dollars; he contrived to squander it in three. Then Mrs. Foster wrote to Dick to college to tell him that she had sacrificed her own private property to make up the deficiency in his father's estate, and had, to save his name from dishonor, paid every dime of debt.

The family were now without any income, and it was to apprise him of that fact, and that his university career was therefore ended, that Mrs. Foster sent her son this letter. Dick was a brave and noble young fellow and did not allow himself to be cast down by his misfortune. Putting the best face he could on the matter, he bade his college chums good-by, and returned home. He found his mother in tears.

"My dear mother!" said Dick, putting his hand lovingly on her shoulder, "don't worry about it. You did quite right in paying the people. I don't complain. Why should I? I have health and strength, and a better education than most young men. Don't you fear, I shall get on somehow, and you and Mary shall be better off than ever you were."

"Poor Mary!" replied his mother, sadly, "the blow is even heavier for her than for you. All her old fashionable acquaintances now cut her, and Mr. Millbank never calls now."

"Millbank is a villain!" exclaimed Dick, hotly, "and I am glad Mary will now be able to see him in his true character. While she had money he was an ardent suitor; now that she is poor, he turns his back upon her. It is a good riddance."

Long and earnestly mother and son consulted about their future arrangements, and when the consultation was over she looked more tranquil and he more hopeful than ever.

Five years have passed away, and Mr. Richard Foster is already one of the most rising young men at the bar. And Mary Foster is Mary Foster no longer, for one fine morning in a little country church she became Mrs. Francis Beresford. Her old fashionable acquaintances know her again, and vie with each other in their efforts to obtain invitations to her town and country parties. Even Mr. Millbank put in an appearance once, but Dick, happening to be present, gave the fortune-hunter some plain advice, after which that gentleman took his departure and has not since shown himself. Dick keeps as far off as possible from the precipice over which his father fell—that is, he is a staunch and total abstainer, and though a good lawyer and highly respected he does not disdain to publicly advocate temperance, and many a large gathering has been electrified by the eloquence of the young barrister, who, himself scorched by the fire, warns his fellow-creatures to avoid its devouring flame.

A STREET IN CAIRO.

A PICTURE of the city of Cairo as it appears to the traveller approaching its gates appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 27th, together with some account of its buildings and inhabitants. On this page is a picture of one of its streets, which will give the reader some idea of the scenes in the ancient city. Not all the streets are like the one represented. Many of them are composed of houses built of mud only, and having no windows overlooking the street.

Dr. James Ludlow, writing of Cairo, says: "Let the reader stand with me, in imagination, upon the wall of the citadel which rises above the city. That silver gleam winding down at our left is the Nile, whose source has been the geographical enigma of all centuries, whose annual overflow redeems from the desert a narrow ribbon of fertility, which has nourished the mightiest empires, and whose combined mysteries and beneficence drew men to worship it in one of the earliest and most influential religions of mankind."

Beyond the river, beneath the sands of the Lybian desert, lie the buried ruins of ancient Memphis, where the prostrate colossal statue of Rameses II., like some giant guard asleep at his post, has been on duty for three thousand years. A little to the north, and within an easy carriage-drive of a morning, rise the great Pyramids, the largest and oldest works of man. So vast were they, that though they have been frequently used as quarries for palaces, fortifications, and mosques, they are not from this distance visibly diminished. Around them are tombs and temples in which are buried the secrets of remotest antiquity, over which the Sphinx watches with his motionless lips.

On this side of the river lies the suburb known as Old Cairo, by many believed to be the Babylon mentioned in the first Epistle of Peter, and certainly that Babylon to which Strabo refers, and whose old Roman fort is still visible above the accumulated debris of two thousand years.

Directly before us as we look north from the citadel lies Cairo proper. The city was founded by the Fatemite princes in 969 A.D. The planet Mars, or Kather, being then ascendant, they named the city El-Káherah, from which the present pronunciation, Cairo, is derived. The forest of minarets and domes, houses, and tombs marks every generation since.

A natural division of the city would be into two sections, the one of the dead, the other of the living; for large districts of it are given up to tombs. Many of these are really memorial mosques, in which lie the bodies of the Caliphs and Memlook princes. Here and there is a rich man's tomb, at the window of which is a running stream of water and a cup, that the thirsty may drink and bless the memory of the departed. Most of the tombs are unsightly slabs or plastered mounds, hardly distinguishable in color from the deep dust which, unlike our green grass, glares around them. These cemeteries are perfect Tophets of filth, the lair of mangy dogs and lamed men. The city of the living is majestic from a distance, with its homes of nearly 400,000 people, and its 400 mosques. But when we descend into it we will find it compact with as much squalor and misery as can be found elsewhere within the same limits on the globe.

ONLY A TRAMP.

Good Samaritans.

BOBBY ran back to the kitchen from his errand of kindness to the poor tramp in the church porch, scrambled up on to his chair again, and exclaimed triumphantly—

"He's still asleep, and I popped them into his hat, and didn't wake him." He added more gravely, "But though he didn't wake, he said something."

Bob having swallowed his final huge mouthful of meat and potato said very thoughtfully, "I'm main puzzling to think as what the tramp chap could ha' said in his sleep."

"Why, father, he said, 'God the Father of heaven.' And he said it so awful-like, and then he shivered."

"Poor chap!" ejaculated Bob again; and then the pudding was passed round, and once more spoons and plates were heard instead of tongues, until the dish was empty, and the two Bobs, father and son, retreated together to the garden while the table was being cleared. It was the little boy's turn to ask a question now.

"Father, do you think that poor sleeping man has been a miserable sinner?"

Even stolid Bob started at the singular enquiry, and rumbled his hair up with both hands before he answered.

"I reckon mother's right, my little un, and that your thoughts do run on ahead of us by a many a long field. But I'm afraid you're right now; I am. I'm afraid that he has likely been a miserable sinner, poor chap."

"Yes, father," said Bobby, with a rapt, earnest look on his face; "but you see then, he's not such a very poor chap either, though he is a miserable sinner; for he has God the Father of heaven, same as us, to have mercy upon him. Perhaps when he shivered he hadn't got up to the mercy part; but when he does, you see, he'll be all right."

Again the father stared at his little boy as he muttered slowly, "Ah! I expect so. Yes; if he gets up to praying, 'Have mercy upon us,' then he'll be all right, no doubt. Our Father do be very merciful, Bobby, my little lad, an' though we're miserable sinners, He don't leave us to be miserable children."

Those five words had taken very strong hold of the harassed brain of the poor stranger tramp. About a quarter of an hour after little Bobby Balston heard him utter them he repeated them again, and this time with such emphasis that he awoke himself.

For a few moments he believed that he was still asleep, and that it was with dreamy eyes he saw the sweet old face before him, so fairly wreathed in a snowy cap, and that it was with dream ears that he heard a somewhat feeble voice take up his sentence and complete it. The latter part was repeated the second time with loving, trustful emphasis on the words "have mercy," and then he brushed his hand over his eyes and sat up, and discovered that beyond a doubt he was awake, and that he had a companion.

The man's first impulse was to get up and hurry away, out into the heat and dust and glare once more. He, and peace and comfort, had so long been strangers that he had began to have a half-unconscious idea that all his fellow-creatures grudged him any small respite from a round of misery. The old woman standing near him now, in her clean print gown and white frilled cap, looked a silent but strong reproach to his wan face and disreputable tatters. He felt that he and she had nothing to do with each other; and as she was clearly in her fitting place in that tranquil church porch, he must move on. He sighed heavily at the thought. "Move on!" Ah! for some months past he had been always moving on, and never getting any nearer to kindness, or shelter, or rest.

"Good-day to you, ma'am," he said apologetically. "I only came in here to get a little shelter for awhile from the great heat. I'll move on now."

But the answer to that promise was very different to what he had expected.

"Oh!" exclaimed old Betty eagerly, almost as eagerly as little Bobby might have done. "Oh! I hope you won't move on yet awhile. Our vicar was so pleased to see you having such a nice sleep and I've made free to bring you a cup o' tea and a sausage. You see it weren't no trouble when I was cookin' them for myself, and it ain't neither, to say so much of a gift; for both the tea and the sausages have been give to me. Do ye then have a bit and sup."

And as she spoke good old Betty held toward the stranger a large cup full of fragrant-smelling tea, at the same time placing on the seat beside him a little plate with the sausage and bit of bread. The tramp looked at her, looked at her kind offering, stretched out his hand eagerly for the cup, and then his face changed—the hopeless look faded, and gave way to one of astonishment and heart-felt gratitude, and, utterly overcome, his arm trembled, and dropped back to his side, and with a great sob bursting from his parched lips he turned away from his companion.

Old Betty did not mind that. She saw that she had gained her chief point, and that he no longer meant to run away before she had time to bestow kindness on him. She was very willing to wait upon him. After a few moments she sat down, and said gently,

"Belike you are fond of the Litany. It's a great favorite of mine; it seems so full like—nothing forgotten, nothing left out; and then it sets out with reminding us that we are praying to One who for certain sure can give us all we ask for, seeing He's the very God the Father of heaven."

The old woman's efforts to turn the tramp's thoughts from his miseries succeeded even beyond her hopes. He had been so struck with his own way of taking those beginning words that he was equally struck, now, with another person's widely different way of looking at them, and, with a sudden raising of his head, he turned right round again to his new friend, and said quickly, "I guess He's given you all that you have seen fit to ask for; but I have not found Him much of a Father to me. With me it has been all the Father of heaven, and none of the Father of the poor wretched beggars upon earth."

Old Betty smiled. "Perhaps one of the poor beggars ain't thought to ask for anything different; and ye remember it's said by the dear Lord Himself, 'Ask, and ye shall receive.' But see, the tea's gettin' clay cold; do drink it, please."

"I didn't ask for that," said the man, with the ghost of an answering smile coming into his dreary face.

"No," said old Betty, putting the cup this time into a ready hand—"No, that's true, the dear Lord gives us many a thing more than either we desire or deserve. And now, as ye've had a sup o' comfort, I'd eat a bit if I was you; ye want it sorely enough, poor lad. And as I want my own dinner too," she added with a smile, and rising as she spoke, "I shall just leave ye now, and come back in half an hour for the plate and cup."

"Aren't you afraid to trust them to a ragged beggar like me?" asked the man with a slight shade of anxiety in his tone as to what the answer would be. When he got it it was not in words; for all reply Betty Sharplin gave him a second smile. "I'll be back with you in little better nor half an hour," she said as she moved slowly away.

"Good-by till then, and the Lord's blessing be with ye."

"Thank you," murmured the man half shyly, but with the inward feeling that the prayer was more likely to bring a reflected blessing back upon the old woman's own head, than to bestow any upon him. But meantime, however that might be, she had left one material blessing behind her which the starving fellow could not afford to neglect, and almost before his benefactress had regained her own cottage, certainly very considerably before the lapse of half an hour, the plate and cup were empty, and at her service, and there was nothing left of Bobby Balston's baked potatoes but a small modicum of their skins.

Crusty-tempered James Williams, the clerk, was certainly out of humor that beautiful Sunday afternoon; but there was some excuse for him. He had a true veneration for Silverdale Church, in which he had officiated as clerk for nearly twenty-four years, and in which he had been baptized more than a quarter of a century before that. He never entered it himself but in a state of scrupulous neatness, and as far as his authority or influence extended he took care that no one else should; and yet now, on a very Sunday itself, there was that most particularly dirty, disreputable-looking vagabond absolutely taking a day's lodging, so to say, in that especially clean, well-brushed-out church porch.

Moreover Williams discovered him eagerly finishing his dinner when he came round to the gate, opened it, and walked up to the stranger.

The wanderer raised his head as he heard the click of the gate. There had been a faint wavering smile on his face for the first moment as he did so, in expectation of the picture-like old face in its frilled white linen cap; but the smile faded, and he dropped the last remnant of potato, and hastily rose to his feet, when he saw the stern-visaged clerk marching toward him. For a few moments the two men stood looking at each other in silence. Williams had entered the churchyard with the firm determination to give the intruder a "pretty strong bit of his mind," as to the impertinent liberty he had taken in his choice of a sleeping apartment;

but somehow or other when his eyes met the other eyes his courage or his resolution died out.

At last, when the silence appeared to have been unbroken for an hour rather than for a few moments, the strange phrase escaped James Williams's lips—

"Good day to you, sir."

The stranger started as he heard the salutation but surprised as he looked, Williams himself was infinitely more startled. He bestowed a second long stare upon his companion of the most utter bewilderment, gazed at him again from head to foot as though he expected to find that after all the supposition that he was dressed in rags was all mistake, and that he was clothed in good broad cloth, and then, when he had convinced himself that the tatters were unpleasant realities, his long cheeks began to glow crimson with shame at his own stupidity.

"Humph!" he grunted at last, "you may well take me for daft. I'm not in the use of saying 'sir' to beggars."

"I suppose not," was the quiet answer.

The stranger had regained his self-possession.

"I suppose not; but even in saying 'sir' to me I deny that you have said it to a beggar. I never begged of any fellow-creature in my life, at least for myself."

"Humph!" grunted Williams again. He also had recovered his usual tone, and self-reproach for his temporary want of common-sense made his temper rather worse than it was before. "Humph!" he grunted the third time as his eye fell on the cup and plate, "very often folks as live upon others say they don't beg."

As he uttered those hard words the hearer winced, and shrank back as if he had been struck. James Williams's tongue was a good deal dreaded by many of his neighbors. He had an unenviable reputation for having an instinctive power to make that member sting. It had stung now, and cruelly. But the wayworn wanderer was not the only one who heard the words, or felt hurt by them. Mr. Copleston, acting on the principle of, "If you want a thing done do it yourself," decided while he sat at dinner to go and look after the stray sheep that had got into his fold himself, instead of leaving the business to his clerk.

In or near London, or any other large town, tatterdemalion more or less hovering about, crouched up asleep in lawful or unlawful places, is an object of no wonder, and of such divided interest as to become almost necessarily infinitesimally small; but in parishes such as Silverdale the matter is very different. Every passer-by is noticeable every visitor an individual of personal importance to every one in the place; and as for tatterdemalions, not one of the race had been seen between the departure of the poor, untaught, thieving gipsies last year and the advent of this stranger who took up his lodging in the church porch. Naturally he excited the attention of all those who saw him. Mr. Copleston, with his true earnest faith that nothing happens by chance, felt that the wanderer had been sent to his very door, as it were, at a rate for a few passing words of comfort, and it might be for even a little seed of Gospel truth to be dropped into the poor forlorn heart, and bear the future fruit of peace and salvation.

As he sat at dinner this thought grew in him so strongly that he dreaded trusting to the chances of the tramp sleeping in his corner of refuge long enough for the clerk to deliver his message; and he also dreaded trusting to Williams's persuasive powers to enforce the response to the message even should he have the opportunity to give it. He laid down his knife and fork, and covered his eyes with his hand, thinking.

"What is it, dear? are you not feeling well?" asked Mrs. Copleston across the table in anxiety.

Mr. Copleston dropped his hand again, smiling as he answered, "Quite well, thank you, my dear. You need not be alarmed; but I have that poor sleeping fellow I told you of just now rather heavy on my mind, and I think, if you will excuse me, I will go and look after him at once."

"Shall I go, papa?" asked Edith.

"Well—no," replied her father reflectively. "You see I don't yet know what he is like; he may want some one stronger and more resolute to tickle him."

The vicar, without troubling to put on his hat, walked across his garden, across the quiet "God's acre," as the Germans call it, adjoining, and was just about to pass through the gate, which with the new hedge, shut it off from the green lawn immediately surrounding the church, when the stranger's words struck on his ears—

"I never begged of any fellow-creature in my life—at least for myself."

There was something in the quiet, grave tone of the declaration that pleased the clergyman as much as the clerk's answer pained him. Whenever anyone did wrong in the parish he blamed himself; one want in him—in his teaching, or example, or earnestness—he looked for as the cause of the erring of the sheep committed to his charge. And here was one with whom he had been intimately associated, for the past eight years, finding satisfaction on that sweet Sabbath-day in flinging harsh speeches at a poor down-trodden stranger.

WATCHFULNESS ENJOINED.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 17, Mark 13 : 21-37. Golden Text, 1 Thess. 5, 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Watching a Duty—Critics of Prophetic Students in Danger—The Day of the Lord—Passages Referring to it—The First Sign to be Looked for—An Unmistakable Sign—Two Descriptions of Christ's Coming—Its Two Stages—Signs in Process of Fulfillment—A Solemn Word—The Mission of Irritating Circumstances.

"LET us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober," so runs the exhortation of our golden text. "Take ye heed; behold, I have foretold you all things;" "Take ye heed, watch and pray;" "Watch ye therefore;" "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch," such are our Lord's own injunctions to us, to watch and be ready at the time of His coming. It is a sinful thing to be in ignorance about the circumstances of our Lord's coming: "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand" (Rev. 1 : 3).

Many there are who strongly condemn those who endeavor to understand the dates which refer to the coming of Christ, but it frequently happens that they who condemn, are themselves in the greatest ignorance of the circumstances of His coming; and being so they are not in a position to watch, because they have no intelligent idea of how to watch, and how to recognize in events which are transpiring, those things which God has declared shall precede or accompany the coming of our Lord. In order to watch aright, we must have some idea as to whether so often mentioned in Scripture, is a single day of twenty-four hours, or an extended period, like "the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6 : 2). The Apostle Peter says, "Beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

An intelligent idea of that which is meant by "the day of the Lord" may be obtained by taking a concordance, seeking out all the passages in which this expression occurs, and reading them with their context. Take for example Isaiah 2 : 12, which with its context fills the two following chapters, the words "in that day" Isa. 2 : 20 ; 3 : 7, 18 ; 4 : 1 showing that the whole passage refers to "the day of the Lord." Then take Isa. 13 : 6 ; Amos 5 : 18 ; Zeph. 1 : 15 ; 1 Thess. 5 : 2 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 2 ; Rev. 6 : 15-17 in the same way, and other passages which speak of "the day of the Lord." But watchfulness does not only consist in recognizing events which happen, as those which have been foretold; our Lord thus commands, "Watch therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things which are coming upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of Man;" and lest we should think that the watch is to be only on the outside, He says, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares" (Luke 21 : 34, 36).

THE FIRST SIGN

of Christ's coming and of that day of the Lord is the attempt of Satan to counterfeit His coming. "And then if any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ; or, Lo, He is there; believe him not; for false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall shew signs and wonders, to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect." The terrible power of delusion which has come over so many of those who were the most earnest Christians in the east of France, and which makes them worship an old pastor as their Messiah, while believing in transmigration of souls and rejecting the eternity of punishment, shows how in the present day there is a need for this warning. It is a sad thing to find even pastors, one of whom has been much blest in the conversion of souls, carried away by this delusion.

Our Lord adds, "Take ye heed; behold I have foretold you all things." There is nothing to be expected that He has not told us, and if He has foretold all,

NOTHING NEED TAKE US BY SURPRISE.

In order that the landmarks may be clear and unmistakable, our Lord points to a sign so great, so striking, and so completely affecting all men, that no one could possibly be in ignorance of its occurrence: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with power and great glory." This sign is one frequently foretold by the prophets in the Old Testament, Isaiah, Ezekiel and Joel all combine to declare it (Isa. 13 : 9, 10 ; 24 : 23 ; Ezek. 32 : 7 ; Joel 2 : 31 ; 3 : 15); and Matthew, Mark, and Luke all record it. There can therefore be no difficulty in discovering when the Lord comes to reap His harvest of saved souls (Rev. 14 : 14-16 ; Matt. 13 : 30 ; Luke 3 : 7).

But you will ask, If such a time of trouble is coming, and the people of God are not to be taken away or caught up in the air to meet the Lord (1 Thess. 4 : 16) until after that time, how then shall those promises be fulfilled: "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. 3 : 10); again, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things which shall come to pass and to stand before the Son of man" (Luke 21 : 26)? By referring to Matt. 24, we find two descriptions of our Lord's coming for His own; one after the time of tribulation, when according to Isa. 24, Jer. 25 : 31-33 ; Ezek. 38, 39 ; Dan. 12 : 1 ; Zech. 14 ; Rev. 6, 8, 9, 11-18 there shall be one long continuance of troubles by war, pestilence, famine, and persecution, and one coming of the Lord in a time of peace, when two women shall be grinding at the mill and two men be in the field; a time apparently of quiet.

Many who have much studied believe, on the ground of the frequent exhortations of the Lord and His apostles to watch for His coming, and in a way which would lead us to think it might be at any hour, that this second description is that of the taking away of such as are "counted worthy" before the time of the tribulation begins; and that those Christians, the large majority, who were not ready to be taken away at that time, will be caught up at the end of the time of trouble. This seems to be borne out by the figures of the firstfruits and the harvest in Rev. 14. It is, however, difficult to be absolute on this point; the Apostle Paul in 1 Cor. 15 : 50-57, and in 1 Thess. 4 : 15-17, does not make any allusion to such a distinction.

Some have argued, If the time of tribulation precedes the taking away of God's people, what need is there to watch, for we cannot know in that case that that day cannot come until the tribulation is at an end? If indeed the Lord comes first for the "blessed and holy," "them that love His appearing," then it is fully consistent that we should wait and watch for Him; yes, with our "loins girded and our lights burning." The Apostle John exhorts, "And now, little children, abide in Him; that, when He shall appear we may have confidence and not be ashamed before Him at His coming." Abide in Him, out of self: in Him we are ready to meet Him.

"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near: so ye in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors." The Gospel shall "be preached among all nations for a witness" (Matt. 24 : 14); is not this sign in the course of fulfillment? The rapidly fulfilling "times of the Gentiles" evidenced by the movement among the Jews, is this not taking place before our very eyes? And reading as we do of the three evil spirits who "go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty" (Rev. 16 : 14), we turn involuntarily to the stupendous preparations for war which are being made all over Europe.

The suspicion with which the government of one country speaks of that of another, is it not "upon earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken?" Can we see these signs without being persuaded that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh? Verily I say unto you, that this generation [or race of men; i.e., these Jews], shall not pass, till all these things be done." Empires have fallen, nations become extinct, but the race of Israel still lives on. Fanatical powers have persecuted, and almost sought to extirpate them, but in vain; the Word of God has gone forth that the seed of Abraham shall yet "blossom and bud and fill the face of the earth with fruit."

Our Lord adds

about the time of His coming. "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is." How far the book of the Revelation, subsequently given, will enable us at the time of the end to know the very day, we cannot yet determine. The Son of God, who revealed it to His servant John, knows now most certainly the day and hour of His coming. And He tells us that He is "as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch." Yes, He has given to His disciples authority and power, and every man has his own work, which God has fitted for him, and for which God is fitting him day by day.

Often at first sight it would seem as though everything were at cross purposes. Husbands and wives brought together who seem to be just the very dispositions to try one another; mothers and daughters seem to be put together who cannot see from one another's point of view; all seems to be at loggerheads. A man of business has probably a manager who is the trial of his life; faithful, true in all things, but so overvaluing himself as to rouse the temptation to despise him in the heart of his employer; a servant, a Christian girl, a good worker, will sometimes try a Christian employer exceedingly, by such a display of self, such a pushing disposition, such an occupation with herself, as rouses the temptation in the mistress to put her down sharply.

Now why is all this permitted? For the very purpose, the loving purpose of our God, that all the evil of our hearts may be discovered, brought to the light, cleansed and taken away. He makes no mistakes; had we been untried there might have remained in us a depth of sin and self which would have made it impossible for us to be the dwelling-place of God. But the evil which He thus discovers to us can, as soon as it is discovered, be taken to and cleansed in the blood of Christ. Thus every friction and difficulty becomes in His hands a precious means of blessing, and our "work," to put everything as it arises into the hands of God, is found to be just the very best that could possibly be. Lord keep us watching, waiting, working, praying till Thou comest!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Battle by Moonlight was Fought on August 28 between the Egyptians, led by Arabi in person, and a portion of the British troops at Kassassin. The Egyptian army was observed early in the day marching in force toward the British position, and a small party was despatched to ascertain the strength of the advancing force. It was found to be over 4000, while Gen. Graham, who commanded at Kassassin, had but a small body of troops at his command. He immediately signalled for assistance, and until the cavalry arrived he had considerable difficulty in maintaining his ground. The correspondent of the New York Herald with the British army thus describes the cavalry charge which took place by moonlight. "Led by Sir Baker Russell they charged straight at the guns, sabring the gunners as they passed, dashing into and cutting down the flying infantry. General Russell's horse was shot under him, but he seized another and kept with his men. When the battle ended a scene of wild confusion ensued. Some guns still fired. Bodies of infantry kept up a fusillade. Meanwhile our infantry had had a hot time. Hundreds of shells burst in the confined space. The shelter of trenches afforded but poor protection. The Egyptians came on with much spirit, and were gaining ground, when the roar of guns on their left and rear, followed by the rush of cavalry, proved too much for them. From that moment they thought only of flight." The British captured the Egyptian ammunition, but were unable to carry off the guns before the enemy secured them.

A Vivid Picture of the Horrors of the War is given by the correspondent of the London Daily News, who telegraphs from Ismailia as follows: "I rode over the scene of the cavalry charge at Kassassin Lock. I found two acres thickly strewn with corpses of the enemy. Some of our cavalry were still seeking our dead and wounded. Two dead Life Guardsmen were so mutilated that they were quite unrecognizable. Their faces were horribly gashed. One of the men had one hand completely severed from the arm and the other hand nearly so, and one of his eyes was scooped from the socket. The hands of another body were just hanging to the wrists by pieces of flesh and some sinews. A wounded guardsman relates that in the charge his horse was shot and in falling broke the rider's thigh. While lying on the field he saw Egyptian soldiers ride by. He called for help, whereupon an Egyptian rode up and sabred the guardsman's face from temple to chin."

In An Address Delivered at Englewood, N. J., by Rev. Henry H. Jessup, D.D., the eminent missionary at Beyrout, in Syria, he expressed decided opinions respecting the British intervention in Egypt. Dr. Jessup witnessed the flight of Christians from Alexandria and is familiar with the details of Turkish rule in Egypt. Dr. Jessup expressed his conviction that Great Britain was not only justified, but deserves the gratitude of the Christian world for its interference. Whatever errors of judgment there were in time and manner of action, he holds that order, protection, civilization, and a free channel for the world's commerce could have been secured in Egypt only by British interposition to put down the nominal rebel, who was secretly instigated by the Sultan. That a tremendous struggle between Mahomedanism and the Christian world would have resulted, had not the Mahomedans been promptly divided by British action, and may yet result in the end, but with enormous advantages to civilization and Christianity from British control in the pathway between Asia and Africa, is the conclusion to which the review of facts clearly points.

The City of Dublin has been Thrown into consternation by the revolt of the Police force. As already mentioned the force claimed a small increase of pay in consideration of the increased duty and the danger incurred in the performance of their functions. With a strange incapacity to realize the importance of keeping this body loyal, the government snubbed the men, and in order to break up the agitation several of the leaders were ordered to remove to remote districts of Ireland. A meeting was called to protest against the order and was numerously attended. An order was afterward issued that any man attending another meeting would be at once dismissed. Another meeting was held on Sept. 1. The men who attended—234 in number—were dismissed the following morning. This arbitrary step was immediately followed by the entire force, numbering about twelve hundred men, refusing to go on duty. The authorities then took possession of the Station Houses in the city and soldiers were placed on guard. A proclamation was also issued calling upon loyal citizens to enrol as special constables. The excitement increased rapidly. Rioting broke out on College street and the mob was very violent. Some policemen who remained on duty were brought out in a body but were obliged to retire before the mob. Additional troops were sent to the scene of the riot, as there were no police in Dublin, and the mob had complete possession of the city. Rioting continued at intervals during the day, when some of the men who had previously refused to go on duty were prevailed upon to go on their beats provisionally, after presenting a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant asking for the reinstatement of the dismissed men and making its acceptance the condition of the permanent discharge of their duty. The special constables who were on duty were roughly handled by crowds of rowdies who gathered in the streets. It is expected that if the grievances of the men are not redressed many of them will emigrate to Australia.

A Small War has Broken out between Greece and Turkey over a narrow strip of disputed ground on the frontier. On August 28th and 29th there was fighting all along the line. The Turkish account of the fighting is that some Greek troops attempted to take forcible possession of the disputed territory, but they were repulsed with heavy loss by the Turks. M. Condouriotis, the Greek Ambassador at Constantinople, represented to the Turkish premier that the collision was provoked by a violation of Greek territory by the Turks. Said Pacha replied that last month a detachment of Greek troops crossed the frontier and cut the telegraphic communication between a Turkish military post and a village. The Turks requiring supplies were obliged to pass through a part of the Greek territory. They were opposed and fired upon by Greeks and retaliated, driving off the latter.

Apprehensions of an Outbreak of Mahomedan fanaticism in Syria are allayed by a telegram from Damascus dated August 31st, and signed by the Greek patriarchs and bishops of Syria and several of the principal inhabitants denying that there is any insecurity in Syria and Palestine or that there is any danger of a Mussulman rising against Christians. Owing to the vigilance displayed by the local authorities seldom has so much security been enjoyed as now.

Considerable Uncertainty Prevails as to the self-accused murderer of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Bourke, but there is no doubt that he is either a murderer or a madman. He is now imprisoned at Kingston, Jamaica, awaiting removal to Ireland. He still adheres to his former confession. He is very excited at times, and as he has threatened suicide, a close watch is kept over him to prevent any accident. He says that he left Dublin on the night of the assassination and proceeded with the night mail to Holyhead and thence went to Cardiff, and from Cardiff he sailed in the Gladstone for Porto Cabello, where he was arrested by the British representative on his own confession. He confesses to having returned before entering the car and to have given Lord Frederick Cavendish a stab in the back, and that he was employed and paid £20 by M. O'Connor, M.P., for his share in the deed. The impression grows that if he is not one of the murderers he had something to do with the crime and knew the plans of the criminals.

The Murder of the King and Queen of Corea has resulted from a general insurrection. The King and Queen have been assassinated, and the Japanese Legation has been attacked by the anti-foreign party. Japanese war vessels have been despatched to Seoul River. The insurrection due in a considerable measure to bigoted opposition to the policy which led to the recent treaty with the United States and Great Britain. The King had been energetic in his efforts to open up the country to foreign trade, and this has excited against him the enmity of those who supported narrow and exclusive policy. They are led by the Uncle of the King who has now seized the throne. In view of the insurrection and its results Japan is understood to be fitting out an expedition against the Corea, chiefly to seek redress for the violence done to the Japanese residents there; but China interposes an objection, declaring that the duty belongs to China as the Sovereign power to restore order and tranquillity. It is thought not improbable that this contention may give rise to difference between China and Japan.

The British Conference of the Young Men's Christian Association will be held in the Christian Institute, Glasgow. Delegates are to be present from all parts of the kingdom, and the Glasgow Association is expected to entertain the friends when in conference. The meetings continue for four days. The following topics will be discussed: How to extend the sphere of the Young Men's Christian Association work and influence among the upper and the industrial classes. The temptations of early manhood, and how the Young Men's Christian Association can fortify young men against them. How can the Young Men's Christian Association contribute to each other's welfare. Christ's method of dealing with inquirers considered as a model for Association workers.

Hospital Sunday in London Produced an aggregate fund for the hospitals of the British metropolis worth £172,120. Four per cent of the fund is set apart this year for the purchase of surgical appliances, and this proportion amounts to £6884. The Christian Chronicle observes: "It is satisfactory to know that the Hospital Sunday collection is growing in popularity. Perhaps it may be said even now that the collection hardly represents the wealth of London, but that an advance is being made toward the $250,000, which has been frequently named as a fairly good sum to be raised each year, is gratifying to the promoters and an additional encouragement to them to proceed in their beneficent work."

The Serious Illness of Dr. Tait, Archbishop of Canterbury, is announced. The nature of the illness is not described in the intelligence sent by cable, but the bulletins issued mention his serious prostration and continued drowsiness, symptoms which in a man seventy-one years of age naturally excite apprehension.

Engineer Melville and the Seamen Noros and Ninderman, of the Jeannette, and Lieutenant Berry, of the Rodgers, sailed on the steamer Parthia on September 2d from Liverpool for New York. It is intended to give them an enthusiastic reception, and a steamer has been engaged to carry a party of friends down the bay to meet the Cunarder as soon as her arrival is signalled.

SIR JOHN ADYE KCB and PRINCE TECK—Map of the Seat of War in Egypt.

SIR JOHN MILLER ADYE, K.C.B.

Born in 1819—Military Training—Introduction to Active Service—The Indian Mutiny in 1857—The Afghan Campaign in 1863—Honors and Appointments—His Address to British Soldiers in Egypt on August 12—Astonishment of the Arabs at His Troops.

THE two portraits which appear on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, belong to the personnel of the Anglo-Egyptian expedition. The first—that of Sir John Abye, is the portrait of a distinguished soldier who has seen active service in the field, and has won by his intrepid behavior and his military skill the respect of foreign critics as well as those of his own country. In the British army his name is honored and loved alike by officers and men, and the utmost confidence is felt by them all in his sagacity and wise generalship as well as in his personal bravery. He has gone to Egypt as Chief of the Staff of Sir Garnet Wolseley, and is consequently second in command. He is sixty-three years of age, having been born in 1819. He is the son of a soldier, his father, James P. Abye, having been a major in the Royal Artillery.

The future general was sent at an early age to the great training school of British officers, the West Point of England, Woolwich Academy, where he displayed considerable diligence and aptitude, and acquired a remarkable proficiency in the various branches of special military study included in the curriculum. He was soon regarded by his compeers as a man of much promise, and a trustworthy authority upon matters connected with his profession. His industry was proverbial, while his conscientious devotion to duty obtained for him the cordial eulogiums of regimental superiors which have been justified by his subsequent career, for he has been promoted step by step until he attained his present rank of Brigadier-General.

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

His first introduction to active service "in the tented field," was in the Crimean war—now rather more than a quarter of a century ago—between Russia on the one hand, and Turkey, supported by England, France and Sardinia on the other. His technical knowledge and enthusiastic bravery well qualified him in the estimation of his chiefs to fill an important post, and he was appointed Assistant-Adjutant-General of the Royal Artillery. In this capacity he was engaged in the severe struggles which took place early in that memorable campaign, and subsequently took an active part in the battles of Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman, which were fought in the years 1854 and 1855. He was also one of the officers most prominently engaged in the siege and fall of Sebastopol—a Russian stronghold which the Czar fondly believed was impregnable—in the last-named year. As a recognition of his skill and bravery throughout the protracted struggle, the Queen conferred on him the Crimean medal with the four clasps, he was also honored with one of the orders of knighthood, that of the Bath of which he was made a "Companion" and was entitled to write the initials "C.B." after his name. He also received a Turkish recognition of his valor, the medal of the Fourth Class of the Medjidie, and the Turkish medal.

THE SEPOY MUTINY AND AFGHANISTAN.

The Indian Mutiny, broke out in 1857, producing undisguised consternation throughout the whole of Europe, and that land was the scene of General Abye's next active operations. In the campaign to check and punish the atrocities committed by the revolted Sepoys, General Abye held the same appointment as in the Russian War. He was present in the sanguinary fighting round Cawnpore, and was one of those who, on entering the city after the desperate battle saw the room in which delicate and refined English ladies were, after nameless outrages, hacked to pieces by professional butchers. The soldiers saw the floor of that spacious apartment covered with blood, the blood of women and children, the walls hacked with strokes that had been unnecessarily vigorous against forms so fragile, while here and there lay a finger or a hand small and delicate, which had been raised in a piteous appeal for mercy. While in the well in the courtyard the bodies mutilated, dying and dead, were piled in a ghastly heap. That was the awful massacre of September 27th, the recollection of which with its fiend-like atrocities will never fade from history's page. Two months later he took part in the action of Pandoo Nuddee, and on December 6th played a conspicuous part in the defeat of the Gwalior Contingent, a victory which aided materially in the termination of the strife.

General Abye was again in active service in the campaign of 1863-4, which was rendered necessary by the depredations of the tribes on the North-west frontier of Afghanistan. General Abye was nominated for special service in the disturbed region, and was present at the storming of Laloo, the capture of Umbeylah, and the destruction of Mulkah, and remained with the troops until the termination of the outbreak and the complete suppression of the rebellion.

Returning home, honors well earned were showered thickly upon him, and in 1873, Queen Victoria showed her appreciation of his services by conferring upon him the cheap but highly esteemed reward of a Knighthood Commandership of the Bath. In February of the following year her Majesty granted him her royal license and authority to accept and wear the insignia of Commander of the Order of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic. This was a promotion, as he already held the class of Officer of the same order which Napoleon III. awarded him for his brilliant services during the Crimean War nearly twenty years before.

From 1870 to 1875 Sir John Abye was Director of Artillery and Stores, and from 1875 to 1880 was Governor of the Woolwich Royal Military Academy. In December, 1875, he attained the brevet rank of Major-General, and in 1880 was appointed Surveyor-General of Ordnance. He has thus served in the principal Army Supply departments of the British War Office, and has had an extensive experience in all the details of the equipment of an army. He has also won some renown as an author, having written several books relating to the History of the Indian, Crimean, and Afghanistan campaigns.

ADDRESS TO THE SOLDIERS IN EGYPT.

In August he proceeded to Egypt, and on August 12th the Grenadier and Scots Guards and the Gordon Highlanders disembarked at Alexandria and proceeded to the front. Great astonishment was excited among the natives by the strains of the bagpipes. The men were at once mustered for inspection and General Abye with General Alison (whose portrait appeared last week), walked down the ranks and witnessed the unfurling of the colors on Egyptian soil. General Abye then delivered an address to the soldiers which proved that he knows well how to evoke enthusiasm by appealing to the most potent impulses of the soldier's breast. He commenced by pointing out to them the duties and difficulties, hardships and perils, of campaigning. He reminded them that they must be prepared to meet an enemy in great strength, numerically considered, courageous, determined, and well armed. He cautioned them against being too sanguine or over-confident, and strongly exhorted them to guard against surprises. He paid a special compliment to the Guards who are considered the flower of the British army. He said that he had had the honor of serving on previous occasions with the Guards, upon whose well-known prowess it was unnecessary that he should dilate, and finally expressing his conviction that their conduct and bearing throughout the coming campaign would add fresh laurels to those with which the Household Infantry was already crowned.

ASTONISHMENT OF THE ARABS.

At half-past four o'clock the Grenadiers' band struck up a quick march, and the battalion moved off in fours. The Scots Guards followed, headed by their pipers, drummers, and fifers. Simultaneously the sailors manned yards, and set up a lusty cheer, which was vigorously echoed by the Guards on the quay. Along the line of route were to be seen many groups of Arabs, anxious to see what kind of men England had sent to overrun the country and establish order by crushing the doubtless Arabi.

The Europeans turned out en masse to welcome the Guardsmen, whose excellent drill and soldierly bearing made an imposing spectacle as they marched steadily through the white débris of burned houses, shovelled together in heaps, upon which the turbaned and red-capped Arabs gazed in knots to see the English soldiers pass their way to the front. They were then conveyed in trains to Ramleh, where they are quartered.

The Arabs, as company after company straggled past, were unable to conceal their feelings of astonishment. One man was heard asking his neighbor, in an awe-stricken voice, how many thousands of them were coming. To which the other piously replied, "Allah only knows." While another ejaculated, "All is lost; Islamism is overthrown." A Greek remarked, in a tone of astonishment, "Why, the English really have soldiers, as well as ships and money!"

Sir John Abye's books prove that his intellect is one of a very brilliant order, and that he possesses considerable mental penetration in general matters as well as in those strictly military. It may be hoped that in the conspicuous position he now occupies his example may be of that kind that tends to the promotion of the best interest of troops. They are now in a land where Christianity is despised and as the soldiers of a Power professedly Christian, their conduct will be closely watched and should they be guilty of dishonorable acts reproach will fall on the Christian religion. restraining the passions of the soldiers and keeping them from outrage and plunder the officers will have some difficulty. But they, and especially Sir John Abye who can understand and appreciate the importance of exemplary behavior in the circumstances, will be held responsible by the world for the good conduct of their troops, and it will no small degree depend on their influence and example how the men behave. It will be a happy and providential circumstance if the cause of Christ in that ancient land does not suffer through this expedition.

PRINCE TECK.

Born in 1837—Ancestry—Marriage to Princess Mary in 1866—The Princess's Numerous Philanthropies.

THE second portrait on the first page of this number is that of Prince FRANCIS PAUL CHARLOIS ALEXANDER, Count of Hohenstein, better known as Prince Teck. He is the only son of Duke Alexander of Wirtemberg, a cousin of the present King of Wirtemberg. His presence in the British army is explained to some extent by the fact that he is now more of an Englishman than a German. He had the good fortune to marry Princess Mary of England, who is Queen Victoria's cousin. She is a daughter of the late Duke of Cambridge and sister of the present Duke. The late Duke was the brother of the Queen's father and son of George III. By virtue of that relationship she puts in a claim which has been duly honored by the obsequious British Parliament to be supported by the people.

The Princess Mary enjoys an annuity of $200,000, and when she married Prince Teck he, instead of taking his wife to his home in Germany where money was not very plentiful, shrewdly settled in his wife's home in England. The result shows his astuteness, for Queen Victoria who kindness to any one who is of German birth, proverbial, has plenty of fat sinecures to give away, of which the German husband of her cousin has had his share. But notwithstanding his office and his wife's $25,000 a year the Tecks are filled with financial straits. The Prince seems to have lost his head in the midst of a prosperity to which he was unaccustomed, and developed a capacity for spending money as though his resources were unlimited. His mistake, however, he has lately found out, for the debts of the Teck household increased so rapidly that a few weeks ago all the tradesmen stopped their supplies and refused to furnish more until their bills were paid. It seems the Prince who had to live in the plainest style in Germany now finds himself unable to dine com-

God! 'Yes, He is,' I answered. 'No, no, that not be;' he replied, 'it is blasphemy to say so. God cannot have a son.' 'Do you believe in your Scriptures?' I asked. 'Yes, every word of em,' was the expected answer. 'Have you not read the Second Psalm which says, "Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee?" and, again, "Kiss the Son lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way?"' 'Oh,' exclaimed the astonished Jew, 'I never noticed that before.' No! his condition exactly corresponds to and illustrates the apostle Paul's affirmation, that 'Blindness hath happened unto Israel.' But speedily they shall hear the glad summons spoken of by Isaiah, 'Arise and shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.'

A Lady and the Nanny.—At the Same Meeting. Mr. Jack said: 'I addressed a meeting of nannies this week, and it is pleasing to witness the influence which Christian ladies have over these rough men. At the inquiry meeting I spoke to a tough, strong Highlander, and urged him to take a firm stand against the drink and the devil, but he said, 'It's nae use; I've done it afore, and I've aye broken out again;' and so saying, he left me. At the door a number of ladies were standing, and as he was passing out they spoke to him, and soon prevailed upon him to sit down. In the meantime, I saw his wife in a seat, and spoke to her. She told me that she was a Christian, but her man (referring to the Highlander) was not; and 'Oh,' she said, 'he's siccan a guid man when he's sober.' We both bowed together in prayer, and as we were rising from our knees, a young lady came up, saying, 'John has taken the pledge!' Turning to the woman, I said, 'Didn't I tell you that God would hear our prayers?' 'God he praised!' she replied; and husband and wife, really glad at heart, went home together.'

A Slave Set Free.—Mr. Lakin said: "On Tuesday evening, August 1st, I saw a woman in the tent who had neither hat, nor shoes nor stockings on her feet. She was evidently much distressed in mind. I spoke to her of her need of salvation. Holding up a piece of waste paper in her hand, she replied, 'If that bit of paper was a £100 note I would gladly give it to be freed from my curse.' I sat down beside her and told her a portion of the history of my own life—how at one time I was my master, but that now through God's grace I was drink's master. I then asked her to kneel down, and as she did not seem to understand anything about prayer, I asked her to repeat after me the prayer of the publican. When I uttered the words, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' she utterly broke down, and putting up her hands like a little child, she repeated the words. God has heard her prayer, and she has found in Christ the freedom which she sought. Last night a worker pointed her out to me in the gallery of the hall, her face actually shining with the joy of salvation."

A Blind Carriage-Horse.—Mr. Lakin said: "Some time ago a gentleman lost by death one of a pair of beautiful carriage-horses. He searched far and near for another horse to match the living one. After a long time he heard of an Irishman who had one almost like that which died. Going to the stables, he critically examined the animal, stroked his legs, back, and sides, and at last bought it with the clear understanding that it had no fault of any kind. The horse was duly delivered at the purchaser's stables, and the coachman, very much interested, looked it all over, and thought it perfect till, taking the horse into a better light, he saw a small white speck on its off eye. He waved his hand backward and forward, but not a wink did the horse make with that eye. Looking at the other eye he saw the speck upon that also. The horse was stone blind. John rushed to the house and asked to see his master. 'Why, sir,' he exclaimed, 'the horse is blind!' 'Blind! not a bit of it,' his master answered. 'Come and see, sir,' John replied. When assured of the fact, the gentleman rode to the dealer's stables, and loudly declaimed against the cheat. When he quieted down a little, the Irishman said, 'Sir, will you let me speak? The blindness is not the horse's fault, but only his misfortune; if it had its own way there would not be a better pair of eyes in the kingdom.' Now, the difference between us and the horse is, that there is a remedy for our blindness, but there was none for the horse's, therefore if we refuse to use the means given to us, it is our own fault, and not our misfortune."

An Atheist Farmer Saved at Last.—Mr. Johnstone said: "A well-to-do farmer, intelligent and educated, and who was a great reader of books which ridiculed Christianity, proved in the hour of suffering and death, that infidelity could inspire no courage, or furnish any encouragement or gladness when most they are needed. Entering his bed-room I found in it the doctor and a miller, both of whom were atheists. They were trying to 'make his mind easy,' as they expressed it, but turning to me he gasped out, 'Will you pray for me?' Physical pain was gone, but his mental agony was terrible to witness. His sobs shook the bed, and the two men who were his bosom friends could do or suggest nothing consolatory or helpful. All their endeavors failed; but when I spoke to their dying friend of the love of Jesus, and how He longed to forgive all who desired pardon, it was like a draught of cold water to the parched lips. Oh, how eagerly did he drink!"

PROPHETIC NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

ITALY'S DESIGN ON TRIPOLI.

AN exchange of opinions is said to be going on just now between several of the Powers on the question of an eventual occupation of Tripoli by Italy. It is said that at the very first opportunity, on the occurrence, for instance, of any fresh difficulty of an international character, a pretext will be found for carrying this scheme into effect. The French Government offers no opposition to the plan. The naval and military armaments which the Italian Government are now engaged in preparing, are said to be intended simply for the realization of this scheme. The Standard remarks that with Tripoli given to Italy, Algeria and Tunis already belonging to France, and Egypt in the hands of the British, it only remains for Morocco to be given to Spain, and thus the entire North coast of Africa will be disposed of. It is remarkable that this is just the arrangement which prophecy leads us to expect in the predestined formation of the latter day Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey and the Slav States (Dan. 7: 24).

"A REVIVAL OF FRENCH IMPERIALISM"

is the title given by some of the newspapers to recent Bonapartist movements in Paris. We hold most positively from Scripture prophecy that a Napoleon Bonaparte (probably Prince Jerome Napoleon) will soon arise, as Daniel's Little Horn, or Monarch, ruling over Syria and making a seven years' covenant with the Jews (probably about 1886), seven years before the end of this dispensation (Daniel 7: 24; 9: 27). There may, however, be another Napoleon (possibly Prince Victor Napoleon) soon rise to be ruler of France—soon, quite independently of the Syrian Napoleon who is eventually to become the Antichrist. A speech has been made very recently by M. Paul de Cassagnac, the present leader of the Bonapartist party, in which he says: "The Republic is now just in its last throes, and it behoves the Bonapartist Imperialists to prepare for power. This is now no time for praying beside the revered tombs at Chislehurst. True Imperialists must devote only a moment to prayer, and then be up and doing to meet the rising star of Empire."

M. de Cassagnac very clearly affirmed his allegiance to the Prince Victor, eldest son of Prince Jerome Napoleon, exclaiming that when the Prince was at hand the Empire was not far off. He spoke with respect of Imperialists who, sharing other views, had formed different plans for the re-establishment of the dynasty; but firmly adhered to the principles set forth in the will of the late Prince Imperial, rejecting Prince Jerome Napoleon and imploring the party to rally round his son, the young Prince Victor, and to look hopefully to the future. He concluded with a scathing comment on the renegade who had abandoned the cause in its hour of trouble to join the Republic," and resumed his seat, after proposing a resolution in favor of Prince Victor. This was unanimously agreed to.

ARABI PASHA'S PROPER NAME

is "Ahmet," the name of Arabi being merely derived from the village of Orahi, whence his family originally sprung. So devout Mussulmans are now being reminded that according to tradition the leader who shall restore Mahomedanism to its pristine glory is to be called Ahmet. This triumph of Islam over Christianity is predicted to take place in the thirteenth century of the Hegira, now only a few months distant, and Arabi's partisans are not backward to make capital out of the coincidence. Arabi himself keeps up his character of a religious champion by most ostentatious piety. Thus a French writer who was present when he was discussing with his colleagues, the answer to the Anglo-French note demanding his own exile, relates that as the hour of prayer sounded in the midst of the discussion Arabi suddenly got up, fetched his prayer-carpet, and went through his devotions in a loud tone, subsequently resuming his consultation as calmly as if it was a matter of no importance.

Arabi is very popular among the Turkish and Egyptian Ulemas, who regard him as the saviour of Islam. He is no less in favor among the lower classes in Turkey. It is believed in Turkish circles that when Arabi is attacked he will destroy Cairo, join the insurgents in the Sudan, proclaim the independence of Upper Egypt, and carry the insurrection into Syria and Arabia.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, writes: "I met to-day a diplomatist passing through Paris who long played a leading part in European affairs, is thoroughly conversant with the East, knows all the Turkish statesmen, and is likewise well acquainted with Russia. His opinion is, therefore, entitled to weight, and it is this: If a collision eventually arises between England and Turkey, Europe would be split into two camps—on one side Austria, Germany and Italy; on the other, Russia, France and England. This would happen, notwithstanding the present reserve of France, and notwithstanding Russia's jealousy of England. The force of things would be too strong. Russia cannot side with Austria. France cannot side with Germany. France, England and Russia would confront Austria, backed by Germany, and followed by Italy. A struggle of Turkey against England means an explosion all over European Turkey; it means Austria pushing towards Salonica; it means Constantinople at stake, a general conflagration, with Turkey annihilated, whoever the victor might be." This is much what Scripture prophecy leads us to expect.

THE NEW MOSLEM MESSIAH.

The Standard correspondent says: "I have received to-day from a trustworthy Mussulman source some interesting information confirming a report which I sent a short time since to the effect that Arabi intends to take refuge in Tripoli in the event of his defeat. He has been for some time in active communication with Sheikh Mohammed Snussi, founder of the revivalist sect of Mahomedans bearing his name. The headquarters of this fanatical personage are in the oasis of Kufra, southeast of Tripoli. This has been the centre from which the Mussulman agitation in Northern Africa has been carried on for a long time. According to popular belief, Mohammed Snussi will shortly declare himself as the Mandi or Moslem Messiah, destined to usher in the final victory of Islam. The importance attached to this belief in the Mahomedan world may be measured by the consternation which prevailed last autumn at the Yildiz Kiosk when it was reported by the Governor of Hedjaz that Sheikh Mohammed Snussi had appeared at Karaba. A son-in-law of the Sheikh paid several visits to Arabi at Cairo, and is believed to be at the present time at Kafr Dower with offers to secure Arabi a safe retreat if he can reach the oasis of Sivah, the Jupiter Ammon of ancient history. Thence it would be only ten days' ride across the frontier of Tripoli to Kufra."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Star Route Cases as they Approached their conclusion last week attracted renewed public attention, especially after Judge Wylie's statement on Thursday that attempts were being made to fix the jury. The judge evidently felt deep indignation at these corrupt overtures, as was manifested by his remark that he "was almost ready to advise the jurymen to shoot the man on the spot" who offered the bribe. The charge to the jury delivered on Friday was followed throughout the country with close attention, and though it was plain that Judge Wylie strove to be strictly impartial, everyone was impressed with the force with which his exposition of the law operated against the defendants. The plea on which the defence placed most reliance, that of a lack of evidence of the conspiracy, Judge Wylie emphatically rejected. He said "People who commit crimes avoid the light, and all crimes are more or less difficult to establish for that reason. But as to conspiracies, they are peculiarly products of darkness. They are very seldom reduced to writing. They are entered into generally in an informal way. The parties may not come together at all. They may live in different parts of the country. But if by any means they come to a mutual understanding for the purpose of committing a crime against the Government, that is a conspiracy, provided it be followed by an overt act. It is said that you ought not to convict a man upon circumstantial evidence, unless it be of the clearest and most convincing character. The rule is that you should be satisfied in your own minds beyond a reasonable doubt. But the reasonable doubt ought to arise out of the evidence in the case; it ought not to be a conjecture. It ought to be a doubt supported by a reason." As to the plea that the defendants were not interested to the same extent in the various offences alleged, Judge Wylie said: "The only consideration about which the jury need concern themselves in their deliberations is whether there was a conspiracy followed by overt acts. Whether these parties were mutually interested in the several contracts or not, is of no consequence. The parties remain several owners in their own contracts, but bound together by the tie of the conspiracy. Any overt act as to any one of the contracts—assuming the conspiracy to be established—is an overt act as to them all, because they were united by a conspiracy, though there were several contracts and several owners still. The defence claims that the conspiracy must be made out as to all these contracts, and that unless the conspiracy is established under each of the contracts there must be an acquittal of all the defendants. That is not so. If you should be of opinion that there was a conspiracy between the defendants, though relating to but one of the contracts, that will sustain the indictment. The jury being unable to agree were locked up until Monday afternoon, when they returned a verdict of "guilty" against Miner and Rerdell, "not guilty" as to Turner and Peck, and disagreed as to the other defendants.

Prohibition is the most Prominent Question in Indiana at the forthcoming election as it is in Ohio and other states. In Indiana its present stage is in advance of its position elsewhere. A newspaper correspondent in Indiana in describing the situation, says: "The last Legislature, in which the republicans had a majority, passed a resolution providing for the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment prohibiting the sale or manufacture of liquors, beer or wines except for medical or manufacturing purposes. Such a resolution must be adopted by two successive legislatures before the amendment can be submitted. Whether or not the Legislature to be elected this fall shall finally submit the proposed amendment to a popular vote is practically the main point of contest between the two organizations. This is the issue between the parties: the republicans say that the Legislature, no matter what may be the individual opinions of the members or the wishes of the constituencies which elected them, must submit the amendments to a popular vote. The democrats say that each member shall vote in the matter as his own convictions or the preferences of his constituency shall dictate."

The Reports of the Yellow Fever Epidemic at Brownsville, Texas, state that the epidemic is now under complete control of the physicians. Governor Roberts has issued an appeal for aid, in which he says: "I have received a telegram from the mayor of Brownsville, stating that there were five hundred cases of yellow fever in that city, with an increase of from 70 to 100 per day, and the necessity for means to send aid to the sick and destitute was increasing and urgent." This appeal has met with a hearty response, and supplies are now flowing in from all parts of Texas. Fifty-eight new cases and four deaths was the report of Friday last. At Pensacola the Young Men's Christian Association has taken charge of the matter of the relief of the distressed, and has made an appeal through the Associated Press to the people of the North for aid. It was thought on Thursday that the fever had expended itself, but the events of that and the following day justify a changed opinion, and aid and sympathy from abroad will not be misplaced. A telegram dated Friday says: "The pressing need now is trained nurses of experience. The secretary of the Relief Association reports that there has been a greater demand for nurses than they have been able to supply by volunteers, and that it has no fund to pay them or to purchase apparently essential supplies. The committee hopes, however, for a generous response to the appeal telegraphed to the Associated Press last night. If the fever continues to extend they will have to send to New Orleans for practical nurses."

The Question of Guiteau's Responsibility as affected by the result of the microscopical examination of his brain is now plainly before the public. The report of the experts is in technical language, unintelligible to ordinary readers, but the Medical News explains the bearing of the various discoveries made. From its statement it appears that the brain of the assassin was not found to be absolutely normal in its condition, but the changes noted were apparently of recent date and were indications of approaching disease rather than evidence of existing malady. The Medical News states the points of difference and sums up its explanation as follows: "We can be conducted but to one conclusion—that, although Guiteau was not strictly normal in respect to the condition of the organic substratum of the mind, and in respect to its symptomatic expression, he was, nevertheless, a responsible agent, in that he had a clear conception of the distinction between right and wrong, and realized the nature of the crime and its punishment. There is, therefore, in the microscopical revelations no reason for changing the opinion which we originally expressed, that Guiteau, an abnormal character, justly suffered the penalty of the law for the high crime he had committed."

Serious Defalcations have been Discovered in the Philadelphia Almshouse accounts, and Major Ellis P. Phipps, ex-superintendent is alleged to have been the chief peculator. He was arrested when the defalcations were first discovered but was admitted to bail in a $2000 bond and has not been heard of since. Search was made of the house occupied by Major Phipps and five wagon-loads of Almshouse goods were found which had been taken there from time to time on requisitions made by Major Phipps. Other requisitions were found which showed that a great many more goods were missing, and a subsequent search was made at the same place. The house was found to contain enough goods to furnish a large store, the list embracing many articles not usually found in poor houses, but which had at least gone through the formality of entering and leaving the Almshouse. There were, among other things, 200 jars of preserved fruits, 2 gallons of French brandy, 2 gallons of Holland gin, 22 bottles of wine, 1 case of champagne. Most of the buckets, pans, and other utensils were filled with sugar, tea, or other groceries, and carefully wrapped in paper. There was a still larger assortment of dry goods in unbroken rolls, ranging from brown muslin and common prints to satin damask and heavy flannels. All these things were locked up in closets or hidden away in dark places. A dumb-waiter was found suspended half way between the floors and filled with rolls of uncut muslin and packages of towelling and table linen. Major Phipps is also charged with having stolen the roof of the Almshouse. It was made of copper which it was decided to sell and replace with a cheaper material. That was done but the $7000 received for the copper roof was not accounted for.

Major Sawyer's Appearance in Cooper Union on Sunday night, September 3d, after his visit to Europe where he has been assisting Messrs. Moody and Sankey, was greeted with a hearty welcome. More than a thousand people had assembled by seven o'clock and between that time and the commencement of the service at eight, Gospel hymns were sung by the choir. At eight o'clock Mr. Sawyer entered and was received with a burst of applause. When the audience had become quiet he spoke of the pleasure it gave him once more to worship with his friends in Cooper Union. He then said: "Mr. Moody sends you his best wishes in the continuance of your efforts to save men. He has been working right straight along during the hot weather, and I suppose he will always work in the same untiring way. Mr. Bliss, who has been laboring here in the Union so faithfully all summer, will soon go to Europe, where he will endeavor to preach to the masses."

An Investment of Ten Dollars was Recently made by a travelling salesman on a Chicago and Alton train. He learned from the conductor of the train that a feeble old man was on board with a ticket from some place in Wisconsin to Holden, Mo. The old man had no money, and his prospects of obtaining necessities during his long journey were very dismal. The salesman took pity on the neglected old man, provided for his comfort, attended to his safe transfer to the Missouri Pacific train, secured him a good berth, and finally gave him ten dollars, saying as he did so that he was making the best investment he could with the money. Wall Street speculators would not indorse the salesman's opinion, but a time is coming when it will be found that such investments are more remunerative than the business world supposes (Matt. 25 : 34-40).

Special Hospitals for Infectious Diseases are recommended by the New York Medical Society and by medical journals in various parts of the country. The project is now one of the most prominent in circles engaged in the discussion of sanitary measures. In the course of the discussions of this enterprise, attention has been called to the comparative immunity from infectious diseases enjoyed by the Jews, and statistics have been quoted to show that they are the healthiest race on the earth. This is accounted for on the ground that their laws enjoin a wholesome diet, frequent ablutions, and rigid isolation of infectious diseases. Physicians and sanitary reformers readily trace the effect to its cause, but it is remarkable that they seldom go a step farther and recollect who was the Lawgiver of the Jews. The Christian notes with pleasure that this is a testimony to the wisdom of God from a quarter from which such testimony seldom comes (Deut. 30 : 9).

A Disaster Saved two Miners from Death in Colorado last month. They were working a claim on Mount Sheridan. In consequence of the hard work that would be attendant on bringing sufficient timber to the claim to build a cabin, the men dwelt in a tent. The recent severe weather cautioned them to depart, but they were anxious to complete a certain part of the work which they thought would take but a few days. So they waited and worked on, but on August 31st, much to their vexation, the fierce winds tore down their canvas shelter entirely. This disaster necessitated their immediate departure, though they were reluctant to leave their work only half done. They had not proceeded far on their journey, however, when a huge body of snow let go its hold on the mountain, and rolling down the precipitous descent passed over the place where they had been at work. If they had not been driven away by the disaster to their tent they would have perished. The time will come when many events in our lives which we now regard as calamities will be recognized as blessings sent by our Heavenly Father to save us from impending disaster (Rom. 8 : 28).

A Cicatrice on a Young Man's Brow led to his identification by his mother at Newark, N. J., two weeks ago. She had been searching for him for fifteen years as far as her means would allow, and her joy at finding him was very touching. When a child, he was injured by a car on the railroad which cut a deep gash from his right temple to his left eyebrow. The wound healed, leaving a conspicuous scar, but symptoms of mental disorder were developed, and ultimately he had to be placed in the asylum on Ward's Island. Soon afterward his father died, the home was broken up, and the widow removed to other places in quest of remunerative employment. Eventually she married and settled in Newark. Then she went to visit her demented son. To her surprise she found that he had recovered and had been removed, but no clue to his movements could be discovered. Fifteen years elapsed without bringing mother and son together, but in August last they met, and the mother seeing a scar on the brow of a stalwart man made inquiry of him and discovered that he was her son. He could remember nothing of his life prior to his dementia except that he had a vague impression of a woman crying over him, and he was not sure that that was not a dream. He was as delighted at finding his mother as she was at finding her son, and said that if he had known she was living and searching for him, he would never have rested until he found her. He said, "I have known what it is to want a mother, and now that I have found her I know how to appreciate her." How many men who have been brought to their heavenly Father who has sought them with infinite patience have had reason to make a similar avowal (Isa. 55 : 5).

Drowned in a Stolen Yacht Appears to have been the fate of a young resident of New York recently. Last week a lady who was at Glen Cove saw a yacht approaching from the Sound, which she recognized as a vessel that her husband had once possessed, but which had been stolen from its moorings in the North River on August 8th. She immediately gave information to the police and the yacht was seized. The occupants frankly stated that they had borrowed it from a gentleman at New Rochelle. On visiting him it was found that he did not claim ownership, but held the yacht by direction of a coroner in trust for unknown owners. On applying to the coroner it was elicited that on August 13th a young man claiming to be the owner of the yacht had been drowned while sailing in her, and the coroner believing it to have been stolen refused to give up the vessel. Other circumstances disclosed at the inquest confirmed his belief that the dead man was a thief whose wicked act had cost him his life. This is not a remarkable coincidence nor a strange retribution, as is alleged; it is simply a fulfilment of God's explicit warnings (Prov. 5 : 22, 23).

"Faithful unto Death" would be an appropriate epitaph for a tombstone in the cemetery of Pottstown, Pa. There a lady was buried on September 3d, who died at the age of ninety-six. She was the daughter of Jacob Drinkhouse, who fought against England in the Revolutionary War, and died in Philadelphia in 1860. When Miss Drinkhouse was young and the belle of Pottstown she became engaged to be married to Joseph Mintzer, one of the most promising young men of the place, but before the wedding-day her lover died. The widowed sweetheart declared that she would never marry, and remained true to the memory of her betrothed for three quarters of a century. When she was dying she requested that the gold engagement ring which young Mintzer had placed on her finger in the happy days of her girlhood might be placed on her hand and be buried with her. She had cherished this love-token throughout her long life. This incident deserves the notice of the popular writers of the day whose favorite topic is the inconstancy of woman. It teaches a lesson too to some members of Christ's church—His bride—whose relations with the world often suggest doubts of their fidelity to Him who espoused them and died for them (Eph. 5 : 25-27).

The Snake's Power of Fascinating its Victim is vividly illustrated in a letter written by a lady, at Graniteville, Cal., dated August 12th. She states that a few days previous, she was horrified on going to the door of the kitchen where she was at work by the sight that met her view. She says: "Ten feet from me, and on the doorstep of the woodshed, stood my baby boy, twenty-two months old, gazing as if fascinated upon a large rattlesnake, which was coiled in front of him about two feet away, and was gently moving its head back and forth, looking at the child with eyes like flame. My scream frightened it, and my daughter, twelve years of age, ran past me and caught her little brother out of the way, when the reptile glided swiftly away. My screams brought my husband and a teamster to the spot, and they soon killed the snake. The child cried bitterly for half an hour to go see the 'pretty saak,' as he called it, and would not be pacified until shown the dead body of the horrid thing." The creature the child called pretty the mother described as "a horrid thing," but then she knew its venomous nature which the fascinated child did not. In later years the child may remember his early experience with advantage. Satan's most fatal snares have the power to charm and captivate, and it will only be by God's mercy if he is withheld from them as he was from the snake until their power to injure is destroyed (Prov. 9 : 17, 18).

OUT OF EGYPT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"When he arose, he took the young child and His mother by night, and departed into Egypt: and was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the Prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my Son."—Matthew 2 : 14, 15.

"When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."—Hosea 11 : 1.

To the Chosen Seed—Typical Egypt in Great Cities.

EGYPT occupies a very singular position toward Israel. It was often the shelter of the seed of Abraham. Abraham himself went there when there was a famine in the land of his sojourn. To Egypt Joseph was taken that he might escape from the death intended for him by his envious brethren, and become the foster-father of the house of Israel. Into Egypt, as we all right well know, went the whole family of Jacob, and there they sojourned in a strange land. There Moses acquired the learning which was so useful to him. It was out of the spoils of Egypt that the furniture of the Tabernacle was made, as if to show that God intended to take out of heathen hands an offering to His own glory, just as afterward the timber of the Temple was hewn by Hiram the Phœnician, that the Gentiles might have a share in building the Temple, in token that they would one day be made fellow heirs with Israel.

But while Egypt was for awhile the shelter of the house of Israel it became afterward the house of bondage, and a country fraught with danger to the very existence of the elect nation. There was a very useful purpose to be served by their going down into Egypt for awhile, that they might be consolidated into a nation, and might acquire many useful arts which they could not have learned while they were wandering about in Palestine; the lesson was valuable, but it was learned in much misery. They had to smart beneath the lash, and faint beneath their labor; the iron bondage entered into Israel's soul, so that an exceeding great and bitter cry went up unto heaven.

Yet, when the heaviest burdens were laid on their shoulders, the day of liberty was dawning; when the tale of bricks was doubled, Moses was born. When man had come to his extremity of persecution, then God took His opportunity of salvation, and led His Israel out of Egypt in the teeth of their tyrant master. It had been at first a Goshen to them, a place of great abundance in the Delta of the Nile; but afterward it became a Mizriam to them, for that is the Hebrew word for Egypt, and it means and tribulations. The point that is meant to be brought forward by the prophet is that they were called out of Egypt, for it was not possible for them to mingle with the sons of Ham and lose their separate existence. They were on the banks of the Nile, and at first dwelt there in much comfort, but this seductive ease was not allowed to hold them; full soon they were heavily oppressed, and their existence was threatened; yet both from the comfort of Egypt and from the captivity of Egypt they were called, and at the call of God they came forth.

Those whom God has chosen may be cast far, but they shall never be cast away; they may dwell among a people like the Egyptians, most superstitious and debased, a nation of whom even the heathen Juvenal made sport when he said, "Oh, happy people, who grow their gods in their kitchen gardens," for they worshipped leeks and onions, and all kinds of beasts and fowls, and creeping things; but the children of the Lord cannot be suffered to remain among such a people, for the Lord desires to make of Israel, and of all believers, a people separated unto Himself. Out of the midst of guilty Egypt the Lord called His people, whom He had formed for Himself, to show forth His praise.

I. Let us think of the natural seed of Israel, as called out of Egypt, for with them this wonderful text began to be expounded. It is well worth considering, for this constituted one of the loftiest lyrics of Hebrew poetry.

THE DELIVERANCE OF THE PEOPLE OF GOD out of Egypt "with a high hand and with an outstretched arm" is a song which the nation never wearied of singing, and which we ought never to weary of singing either, for at the close of all things we and all the spirits redeemed shall sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and of the Lamb. While speaking upon this natural seed I want you to notice, first, that if they are to be called out of Egypt they must first go down into Egypt.

They cannot come out of it if they have not first gone into it. I do not know of anything that could have tempted them down into Egypt, for it had nothing to offer which was better than Canaan; but the fathers of the tribes were driven there by a famine which troubled the whole world. The Lord sent a man before them, even Joseph, who laid up in store food for the seven years of famine, and Israel went down into Egypt that they might not die, but might be cherished by Joseph, who had become lord of the land.

The Lord may, in order to prevent His people falling into a worse evil, permit them to go into that which seems hopeful, but ultimately turns out to be a great trial to them. Suffering is infinitely preferable to sinning; the Lord may therefore send us sorrow to keep us from iniquity. Dear friend, the Lord who reads your heart may know that it is absolutely necessary for you to be tried, and so spiritually to go down into Egypt. He may send a famine to drive you there; He may place you under great tribulations, and so He may bring you down, both mentally and spiritually, into a sad condition, where you shall sigh and cry by reason of bondage. Do not look upon this as a strange thing, for all God's gold must pass through the fire. It is one of the marks of God's elect that they are afflicted. The Lord Jesus saith, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." Depend upon it that if you are one of the true seed you must go down into Egypt; for the Lord said to Abraham, "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs."

THE ESCUTCHEON OF THE CHOSEN bears the emblem of a smoking furnace and a burning lamp. Even if the world shelters you, it will sooner or later become to you the house of bondage; yet into that house of bondage you must go, for there is a great educational process going on in affliction to prepare us for the land which floweth with milk and honey. Egypt is one of the early lessons; strangely early with some; their religious life begins with a cloudy morning and threatening of storm. This will work them lasting good. The earliest days of Israel were in Egypt, the nation in its infancy was called from thence. While the divine life has not yet attained to maturity we meet with straits and troubles, and have to go down into Egypt and feel the weight of the yoke upon our shoulders. This is one of God's ways of preparing us for freedom, for he that has never tasted of the bitterness of bondage will never be able to appreciate the sweets of the liberty wherewith Christ makes men free. So Israel must first go down into Egypt; he descends that he may rise to greater heights.

Note next, that it was while in Egypt, and at the worst time of their bondage in Egypt, that they received the first notification that the nation was to be called the son of God. Israel is not called a son until Moses comes to Pharaoh and says, "Israel is my son, even my firstborn; and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me." God had been with Abraham, and called him His friend, but I do not perceive that He called him His son, or that Abraham addressed the Lord as "Our Father which art in heaven." Neither do I find similar sweet words flowing from the lips of Isaac or of Jacob; but when Israel was in bondage, then it was that the Lord revealed Israel's adoption, and openly declared, "Israel is My son, even My firstborn." He scourgeth every son whom He receiveth, and He receives them even while the scourge is sorely bruising them.

They were a poor down-trodden nation—a nation of slaves begrimed with brick-earth, and bleeding beneath the lash of their taskmasters! The Egyptians must have utterly despised a people who yielded so readily to all their exactions; they looked upon them as a herd of slaves, who had not the spirit to rebel, whatever cruelties they might endure. But now it is, while they are lying among the pots, and their faces are stained with tears, that the Lord openly before proud Pharaoh owns the nation as His son, saying, "Israel is My son, even My firstborn." I think I see Pharaoh's grim, sardonic smile as he seems to say, "Those slaves, those wretched brickmakers, whom the lowest of my people despise—if these are Jehovah's firstborn what care I for Him or them?" Learn hence, dear brothers and sisters, that God is not ashamed of His children when they are in their worst estate.

When it became clear that they were really the sons of God, then for it. A place which, as I have said, was at first their shelter, now became the iron furnace of oppression. Their hard labors are doubled, their male children were ordered to be cast into the river, and edicts of the most intolerable kind were fulminated against them. Now, brethren, Satan soon knows the man that God has owned to be His son, and he seeks to slay him even as Herod sought to kill Jesus. No sooner is the child of God really acknowledged to be such, than at once the seed of the serpent will hiss about him, and if they can will cast their venom upon him; at any rate, they will bite at his heel, till God has taught him in the name of Jesus to break the serpent's head. Rest assured that this is another mark of the election of grace. All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution.

But now comes the crown of the text, that is, "I have called My son out of Egypt," and out of Egypt Israel must come, for Egypt was not Israel's portion; it was "a land that was not theirs." My brethren, we are not citizens of "the great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified;" and the best thing in this present evil world is not your portion nor mine. Friendly Egypt, sheltering Egypt, was not Israel's inheritance. If we are dwelling in the world, and are tempted to be of the world, and to take up with the riches of Egypt we must by grace be taught to cast all this behind our back, for we have not our portion in this life, neither can we have our inheritance until we enter upon the life that is to come. Not in Egypt would God reveal Himself to His people. What saith He? "Come ye out from among them; be ye separate, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters." When He called Israel His son it is in connection with this coming out. "Out of Egypt have I called My son." And you and I must be fetch'd out from the world and all its associations, and truly severed from it, if we are ever to come to know the Lord our God.

There were many difficulties in connection with this calling of Israel out of Egypt. Perhaps one of the chief obstacles was their own wish to stop there; for, strange as it may seem, though it was a house of bondage to them,

THEY DID NOT WISH TO STIR

from it at the first. Their spirit was broken by their sore bondage, so that they did not receive Moses and Aaron as they ought to have done, but they even chided with them. Ah, brethren, the chief work of God with us is to make us willing to go out, willing by faith to follow Jesus, willing to count the reproach of Christ greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt. He did make them willing, and they went out at last joyfully, marching in rank, like a trained army; not needing to be driven, but hasting to escape out of the enemy's country.

Moreover, the Lord made them able to go, as well as willing, for it is very beautiful to think that there were no sick people in the whole nation of Israel at that time of the going out. We read—"There was not one feeble person in all their tribes." O child of God, has God given you the will to get out of the bondage of the sin and the corruption of this crooked generation? He that gives you the will will give you the power. Perhaps you are crying, "Who shall deliver me? To will is present with me, but how to perform that which I would I find not." Rest assured that God the Holy Spirit, who has given you the will, will also give you the strength, and you shall come marching out of Egypt, having eaten of the Paschal Lamb.

The Lord stunned their enemies, so that they begged them to be gone, and bribed them to make haste. With blow upon blow He smote the Egyptians, till on that dreadful night, when shrieks of pain went up from every house in Egypt, the Egyptians hastened them to go. "We be all dead men," said they, "unless you go;" and even their taskmasters urged them to immediate flight. Our God knows how to make even the wicked men of the world cast out the Christian; they cannot endure him when once his adoption is made known; they grow tired of his melancholy presence, tired of his convictions of sin, and of that gloomy face which he carries about with him, and they say, "Go out, go out, we cannot endure you." They perceive something in him which is foreign to themselves, and so they thrust him out.

The spiritual meaning of all this is, that from under the power of sin, of Satan, and of the world God will certainly call His own redeemed. They shall not abide in the land of Egypt; sin shall not be pleasant to them; they shall not continue under Satan's power, but they shall break his yoke from off their neck. The Lord will help them, and strengthen them, so that they shall clean escape from their former slavery. With a high hand and an outstretched arm brought He up Israel out of the land of Egypt, and with that same high hand and outstretched arm will He save His own elect, whom He has loved from before the foundations of the world, and whom He has purchased with His most precious blood.

JESUS CALLED OUT OF EGYPT.

II. Now we turn with pleasure to the divine seed, the man Christ Jesus. He had to be called out by an angel from the sheltering Egypt into which Joseph and His mother had fled with Him. I dare say when you have read that passage in Hosea, you have said, "I cannot see that it has anything to do with Christ." Why, think you, was the passage made so obscure, for it is obscure confessedly, and any one reading it without the spiritual teaching which Matthew received would never have perceived that Christ was going down into Egypt to fulfil that word? I take it, the reason of the obscurity was this—that its fulfilment might be of the Lord alone. Suppose His father and mother had known these prophecies, and had purposely set themselves to fulfil them, there would have existed a kind of collusion which would have beclouded the wonderful wisdom of God in bearing testimony to His Son. Mary and Joseph may have known of this prophecy, but I greatly question whether they perceived that it referred to their son at all, or to the Son of the Highest; but now they must do the very thing that God says shall be done, without knowing that they are fulfilling a Scripture.

One of the worst things you and I can ever attempt is to try and fulfil a prophecy. Good mistress Rebecca wanted to fulfil a prophecy, and what a mess she made of it! She endeavored to make her second son the heir, and in the attempt she brought upon him and herself a world of sorrow. Surely, if a prophecy is made of God, God will see that it comes to pass. If it is a Chaldaic prophecy, a prophecy of soothsayers and magi, no doubt they will try to make their own oracle true; but the Lord, who seeth the end from the beginning and ordaineth all things, can speak positively of the future. If any of you set up for prophets, beware of prophesying till you know that you can make it good. God doth not need such petty provision; He wants no help from us; His word will surely be established.

I love to find Jesus everywhere—not by twisting the Psalms and other Scriptures to make them speak of Christ when they do nothing of the kind, but by seeing Him where He truly is. I would not err as Cocceius did, of whom they said his greatest fault was that he found Christ everywhere; but I would far rather err in his direction than have it said of me, as of another divine of the same period, that I found Christ nowhere. Would it not be better to see Him where He is not than to miss Him where He is?

It came to pass that our Lord must find no room in Israel, and so must go down into Egypt. There was no room for the young child in the inn; and now the Edomite, the child-devouring Herod, has risen, and there is no room for the new-born King anywhere in Palestine. Alas, how sad a picture of the visible church, where Christ, at times, can find no room! What with contending sects, Pharisees and Sadducees, there would seem to be no more room for Christ in the church to-day than there used to be. By fear of Herod His parents are made anxious, and by angelic direction they must go down into Egypt, where Herod's warrant would not run. Heathen Egypt will shield while hypocritical Judea will slay. Jesus, like another Joseph, must be carried down into Egypt, that the young child's life may be preserved. Here He has a foretaste of His life-trials, and early begins His life of affliction.

When Jesus stands up to fight He wars by non-resistance. He says, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would My servants fight." He conquers by flight rather than by fight. He taught His people when persecuted in one city to flee to another; and never did He bid them form bands, and battle with their persecutors. That is not according to Christ's law or example. A fighting church is but a bearing and enduring church—that is Christ's church.

His parents fled with Him by night, and took Him down into Egypt, that He might be sheltered there. Traditions tell us wonderful stories about what happened when Jesus went into Egypt, but as none of them are inspired, I need not waste your time with them. The only one that might look like fact is, that His parents sheltered themselves in a temple wherein idol gods were ranged, and when the child entered all the images fell down. Certainly, if not actually true, it is a poetical description of that which happens wherever the holy child puts in an appearance. Every idol god falls before Him. Down He must go, whether it be Dagon, or Baal, or Ashtaroth, or whatever the god may be called; ay, and he that wears the triple tiara on the seven hills, and calls himself the vicar of God on earth, must come down, and all his empire must sink like a millstone in the flood.

We do not know how the young child and Joseph and Mary lived in Egypt, except that they had received gold from the Magi, and that being a carpenter, not a hedge carpenter, but one skilled in joinery and wheelwrighting, Joseph could find plenty of work in Egypt, where vast multitudes of Jews were already settled. Whether our Lord was carried to Alexandria or not we cannot tell. The probability is that there He was housed, for it was the great rendezvous of His nation and the centre of their learning; there had the Bible been translated into the Greek tongue by the seventy, and there flourished schools of Jews much more liberal than those in Judea. It is, therefore, not unlikely that the Prince of Peace went to that region where we have most

UNHAPPILY ILLUSTRATED CHRISTIANITY with cuts—not all of wood, nor all innocent of blood.

But Jesus could not stop in Egypt. "Out of Egypt have I called My Son." His parents by a brave act of faith went back at the command of the angel to the Holy Land; Thy land, O Immanuel! Jesus could not stay in Egypt, for He was no Egyptian. He did not come to exercise a ministry among the Egyptians. He was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, in His public working. Being called out of Egypt the heavenly vision was not disobeyed. His foster-parent Joseph took Him back, and they settled in Nazareth. Yet remember He had been in Egypt, and this was a prophecy of blessing to that land; for wherever Jesus goes the air is sweetened. Every plot of land that His foot hath ever trodden on shall be His for ever. What said God to Jacob? "The land whereon thou liest will I give thee." And the same is true to Jacob's great descendant.

III. Let us turn to think of the chosen seed that shall be brought out of Egypt. Here I would remark that this passage may be taken, and should be taken, literally. God has a chosen people who shall assuredly come out of

THE VERY EGYPT WHICH NOW EXISTS.

It is remarkable that early in the Gospel day the truth was gladly received in Egypt. Egypt became the land of saints and divines, and as it had once been the source and home of civilization, so it became an active camp for the soldiers of the cross. Under the successors of Mahomet all this was swept away, and now the Crescent's baneful beam falls where once the heavenly sun shed out its infinite glory, and scattered health among the sons of men.

Egypt did turn to God, and it will turn again. (Read Isaiah 19.) So that we feel clear that our God has yet a son to call out of Egypt, and He will call him. There shall be a seed to serve Him even in the midst of the down-trodden people who live by the Nile-floods, for God hath said it. There is one passage to which I should like to refer you, because it is so full of comfort. (Jeremiah 43:12): "And he shall array himself with the land of Egypt,"—think of that—putting it on as Joseph put on his coat of many colors—"as a shepherd putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence in peace." Yet shall Christ wear as a robe of honour this land of Egypt, and again shall it be true, "Out of Egypt have I called my son."

Let us learn from this that out of

THE STRANGEST AND ODDEST PLACES

God will call His son. Certain brethren among us go to the lodging-houses in Mint Street, Kent Street and other places. Can any good thing come out of them? Assuredly, it can, for "Out of Egypt have I called My son." Out of Thieves' Acre and Ketch's Warren saints shall come. Some of you perhaps know of holes and corners in London where a decent person scarcely dares to be seen; do not pass by these abominable haunts, for out of such Egypts will the Lord call His sons. The worst field is often the most hopeful. Here is virgin soil, unploughed, untilled. What harvests may be won by willing workers! Oh ye brave hands, thrust in the ploughshare and break up this neglected soil, for thus saith the Lord, "Out of Egypt have I called My son."

But we will take the text, and conclude with it, in a spiritual sense. All men are in Egypt spiritually, but God calls out His own sons. Sin is like Pharaoh, a tyrant that will not yield; he will not let men go; but he shall let them go, for God saith, "Out of Egypt have I called My son." We are in a world which is the destroyer of grace as Pharaoh was the destroyer of Israel's little ones. You do not think a good thought but what it is laughed out of you; you scarcely catch a word of Scripture, but as soon as you get home you are compelled to forget it. Nevertheless out of that—"Out of Egypt have I called My son." You shall be delivered yet. Put you your trust in Jesus Christ, for "to as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God," and out of Egypt will He call every son of His.

Perhaps you are in the dark, as the Egyptians were during the plague, or as when God turned to Egypt. Ah, but if you are one of His, if you will but trust Jesus, which is the mark of being God's elect, out of darkness will God call you; out of thick Egyptian night will He fetch you, and your eyes shall be made glad with the light of the Gospel of Christ.

Perhaps you dwell in the midst of superstition, for the Egyptians were horribly given to superstition, but yet out of that will God call His people. I look to see priests converted. I hope yet to see leaders of the Gospel found among men that were once steeped to the throat in superstition. Why not? "Out of Egypt have I called My son." Where did Luther come from but from the monastery, and he preached the word with thunder and lightning from heaven, and God blessed it to the emancipation of nations. He will bring others of that kind; out of all sorts of ignorance and superstition he will fetch them, to the praise of the glory of His grace.

I feel encouraged to pray for those who appear to be hopeless: I feel as if I must cry to God, "Bring them out of Egypt, Lord, the worst, the vilest." You here that know what Egypt is, and are in it, and know you are in it, oh, believe that the Emancipator has come, the Redeemer has appeared; with an offering of blood has He stood before God, and given Egypt for a ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for you. Oh, that He might win those with power whom He has bought with price, and to Him be glory, world without end. Amen.

Mr. Moody in a Gin-Palace.—"When Mr. Moody's old mission was on the south side of Chicago, two men opened a gin-palace. They fitted it up with velvet couches, gilt-framed mirrors, and marble tables, and cut glass—in fact, it could not have been more superh. They issued invitations right and left to a free lunch on the opening night. One of the partners sent, in fun, an invitation to Mr. Moody, who, on receiving it, with his usual readiness to seize an opportunity of working for Christ, went down to the gin-palace, where he saw one of the proprietors. Going up to him, he said, 'I received an invitation to come to a free lunch to-night. Do you mean me to accept it?' 'Certainly we do,' was the reply. 'May I bring a few friends?' inquired Mr. Moody. 'Yes, of course; we'll be glad to see them,' answered the publican. 'I'll be round with some friends,' replied Mr. Moody. The other partner, who had heard part of the conversation, thought this somewhat strange, and called after Mr. Moody. 'What is your name, sir?' 'My name is Moody. I have accepted your invitation and will be here by-and-by.' 'Oh, hut, what do you mean to do—pray?' inquired the man, somewhat alarmed, for he had heard of Mr. Moody before. 'Well, it is probable that a few men will to-night use God's name in vain, and we will be here to use God's name in another way,' replied the evangelist. 'But we can't allow that,' said the publican. 'But you allow oaths.' 'That's different.' 'Well, then,' said Mr. Moody, 'I will give you the option of kneeling here just now with me, or I will hold a prayer-meeting here to-night! Which will you prefer?' 'Pray just now, then.' Kneeling down Mr. Moody prayed that these men might voluntarily give up the traffic, or that they might be ruined. The business was not given up, but in a few weeks these men were utterly ruined. One started a low drinking-shop in another quarter, the other man went into different towns trying to start also, but Mr. Moody's prayer rang in his ears wherever he went. At last, one day in despair he went out to a lonely place to kill himself. He drew a knife out of his pocket, and was about to plunge it into his heart, when his Christian mother's words came back to him as clearly as though they had just been uttered: 'My boy, if you ever get into deep trouble call upon God.' He did so, and now he is going about the various towns in which he tried to ruin men, preaching the Gospel. His old partner failed in his new shop and is a ruined man."

A Red Indian Encampment.

Mr. A. Haegert, Missionary to the Santhals.

WORK AMONG THE INDIANS OF THE NORTH-WEST.

AN interesting narrative of the work of the Episcopal Church Missionary Society among all the Indian tribes on the west of the Rocky Mountains has been recently issued. Mr. Duncan who first went among them in 1857 to preach the Gospel, states that he found them universally given over to superstition. They had the belief that there is one great Spirit who never dies, but they did not think of this Spirit as their maker, or the Creator of the world. When they were in sickness or trouble they called upon the Great Chief above to help them, but if he did not seem to hear them, they shook their fist in anger and cried out, "You are a great slave," which was the worst insult they could offer even to each other. The thunder they called the great Chief's voice: it is terrible, even now, among the unconverted natives to see their alarm when the thunder speaks; they dare not be alone; even strong fierce men tremble, and crouch down till the storm is over.

After a year's labor, Mr. Duncan had the happiness of seeing a few of the Indians led to Christ as their Saviour and friend. The missionary in his diary records the following: "I went after dark to see a dying woman. I found her laid before a large fire, with some twenty Indians squatted round. After giving her a little medicine, I began to speak to her about her sinfulness, and its only remedy in Jesus. Before I went away, one woman said she and her people did not know about God, but they wanted to know and learn to be good."

The missionary heard that a young man, whom he had visited several times, was dying. This Indian had already, before his illness, learned something of the Gospel, and in his sufferings he prayed to God. He gave a very real proof of having cast away his old superstition by refusing to let the native doctors come to him with their heathen incantations. Mr. Duncan says, "I directed him to fix his heart on Jesus and to pray to Him. 'Oh, yes, yes,' he answered, and for some minutes closed his eyes and seemed absorbed in prayer. He begged me earnestly to teach his little girl, for he wanted her to be good. His end was one of the most triumphant I have ever seen."

One of the most touching incidents which Mr. Duncan gives is that of an Indian, who had no earthly friends to soothe and comfort him on his dying bed. Mr. Duncan was away when the man was seized with small-pox. "Away from every one whom he loved, in a little bark-hut on a rocky beach just beyond reach of the tide, which no one of his relatives or friends dared come near, except the one who nursed him. He said, 'I die quite happy. I find my Saviour very near to me. I am not afraid to die. Give my thanks to Mr. Duncan; he told me of Jesus. I have hold of the ladder which reaches to heaven.'

MR. A. HAEGERT. Missionary to the Santhals, India.

THE Santhals of India are one of the most benighted as well as one of the most superstitious tribes of the natives of India. They were for many years neglected by missionaries, but Mr. Haegert, a young German clerk, was led by God to devote himself to their spiritual enlightenment and his work has been signally blessed.

Mr. A. Haegert, whose portrait appears on this page, was born at Anclam, Prussia, on November 2d, 1844. Having received the educational advantages of the German Institut, he was sent to a French pension, in order more fully to qualify him for commercial life.

In 1866, his beloved mother passed away from earth. On her death-bed her chief anxiety was for her son, that he might become a believer in Christ and live only to His glory. She died with his photograph in her hands, praying for his conversion. The young man recognized the voice of God distinctly and lovingly calling him to yield himself to Christ, and devote himself to His service, and he was intensely anxious to do so. There was no one, however, at hand to instruct him, and for two years he continued his earnest agonizing search after God.

In January, 1868, he went to join his brother who was engaged in business, at Calcutta. He afterward obtained an appointment in the civil service. Attending the services at the Baptist Church, Lal Bazaar, during the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Robertson, he was shown the way of salvation, and led to devote himself to the Saviour. With the joyful experiences of the new life, came the desire to be useful in the work of the Lord; but for some time no way seemed to be opened up for him in which his desires might be realized.

In December 1872, being then employed in the Public Works Department, at Allahabad, with excellent prospects of worldly success, he resigned his appointment under government, went into the midst of the jungles of Santhalistan, learned the language of the people, established a Mission Station, opened schools for the children, set up a Dispensary for the sick, and employed some of his converts to help him in the work of preaching the Gospel—all of which was done at his own private expense.

When his funds were exhausted, he heroically resolved to go on, trusting in the Lord for all necessary supplies, and his faith has been much honored. A considerable number of friends rallied around him and supplied him with funds to continue the important mission which he had begun, but he received no aid from any society.

In 1875, he opened what is now known as the "Bethel Santhal Mission," in the midst of about 140,000 people of Santhalistan, a hill district south of Calcutta. From this period, for over six years, he resided in a hut in the jungles, exposed to constant danger through the incursions of leopards and tigers, and deadly snakes, but all undaunted, carrying on his work of preaching the Gospel with which he joined the practice of medicine having studied the science in Europe.

The Santhal creed is that all disease is the work of demons, and all their attempts when seized with illness were directed to exorcising the malignant spirits. Mr. Haegert therefore found them without even the most rudimentary knowledge of medicine, and he was able to effect cures which astonished them.

Successful cases of this kind contributed greatly to the missionary's growing fame, and opened a wide door for the preaching of Christ crucified, and so many lives were saved, which were apparently doomed by the angel of death that the people began to think that the God of the Christian must be mightier than their own demons, whom they feared and worshipped, because of their power to smite with disease and destroy. The consequence was that not only were many lives saved from temporal death, but many a sin-sick and heavy-laden soul was led to the feet of Christ, and found healing and eternal life.

THE LIEUTENANT'S GOOD ANGEL.

"Oh Clara! Lieutenant Wallace is in the library and he has asked for you," said a little girl of some ten summers, as she burst into the room where her elder sister sat at a window reading. Clara's face was suffused with a blush as the little girl continued, "He looks so solemn and low-spirited, and he did not even kiss me, nor give me candies as he generally does, and he is dressed in his sailor clothes."

"Run down dear," Clara said, "and ask him to come up, I expect he has something rather serious to say so you will not come in while he is here to disturb us."

"Very well," said the child with an intelligent look, "I don't want to hear your secrets Clara, though everybody knows he is your lover and I don't see what you can have to say to each other so very particular, for you saw him at Mr. Gray's party last night. I heard papa say he was there."

"Never mind now dear what we have to talk about, but run right away and bring Lieutenant Wallace up, and then leave us. You will know perhaps some day why some meetings ought not to have any witnesses."

So admonished the child obeyed and in a few moments a stalwart young sailor entered the room, where Clara still sat pensively, with her book still in her hand. He walked straight to Clara's chair and extending his hand said, "I have come to say good-by. I thought you would excuse my doing that. It is a small matter to you Clara, but it means a good deal to me."

Clara did not take the proffered hand, but turning half round in her chair and looking reproachfully but tenderly in his eyes, she said, "Why Clement, where are you going so unexpectedly, and why do you speak so?"

"I am going to sea, Clara, and I shall be away two years at least, indeed, I do not know that I shall ever come back. I am a reprobate and you must forget me, for no happiness can ever come to you through me. I shall only break your heart, and I love you so dearly that I would spare you that fate, though no one knows what it has cost me to leave you."

Clara buried her face in her hands for a moment or two and silently offered a prayer to God for help in the moment which she knew was the crisis in two lives. When she raised her head her face was very pale and tears glistened in her eyes, as she said, "Clement is there no way but this?"

"No Clara, there is none; I have spent the night thinking, as well as my muddled brains would think, and there is, I am convinced, no alternative. A connection with me would bring on you misery, sorrow and disgrace, and I will not add that sin to the record of my blighted life. No I will go and you will forget me and be the wife of some good man who will be worthy of you."

"Clement," said the now weeping girl, "why should you lead a blighted life, why should you put my love away from you?"

"Clara," he said in a broken voice, "believe me it is the most unselfish act of my life, I do it with a broken heart and I dread to think of my agony when this parting is over, and I am far from you; but it is a less terrible thing for me to suffer than that the curse of my life should cast its shadow on yours. You saw my condition last night, you could see that I was excited with wine, and after you left the party I was rendered desperate by the thought that I had disgraced myself in your eyes and I was reckless and drank more and more until I was so intoxicated that I had to be assisted to my home. This is not the first time I have been so depraved. Before my last voyage the drunkard's curse was fastening its hold upon me, and when I returned to the temptations ashore it was renewed. For two weeks I was scarcely sober any night. Then I met you and I resolved that for your sake and that I might win you for my wife I would control my passions. You were my good angel and all unknown to yourself you saved me from myself and my enemy. But last night proves that even your influence is not so strong as the craving for liquor. No, I must go to my fate—a drunkard's life and a drunkard's grave, but I will not drag you over such a shameful path."

"But why should you tread it yourself Clement? You say I was your good angel, let me still be that to you. Do not regard the fight as lost, you would not so easily give up your ship to a pirate. Let me do an angel's part by you unworthy as I am to do it. If my influence is strong with you let me use it for your good as you say I did unconsciously a few months ago."

"It is no use Clara, even your power has failed and now there is no hope. You see, my love, there is a traitor aboard and unhappily for me he commands the ship. I fought hard for your sake but I am beaten now. Even the thought of you fails to restrain me. I seem to be possessed by a demon. When I see intoxicating liquor I am like a maniac; I must have it. My thirst is intolerable and I go to it as if I were a slave driven by an inward master. Bless you for your sweet compassion, the thought of it will be a consolation to me as long as I live, but it cannot save me; I am a lost man."

"No," said Clara, "it cannot save you, I know, but it may help you. When I asked you to let me do an angel's part by you I meant that I should try to do the work angels are supposed to do. Let me lead you to Him who is able to save you. I would lead you to Jesus who came to save even the lost. You trusted to me and I failed as I might be expected to fail, but let me lead you to One who is mightier than I; He will not fail."

The poor helpless man listened to the words of faith and hope with anxious ears. He had fought and fallen so often that his heart despaired, but this was almighty help that was offered him, and in his weakness it seemed to be the very thing he needed. He listened intently as the girl he loved told him of Christ's sympathy with the weak and the tempted, of His invitation to the weary and the erring, and then he willingly consented to kneel beside his dear instructress as she pleaded his cause at the throne of grace.

It was a very different farewell that he said when he left, from the despairing farewell he had come to say. He had hope, faint and trembling, but it was hope and it shed a light in his darkened perturbed soul. That hope was fulfilled. During the two years that elapsed before his return, Clara received several letters from him speaking of growing faith in Jesus, of love for Him who was helping the struggling slave of appetite, and of increased moral strength. He still dreaded the struggle that must come when he would arrive in port and be face to face with the temptations before which he had succumbed. But in that struggle he conquered by a strength he had learned to use and it was with a glad heart that he found temptations once overcome lose their strength. A happiness above that which even bridegrooms generally feel, filled his heart as he was united in marriage to the girl who like the good angel he had called her in the hour of his despair, had led him to the Friend of sinners who had saved him with an everlasting salvation.

Christian Encouragement.

THE clerk's words stung two people. Mr. Copleston felt cruelly humiliated, and at the same time doubly thankful that he had not left it to James Williams to deliver his message. He hastened forward and said—"I came to take you over to my house to get some food after your sleep, but since I see that my clerk has—"

"'Twasn't me," interrupted Williams. "Whoever's given him a meal, 'twasn't me, sir."

"No," added the other man, "it was an old lady in a white frilled cap. A gentle, soft-voiced old body," he added in a lower tone, half aside, and Mr. Copleston's face brightened as he said, in an equally low tone, "Ah, good old Granny. 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you.'"

Murmured as the quotation was, scarcely above a whisper, the young man caught it, and it touched a chord already set vibrating in his heart. Acting on a sudden impulse, he raised his eyes to the clergyman, and said quickly, "Ah! Of course! No wonder those that are the blessed of God are glad to remember that He is the Father of heaven. However, seeing, that she is one of those for whom that same kingdom of heaven is prepared, no doubt she does like to think of it and its King; but for me it is different."

"Yes," said the vicar gently. "For you, and for many another of us less ripe for the Father's kingdom than good old Betty Sharplin, it is more comforting, for the time, to pour out our humble sorrow in the prayer, 'God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy upon us, miserable sinners.' And through the Son we get strength to look up to that pitiful Father 'who so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life.'"

It was three o'clock in the afternoon; the clock had just struck, and Williams, who combined the duties of afternoon bellringer with those of his clerkship, was pulling away at the rope with might and main, and giving tongue to his temper while the bell's tongue summoned people to proclaim their faith in that religion whose ripe fruit is love.

"The like of vicar I never d d see!" came spasmodically from between his teeth as he strained away at the bell, and glowered out through the open church door at two moving objects in the distance.

"If he ain't walking cheek by jowl with yon rascalion," he muttered, after another pause for breath, "for all as if he was his brother, or one of the collegers like himself. Belike he'll be asking him up to have the best bedroom at t' vicarage next. I know where I'd lodge him, the lazy black-guard, and that's in the county jail." Williams was looking out across the common and saw two men moving slowly along the fields together. Bobby Balston saw them also, and whispered to Bob the elder:

"Father, there's my poor potato man walking quite comferble like wif Mr. Copuphton."

"Aye, laddie," assented his father; "seems to me as them potatoes you thought on have set un up quite wonderful like."

A good many more of the villagers also saw the unusual sight of their vicar devoting his short interval of Sunday rest, between the two services, to walking and talking with a stranger.

"And naught but the commonest of common good-for-naught beggars," as Williams growled, against his own secret suspicions, to the two or three gossips who strolled up to learn if he could give any explanation of the phenomenon.

Meantime as every minute passed the vicar was giving ever increasingly earnest, secret thanks that the Holy Spirit had put it into his heart to leave his dinner, and come in quest of the wanderer into his little out-of-the-way fold. It had not taken him many moments to discover that instead of being the commonest of common good-for-naughts, as the clerk declared, the stranger was a particularly uncommon specimen of a tatterdemalion, and was hovering on the edge of that most dismal of all precipices, a final chill despair.

Suddenly, while they were talking together, the church clock struck three, and then the bell clanged out, loud and sharp and quick, as it was pulled by the clerk's angry hands; and the vagrant stood still exclaiming, in a tone of self-reproach:

"Why, I guess that you've got a second service just on?"

"Yes," was the smiling answer; "at least, at the half-hour. But what of it?"

"What of it?" repeated the man. "Why, I know if any one had used up his fragments of leisure between the services my father would have thought—"

"Your father?" interrupted Mr. Copleston impulsively, as he looked rather at his companion's clothes than at his face. Then hastily turning his eyes away, he continued, "I beg your pardon. I knew before by your language that you are other than you seem. Is your father alive?"

"Thank God, no," replied the stranger fervently, adding, "Although if he had been I reckon that I should not have been in such a condition to break his heart. He died when I was a lad."

There was a long pause, which Mr. Copleston broke at last by asking, "Are you an American?"

"Oh, no," was the ready answer. "My father was a Welshman, my mother a Scotchwoman, and I was born in Bangor, where my father was the clergyman of one of the churches. My history is simple enough, and soon told. My mother died in my earliest childhood; I can scarcely remember her; but my father was mother and father to me—a nobler, gentler parent no boy ever had. Unhappily, he died of malignant fever when I was fifteen. Taken ill one evening, he was dead three days after, and I was forthwith removed from school by a stern, harsh, Scotch uncle, forbidden to think any more of going to college, or following in my father's footsteps, and placed at a desk in my uncle's office.

"Hard words, hard living, and even occasionally hard blows, were my portion for the next few months, interspersed with cruel, bitter abuse of my father, who had left a penniless orphan behind him to be provided for. At the end of half a year I ran away. Another equally cruelly-used lad in the same office I unhappily persuaded to run away with me. We went to Australia first. But ill-usage had broken him down too completely, poor fellow, in health and spirits, ever to recover. He could do nothing, and I could do little but look after him. However, we drifted on, I don't know how, for some years in Australia, and then we thought we heard of a good opening in America, and so we contrived to get over to that continent. And that move killed him. The climate of Australia had kept him alive in spite of everything; but a burning summer, followed by a hard winter, in America, finished him up, and the second summer he died.

"I had nothing on earth left to live for. Not a creature on earth to care for! I guess that's a state of things enough to take the spirit out of any man. Anyway, I reckon that it did out of me. I drifted along in America a few years longer, saved a little money too somehow. I'm sure I can't say how, only of course there wasn't poor old Aleck to be fed up and doctored any longer, and so what I made I'd next to no use for. Then a great longing came over me last winter to see Bangor once more, so I offered myself to work a passage across on a cranky old vessel, and this time I came in for a real shipwreck. I had had a good share of metaphorical ones before."

"So it seems, poor fellow," murmured the sympathetic listener. "Did the vessel go down?"

"Aye, then, I guess that's just what it did do, and took everything with it but our lives and the clothes we had on. We were picked up out of our boat at last by another vessel, when we'd been drifting five days without food, and brought to Liverpool. That was some months ago. Since then I have been drifting again as usual, and now I have drifted here. That's my history. Not much of a one, you see. Just a quiet, happy boy life up to fifteen, followed by six months' torture, then—drifting. And I should not be sorry if this last spell of that would drift me into that quiet graveyard yonder."

"But I should," said Mr. Copleston quickly. Then, as he saw a dreary shadow fall over his companion's face, he added as quickly, "For some years to come, at any rate. What a foolishly sensitive fellow you are. You look as though you thought I meant that I should grudge you a corner there, or grudge the trouble of reading the service over you."

"Yes," was the simple answer, but in a tone of firm conviction.

"Then I am ashamed of you," said the vicar impatiently, but with a smile that took all hurtfulness out of the irritability. "Your drifting ought at least to have done so much good as to harden your skin for you, and make you more sensible. But there," with a half-laugh, "you are not so far wrong after all; for I should grudge the trouble of reading the service over a finished but unused life, but I shall not grudge the trouble of reading a service to you every day, if you please, for any number of years to come. What has become of your uncle?"

"Died, three years ago, I heard. Left me a shilling, and the rest of a large fortune to some charities."

"Forgive me asking further. Where are your other relations?"

"I have none."

"Then you are alone in the world?"

"Utterly."

"Ah!" coolly, "then you've hit upon the right place to come to. You will have to give up drifting; you will have to stay in Silverdale."

"Stay in Silverdale!" echoed the wanderer in a tone of wonder, and looking down at his tattered garments and old boots, much as Williams the clerk had done a while since, as though he imagined that they must have got transformed before any fellow-creature could imply a desire to keep him in his neighborhood. But look as he would he saw the same old grimy clothes with which he had drifted into Silverdale four hours ago, and he said again, "Stay in Silverdale! All the people of the other places I have wandered into have said 'Move on, get out of Silverdale,' or whatever their towns or villages might be called."

"Very likely. The people in those other places have been too busy, no doubt, to do more than say 'move on;' but, you see, in this sleepy little parish of mine, off the world's highway, I have had leisure to have a chat with that rara avis, a stranger, and having thus learnt something of you, I say, Stay with us."

Tears started into the vagrant's eyes, and he stretched out his hand; but just as the vicar was about to take it the contrast between the color of the two struck the man once more with a sadder sense of shame, and he hurriedly dropped it back to his side, turning as he did so, and walking two or three paces off.

The reminder bell, which had ceased at five minutes past three, now pealed out again, warning clergyman as well as congregation that it was time to be wending churchward; and regular duty could not be put aside for even this unexpected one which had fallen in the vicar's path, of being the means in the Father's hand to raise up one who had fallen fainting on life's wayside. But he would not leave the stranger without one more word. Looking at his watch a moment, Mr. Copleston took a couple of his long strides after his companion, and saying with a smile:

"I am sorry you don't feel well enough disposed toward me to shake hands," added, "I have to go into church now; you will come in too, will you not? See if I approach in any degree to the mode you set up for yourself in your boyhood. There are plenty of seats behind pillars that you can hid yourself away in till you have had the chance to brush up your outward self a degree more to your own taste. Good-by for the present. Sit where you can get a glimpse of you occasionally."

And with these quiet, hearty sentences the faithful laborer in the Lord's harvest ran over the fields to his church with feet almost as light as active as those of his schoolboy sons, young Henry and Frank. He carried a glad heart above his fee and there is nothing like that for making folks steps nimble.

The last member of the congregation stole cautiously in at the side door behind the curtain, and thence slunk into the first seat he could find, which was scarcely a seat at all—in fact, just a niche: the deep shadow of a great stone pillar, not half so comfortable as the bench outside in the cool porch but then the morning occupant of that bench had wanted to go to sleep, and the present occupant of the narrow ledge wished to hear the service, as he chose his seat—morning and afternoon—accordingly, and, all things considered, not so bad either.

The Vicar read Psalm 130, and its concluding words seemed to one listener like an echo of his recent conversation.

"O Israel, trust in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and with Him is plenteous redemption."

And the answer came with the heartiness of united voices:

"And He shall redeem Israel from all his sins."

An hour or so ago Mr. Copleston had said, with appreciative sympathy, "No; I can understand that just now it is more soothing to you to cry 'Him who was tempted like as we are, to the Son of man 'God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy on us, miserable sinners.' And no reason for the cry was given him—'Oh, trust in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and plenteous redemption.' Yes; the weary and woe-laden listener in the dark shadow could moan now in the silent depths of his heart, "God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy on me, a miserable sinner."

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 24. Golden Texts, Luke 4:32; Isa. 11:2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
